primitive elements is accomplished, and which, as soon as they're satisfied, are alienated in a series of situations in which he is never able to get his bearings or find any repose. And it conveys him from success to success and to an almost total alienation from what is his own person.

The storyline of the novel, in an overview like this, doesn't actually amount to much because everything is in the detail, I mean in the way in which the novelist never goes beyond what's happening in the sequence of events and records them in the most concrete terms possible, just as he constantly places not only the hero but everything around him in a position that is invariably double so that at every moment one has double vision with respect to the object, no matter how proximate it is.

I will take as an example the meal at the restaurant, which is one of the first moments in the rise in this character's fortunes.

> Succulent Ostend oysters were brought in, looking like dainty little ears enclosed in shells and melting between the tongue and the palate like salty titbits.
> After the soup came a trout as pink-fleshed as a young girl; tongues began to wag. [. . .]
> They had reached the stage of witty suggestiveness, of words, 78 > veiled yet revealing, that are like a hand lifting up a skirt, the stage of clever allusions, skilfully hidden impropriety, shamelessly brazen hypocrisy, cryptic words that cover naked images and which fill the eye and the mind with a sudden vision of what dares not be said openly and enables smart society to enjoy a subtle, mysterious sort of lovemaking, a sort of marriage of impure minds, by simultaneously conjuring up, with words as sensual and disturbing as a sexual embrace, the secret, shameful desire for body to clasp body. The roast had now appeared, partridges . . . [pp. 105–8]

Note that they ate this roast, the partridges, the poultry terrine and all the rest 'without tasting it properly, without realizing what they were eating, entirely absorbed in what they were saying, immersed in thoughts of love' [pp. 108–9].

This constant diversion which means you don't know whether it's the flesh of a young girl or a trout that's on the table makes it possible for the so-called realist description to dispense with any unfathomable reference to any meaning or trans-meaning whatsoever, poetic or moral or other. This throws enough light, or so it seems to me, on what I'm pointing to when I say that any discourse aiming at grasping reality is obliged to view things from the perspective of the perpetual sliding of meaning. This is what gives it its value and also what makes it the case that literary realism doesn't exist. In an effort to get a tighter grip on reality by articulating it in discourse, all one ever manages to do is show what is disorganizing and even perverse in what the introduction of discourse adds to this reality.

If that seems a bit impressionistic, I'd like to try out something else with you. Since we're trying to remain, not at the level at which discourse corresponds to the real, but at which it simply claims to connote it, follow it or be its annalist – with two *n*s – let's see what this produces. I've taken the series Novels in Three Lines, which Félix Fénéon, a no doubt worthy author whom I don't have time to introduce, used to write for the newspaper Le Matin. There's no doubt that they were not collected haphazardly, since a special talent is apparent there. Let's try to find out what it is, taking them at random.

For having thrown a few stones at the police, three pious ladies of Hérissart have been fined by the magistrates in Doullens.

As Mr Poulbot, a primary school teacher in Île-Saint-Denis, 79 rang the bell for the return to class, the bell fell, almost scalping him.

In Clichy, an elegant young man threw himself under a hansom cab with rubber tyres and then, unhurt, under a truck, which crushed him to pieces.

A young woman was seated on the ground in Choisy-le-Roi. The only identifying word her amnesia enabled her to say was: 'Model.'

The corpse of the sexagenarian Dorlay was swinging from a tree in Arcueil with the sign, 'Too old to work'.

In relation to the mystery of Luzarches, the examining magistrate Dupuy deposed the suspect Averlant; but she was mad.

Mangin, from Verdun, was trudging along behind the coffin. He didn't make it to the cemetery that day. Death overtook him on the way.

The valet Silot, from Neuilly, settled an entertaining woman into his absent master's house then disappeared, taking everything but her.

While pretending to search through her savings for rare coins, two swindlers took 1,800 francs of the ordinary kind from a woman in Malakoff.

> At the beach at Saint-Anne [Finistère], two bathers were drowning. A bather jumped in. And Mr Étienne then had three people to save.

What makes them funny? Here we have facts, described with an impersonal rigour and the fewest words possible. I would say the entire art consists simply in this extreme reduction. What is comical, when we read 'Mangin, from Verdun, was trudging along behind a coffin. He didn't make it to the cemetery that day. Death took him by surprise on the way', absolutely fails to touch our own journey towards the cemetery, however diverse the methods employed to make the journey. The effect wouldn't appear if these things were said in a more lengthy fashion, I mean if it was all drowned in a flood of words.

It's because of what I've been calling the 'sliding of meaning' that we literally don't know where to stop, at what point, in these sentences which we encounter in their rigour, in order to locate their centre of gravity or point of equilibrium. This is just what I would call their decentring. There is no morality here. Anything that could be in any way exemplary is carefully effaced. This is the whole art of composition in these Novels in Three Lines – their style's art of detachment. Nevertheless, what's recounted is still a sequence of events, one whose coordinates are given to us in a completely rigorous manner. This is another quality of the style.

That is what I was getting at in trying to show you that along the 80 horizontal dimension of the chain, discourse is really a skating rink, just as useful to study as the figures of skating, and along which meaning slides. It is a light, infinite band no doubt, which perhaps, because it is so reduced, appears to be nothing at all, but which is manifest in the order of witticisms in their ridiculous, degrading and disorganizing dimension.

It is along this dimension that the type of witticism like the 'flight of the eagle' is located, that is, where discourse meets the signifying chain. This is also the case with 'famillionaire', except that the latter is inscribed at the meeting point at gamma, whereas the other one simply takes place a bit further on.

Frédéric Soulié contributes something that obviously goes in the direction of locating it over on the side of the I, while he appeals to Heinrich Heine to be his witness as the Other. At the beginning of any witticism there's always an appeal to the Other as the locus of verification. 'As true', Hirsch-Hyacinth begins, 'as God shall grant me all good things.' The reference to God may well be ironic, but it is fundamental. Here Soulié invokes a Heinrich Heine who, I will tell you, is much more prestigious than he is himself – without giving you the history of Frédéric Soulié, though the article devoted to him in Larousse is a nice one. Soulié says to him, 'Don't you see, my dear master?' and so on. Here, the appeal, the invocation, tends to fall on the side of Heinrich Heine's I, which is the pivotal point of the matter.

We have, then, passed through the I and returned with 'Golden Calf' at A, the locus of usage and metonymy, for, while the Golden Calf is a metaphor it is a dead one, it has passed into language – and earlier, incidentally, we displayed its sources, origins and mode of production. It is ultimately a commonplace that Soulié sends to the locus of the message via the classic alpha–gamma pathway. We have two characters here, but you know that there might just as easily have been only one, since the Other, merely because the dimension of speech exists, exists in each of us. Moreover, when Soulié describes the financier as a Golden Calf, it's because he's conscious of a usage that to us seems no longer accepted, but I found it in Littré – a gentleman may be called a Golden Calf [Veau d'or] if he is filthy rich [cousu d'or] and, for that reason, the object of universal admiration. There's no ambiguity [in French], and none in the German either.

At this moment – that is, here, between gamma and alpha – there is a referral from the message back to the code, that is, along the line of the signifying chain and, in a way metonymically, the term is picked up again on a plane which is no longer the one along which it had been sent, and this makes it possible to see the collapse, reduction or devaluation of meaning brought about in metonymy quite clearly.

81 This leads me, at the end of today's lesson, to introduce the following, which may perhaps seem paradoxical – that metonymy is, strictly speaking, the locus where we must situate the dimension that is primordial in and essential to human language and that lies at the opposite end of the dimension of meaning – namely, the dimension of value.

The value dimension becomes apparent, in contrast with the meaning dimension. It is another aspect, another register. It refers to the diversity of objects already constituted by language, into which the magnetic field of each person's needs, with their contradictions, is introduced.

Some of you are, I believe, fairly familiar with Das Kapital. I am not talking about the entire text – who's read Capital! – but with the first book, which almost everyone has read. A prodigious first book, superabundant, revealing someone – and this is rare – who sustains an articulated philosophical discourse. I urge you to go to the page where, at the level of the formulation of the so-called 'theory of the particular form of the value of merchandise', Marx shows himself, in a note, to be a precursor of the mirror stage.

On this page Marx formulates the following proposition – no quantitative relations of value can be established without the prior establishment of a general equivalence. It's not simply a question of equating so many yards of cloth, it's the equivalence between cloth and clothes which has to be structured, that is, that clothes can come to represent the value of cloth. It's thus not a matter of the clothes that can be worn but of the fact that clothes can come to be the signifier of the value of cloth. In other words, the equivalence necessary from the start of the analysis, and on which what is called value is based, presupposes, on the part of both terms in play, abandoning a very important part of their meaning.

The meaning effect of the metonymic line is located along this dimension.

We shall subsequently see what the use of bringing this meaning effect into play in the two registers of metaphor and metonymy is. Together they refer to an essential dimension that enables us to refind the plane of the unconscious – the dimension of the Other, to which we necessarily appeal, insofar as the Other is the locus, receiver and pivotal point of witticisms.

That's what we'll do next time.

A BIT-OF-SENSE AND THE STEP-OF-SENSE

Knots of signification and pleasure
Need, demand, desire
Benefits of ingratitude
Misunderstanding and misrecognition
Subjectivity

When Freud comes to the second, synthetic part of his work on witticisms, he enquires into the source of the pleasure they produce.

It's becoming more and more essential that you read this text at least once. I stress this for anyone who might think he is excused from doing so. It's the only way you can become familiar with this work, short of me reading it to you myself, which, I imagine, wouldn't be to your liking. Although this will decidedly lower your attention level, I will read out some extracts, since this is the only way you will realize how closely and how frequently the formulas I bring you – or am trying to – follow the questions Freud raises.

Nevertheless, do be aware that Freud's approach is often circuitous. While he refers to standard themes under various psychological or other headings, the manner in which he exploits them introduces an implicit theme that is just as important as, and even more important than, the themes that serve as his explicit references and which he and his readers have in common. The way he makes use of them, in fact, and you'd really have to have never opened the text not to be aware of this, brings out a dimension that no one had ever suggested before him. This dimension is precisely that of the signifier. I am going to show its role.

I'll go straight to the issue that we will occupy ourselves with today – what, Freud asks, is a witticism's source of pleasure?

In language that is too widespread in our day and that certain people would employ, one could say that the source of pleasure in a 84 witticism is to be found in its formal aspect. Fortunately, these are not the terms Freud uses. On the contrary, he goes so far as to say, with much more precision, that the true source of pleasure yielded by a witticism is that it's funny.

It nevertheless remains the case that the pleasure we get from hearing a witticism is centred elsewhere. Are we not aware of the direction in which Freud is looking for this source throughout his analysis? The ambiguity inherent in the act of making a joke prevents us from recognizing where the pleasure comes from, and it takes all the effort of his analysis to show us.

It's quite essential here to follow the way he proceeds. In a manner consistent with a system of explicit references that becomes increasingly apparent as the work progresses, the primitive source of pleasure is referred to a playful period of infantile activity, to the early playing with words that refers us directly to the acquisition of language as pure signifiers, to verbal play and to the practice that we might almost describe as the pure utterance of word forms. Is it a pure and simple question of a return to playing with signifiers as such at a period before they are mastered, whereas reason will gradually oblige the subject, through education and what is learned from reality, to bring mastery and criticism to the use of signifiers? Does the principal source of the pleasure in witticisms lie, then, in this difference? If that were how Freud's contribution could be summed up, the whole thing would appear pretty simple, but this is far from being the case.

While Freud tells us that this is the source of the pleasure, he also shows us the paths down which this pleasure passes – they're former paths, ones that are still there, existing potentially, virtually, and still sustaining something. They are what is liberated by the operation of witticisms, as is their privilege by comparison with the paths that the subject's progress towards the adult state has brought to the forefront of the regulation of thought. Going down these paths immediately takes witticisms – and this is where all of Freud's earlier analysis [in Part A] of their mainspring and mechanisms comes in – down these structuring paths that are the very paths of the unconscious.

In other words, and Freud himself expresses it this way, a witticism has two sides.

On the one hand, there are signifiers in action, with this freedom that maximizes their possibilities of fundamental ambiguity. In a word, here we find the original feature of signifiers in relation to 85 meaning, the essential polyvalence and creative function that they have in relation to meaning, and the touch of the arbitrary that they bring to it.

The other aspect is that of the unconscious. That signifiers in action evoke, all by themselves, the entire order of the unconscious is well enough indicated, as Freud sees it, by the fact that the structures revealed in witticisms – their constitution, crystallization and functioning – are none other than the very ones he discovered in his initial apprehension of the unconscious at the level of dreams, bungled actions – or successful actions, however you want to take it – and at the level of symptoms, even, and which we've tried to formulate more precisely by using the terms 'metaphor' and 'metonymy'. These forms are the same for all language use and also for the structuring by language we encounter in the unconscious. They are the most general forms, of which condensation, displacement and the other mechanisms Freud emphasizes in the structures of the unconscious are in a way merely applications. It may not be in our mental habits to confer the structure of speech on the unconscious in this way, but it corresponds to what's effectively dynamic in the relation of the unconscious to desire.

This commonality between the unconscious and the structure of speech, insofar as it's regulated by the laws of the signifier, is precisely what we're trying to get a better understanding of and illustrate by means of our recourse to Freud's text on witticisms. This is what we're going to attempt to examine in more detail today.

Stressing what might be called the autonomy of the laws of the signifier, and saying that they're primary in relation to the mechanism for the creation of meaning, does not, of course, exempt us from asking how to conceptualize not only the appearance of meaning but also, to parody a rather awkwardly produced formula from the school of logical positivism, the 'meaning of meaning' – not that this latter expression makes any sense. What do we mean when we talk of meaning?

Moreover, in the chapter on the mechanism of pleasure, doesn't Freud repeatedly refer to this formula, so widespread in connection with witticisms, of 'sense in nonsense'? This formula, which had been put forward by many authors in the past, records the two visible sides of pleasure – a witticism immediately strikes one as nonsense, it grabs you and then compensates you with the emergence, inside this very nonsense, of some secret meaning or other that is, moreover, always so difficult to characterize.

From another perspective, it has been said that the way has been paved for meaning's emergence by the nonsense that in the moment 86
confuses and confounds us. This is perhaps closer to the way it works, and Freud is doubtless inclined to concede that there is more to it. That is to say that the role of nonsense is to trick us for a moment, long enough for a previously unnoticed meaning to hit us as we get the joke. This meaning also fades very quickly. It's fleeting, a flash of meaning, similar in nature to the moment of confusion when we were struck by the nonsense.

Effectively, if you take a closer look, you'll notice that Freud goes so far as to reject the term 'nonsense'. This is what I'd like us to think about today, since it's quite characteristic of these approximations to avoid precisely the final term, the ultimate mainspring of the mechanism at work. Formulas like this no doubt have a seductive psychological appeal to them, but they are not strictly speaking correct.

I'm going to propose that we not take the reference to children as our point of departure. We know that children can take pleasure in these verbal games, that one can therefore refer to something of this order, give sense and weight to the psychogenesis of the mechanism of wit and bestow charm on this primitive and distant ludic activity – and rest content with that. But, if we think about this in some other way than by going along with established routine, it's perhaps not a reference that we should be all that happy with, since it's also uncertain whether the pleasure of wit, in which children only remotely take part, can be completely explained by appealing to fantasy [fantaisie].

In order to make the link between the use of signifiers and what we might call satisfaction or pleasure, I'm going to return to a reference that may seem elementary. Even if we do refer to children, it must nevertheless not be forgotten that in the beginning signifiers have a purpose – they are made for expressing a demand. Okay, so let's stop for a moment at the mainspring of demand.

What is demand? Demand is what in need gets conveyed by means of signifiers addressed to the Other. I pointed out to you last time that this reference merits an effort on our part to explore the different moments in it.

These moments are so underexplored that a distinguished representative of the psychoanalytic hierarchy devoted an entire article of a dozen or so pages – I have alluded to it somewhere in one of 87 my own articles – to marvelling at the virtues of what he calls 'the wording', an English word corresponding to what in French we more awkwardly call 'le passage au verbal' or 'la verbalisation'. It's obviously more elegant in English. A patient of his had been particularly irritated by an intervention he had made. He had uttered something to the effect that she had unusual or even strong 'demands', which has an even more insistent emphasis in English than in French. She had been literally bowled over, as if by an accusation or a denunciation. But when he repeated the same interpretation a few moments later using the word 'needs', 'besoins', he found someone who quite docilely accepted his interpretation. And the author is amazed by it.

The mountain the author in question makes out of this discovery clearly shows us how primitive the state of this art of wording still is inside analysis, or at least inside certain analytic circles. For, in actual fact, there you have it all – demand is in itself so relative to the Other that the Other is immediately in the position of accusing and rejecting the subject, whereas by invoking need he authenticates, assumes and ratifies it, he assumes it and is already beginning to recognize it, which in itself is an essential form of satisfaction. The mechanism of demand brings the Other to oppose it by nature – you could even say that, by its very nature, demand requires opposition for it to be sustained as demand. The introduction of language into communication is being constantly illustrated by the way in which the Other agrees to a demand.

Let's think about this. The system of needs enters the dimension of language where it's remodelled, but it's also permanently pouring into the signifying complex, which is why demand is essentially something that by its very nature presents itself as capable of being excessive. It's not for nothing that children ask for the moon. They ask for the moon because it's in the nature of a need expressed via a signifying system to ask for the moon. And incidentally, don't ever hesitate to promise it to them. And incidentally, we ourselves are very close to having it. But at the end of the day we haven't got it yet.

The most important thing to emphasize is the following – what happens with a demand for a need to be satisfied? We respond to the demand, we give our neighbour what he demands, but what mouse hole does it have to pass through? What reduction in his aspirations must he lower himself to in order for his demand to be approved?

88 The phenomenon of need highlights this quite well when it appears in a naked form. I would even say that to have access to need qua need, we have to refer, beyond the subject, to some kind of Other called Christ who identifies with the poor. This is true of those who practise Christian charity, but also of the rest as well. The man of desire, Molière's Don Juan, of course gives the beggar what he asks him for, and it's not for nothing that he adds, 'for the love of humanity'. The response to a demand, granting a demand, is ultimately referred to an Other beyond the person there in front of you. One of the stories Freud treats as pivotal in his analysis of witticisms, the one about salmon mayonnaise, gives the best illustration of this.

It's about a character who, having given a beggar the money he needs in order to repay some debt or other, make some payment, is outraged when he sees him putting the object of his generosity to another use. It's a very funny story. Some time after the good deed, he comes across him in a restaurant where he is helping himself to salmon mayonnaise – something regarded as a sign of extravagant expenditure. You need to give it a bit of a Viennese accent, which the story calls for. He says, 'What? Is this what I gave you money for? To buy yourself salmon mayonnaise?' The other then makes a joke of it by responding, 'But I don't understand. When I don't have any money, I can't have salmon mayonnaise, and when I do have some money, I can't have any either! So when am I supposed to eat salmon mayonnaise?' [SE 8: 49–50]

Every example of a witticism is made even more significant by its particularity, by what is special in the story and unable to be generalized. It's by way of this particularity that we come to the very mainspring of the domain we're examining.

This story is no less relevant than any other, for they all place us at the very heart of the problem, namely, the relationship between signifiers and desire. Desire is profoundly changed in its emphasis, subverted and rendered ambiguous by its passage through the pathways of the signifier. Let's take a close look at what this means. Satisfaction is always granted in the name of a certain register that brings the Other into play beyond the person making the demand, and it's precisely this that profoundly perverts the system of demand and response to demand.

Clothe the naked, feed the hungry, visit the sick – I don't need to remind you of the seven, eight or nine works of mercy. The terms themselves are striking enough. Clothe the naked – if a demand was 89 something that was to be maintained at its most direct point, why not dress the naked men or women in Christian Dior? This happens from time to time, but usually it's because one has undressed them in the first place. Similarly, feed the hungry – why not get them drunk? This isn't done, it would harm them, they are used to being sober and you mustn't disturb them. As for visiting the sick, there's Sacha Guitry's quip, 'Paying a visit always pleases, if not when you arrive, then at least when you leave.'

The topic of demand is thus at the heart of my remarks today. Let's try, then, to schematize what happens during this pause, which, in some way, through a singular, zigzag pathway, as it were, renders the communication of a demand out of phase with respect to gaining access to satisfaction.

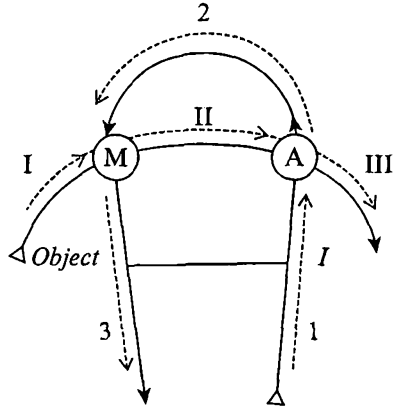
So that we can put this little schema to use, I'll ask you to refer to something which, while it's only mythical, is nonetheless profoundly true.

Let's assume what must exist somewhere, all the same, even if only on our schema – namely, a demand that is met. That's what matters, ultimately – if Freud introduced a new dimension into our considerations on man, I wouldn't say that it's that something succeeds regardless, but that something meant to succeed gets through. The desire that should go through, leaves, somewhere, not only traces but also a circuit that insists.

Let's start, then, with something that supposedly represents a demand that gets through. Since childhood really does exist, we may think of it as a refuge for this demand that goes through. The child articulates something that for him is still only an uncertain articulation, but he takes pleasure in it – this is what Freud refers to, moreover. The young subject directs his demand somewhere. Where does it come from when it has not yet entered into play? Let's say that something starts to take shape at this point we'll call delta or capital D, for 'Demand'.

What does this describe for us? It describes the function of need. Something gets expressed, coming from the subject, and I'll make it the line of his need. It ends here, in A, where it also crosses the curved line of what we've identified as discourse, consisting of the mobilization of previously existing material. I didn't invent the line of discourse where the stock of signifiers, very limited at this moment, comes into play inasmuch as the subject correlatively articulates something.



Look at these things. They unfold on two planes – that of the young subject's intention, however confused you might suppose it 90 to be, insofar as he makes an appeal, and that of signifiers, however disorganized you might suppose their use to be, inasmuch as they are mobilized by his efforts and his appeal. The line of signifiers advances apace with the intention, until both reach the intersections A and M, whose usefulness for understanding the retroactive effect of a sentence as it comes to a close I've already pointed out to you.

Note that these two lines don't cross before the end of the second moment. In other words, whoever's saying something says both more and less than what he has to say. The reference to the tentative character of a child's first use of language comes into its own here.

There is simultaneous progression along both lines and a twofold completion at the end of the second moment. What began as need will be called demand, while the signifiers will come to a close on what, in as approximate a manner as you like, completes the demand's meaning, which constitutes the message that the Other evokes – let's say the mother, granting the existence of good mothers from time to time. Instituting the Other thus coexists with the completion of the message. They are determined at one and the same time, one as message and the other as Other.

At the third moment, we see the two curved lines extend beyond both A and M. I will indicate, at least hypothetically, the names we can give these endpoints and indicate where we can locate them on the structuring of demand that I'm trying to situate as the foundation of the initial use of signifiers for expressing desire.

As the most useful reference point for what we will try to develop 91 later, I would ask you to consider, at least provisionally, the ideal case where demand encounters what extends it at this third moment, namely, the Other who takes it up at the level of its message.

Now, what we have to consider here with respect to demand cannot exactly be confused with the satisfaction of a need, for using signifiers transforms the way this need manifests itself. With the addition of signifiers, it undergoes a minimal transformation – a minimal metaphor, in a word – and this makes it the case that what is signified is something beyond raw need and is remodelled through the use of signifiers. Henceforth, from this beginning, what enters into the creation of the signified isn't purely and simply the translation of need, but the recapture, reassumption and remodelling of need, the creation of a desire other than a need. It's a need with signifiers. Just as socialism – as Lenin used to say – is probably something quite nice, but the perfect society has electricity as well, so, here, in the expression of need, there are signifiers as well.

On the other hand, with respect to signifiers, at the third moment there's certainly something that corresponds to the miraculous appearance – we have effectively made the assumption that it's miraculous, fully satisfying – of the satisfaction in the Other of the new message that has been created. This normally results in what Freud presents to us as the pleasure we get in the deployment of signifiers. In this ideal case of success, the Other enters into prolonging the deployment of signifiers. What prolongs the effect of signifiers is when they are resolved into their own authentic pleasure, the pleasure we get from using signifiers. You can inscribe this at the end of the [horizontal] line.

I ask you to grant as a hypothesis for a moment that the ordinary usage of 'demand' as such is underpinned by an original reference to what we may call the complete success, the initial success, the mythical success, or the primordial and archaic form of the deployment of signifiers. This hypothesis will underlie everything we are going to try to conceptualize concerning what happens in actual cases in which signifiers come into play.

Inasmuch as the fully successful passage of demand into the real creates both the message and the Other at one and the same time, it results, on the one hand, in a remodelling of the signifieds, something introduced by the use of signifiers as such, and, on the other, it directly prolongs the authentic pleasure in the deployment of signi-
92 fiers. The two alternate. On the one hand, there is the deployment of signifiers that we effectively find, with Freud, at the origin of verbal play and that constitutes an original pleasure that is always ready to surface. On the other, there is what happens in opposition to this. Let's see what is involved.

The originality of this is well masked and appears not merely in the response to demand but in the verbal demand itself. This original something that transforms need renders it more complex and places it on the plane of what, starting now, I will call desire.

What is desire? Desire is characterized by an essential shift in relation to everything that is purely and simply of the order of the imaginary direction of need – need that demand introduces into another order, the symbolic order, with all the disruptions that this is liable to bring about.

The reason I ask you to refer to this initial myth is that we will have to build on it for what is to come, otherwise everything Freud formulates concerning the specific mechanism of the pleasure of witticisms will be rendered incomprehensible. The novelty that appears as an essential dimension in the signified through the introduction of signifiers is found everywhere. Freud emphasizes it at every turn in manifestations of the unconscious.

Freud occasionally tells us that something called surprise appears at the level of formations of the unconscious. We shouldn't take this as an accident of this discovery but rather as a fundamental aspect of its essence. The phenomenon of surprise has something originary about it – whether it's produced in a formation of the unconscious, insofar as it shocks the subject by its surprising character, but, equally, where you provoke this sentiment of surprise in the subject when you unveil it to him. Freud makes this point on all sorts of occasions, whether it's in The Interpretation of Dreams, The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, or, at every moment, in the text of Jokes and their Relationship to the Unconscious. The dimension of surprise is consubstantial with what desire is essentially, once it has passed to the level of the unconscious.

This dimension is a dimension that desire carries with it as a specific condition of the emergence of desire as desire. It's the very dimension by which desire is able to enter the unconscious. Not every desire is effectively capable of entering the unconscious. The only desires that enter the unconscious are those that, having been symbolized, can, on entering the unconscious, be preserved in their symbolic form – that is, in the form of this indestructible trace, 93 examples of which Freud turns to again in Witz. They are desires that never fade, that don't possess the character of impermanence characteristic of all forms of dissatisfaction, but, on the contrary, are supported by the symbolic structure, which maintains them at a certain level of circulation of signifiers, which I have designated as having to be situated on this schema in the circuit between the message and the Other, where it occupies a function that varies according to the effects it has where it emerges. We must use these same pathways to conceptualize the rotating circuit of the unconscious insofar as it's there and always ready to reappear.

New meaning emerges through the action of a metaphor when, taking original circuits, it enters the everyday, banal and accepted circuit of metonymy. In a witticism, it's there for all to see that the ball flies back and forth between the message and the Other, and that this produces the effect of originality that is one of the latter's characteristic features.

Let's now go into greater detail so we can try to grasp and understand this.

What happens once we leave the primordial, mythic level of the initial establishment of demand in its characteristic form?

Let's consider an absolutely fundamental theme that runs through stories involving jokes. All you ever see are beggars whom one grants things to. Either they are granted what they haven't asked for, or having been given what they asked for they put it to a different use, or they behave with a special kind of insolence towards the person who has given it to them, reproducing in the relationship between requester and solicited the blessed dimension of ingratitude, in the absence of which granting any request would be truly unbearable. Note, as our friend Mannoni has very pertinently pointed out in an excellent work, how the normal mechanism of granting a request provokes new demands again and again.

What is this demand, ultimately, inasmuch as it reaches the listener, whose ear it was intended for? Let's do a bit of etymology. Although the essential dimension that we must refer to does not lie in the usage of signifiers, a bit of etymology is, however, apt 94 to enlighten us here. 'Demande', which is so marked by themes of insistence in the concrete use of the term, even more so in English than in other languages, but also in other languages, is originally 'demandare', to confide in.

Demand is thus placed on the level of a shared register and language and succeeds in handing all of one's self and all one's needs over to an Other from whom the signifying material for every demand is itself borrowed, and it thereby assumes a different tone. This displacement is especially imposed on demand in particular because of how it effectively functions. This is where we find the origin of the materials that have been employed metaphorically, as you can see in the progress of a language.

For us, this is quite an instructive fact regarding what is involved in the famous complex of dependence I mentioned earlier. Effectively, in Mannoni's terms, when the person making the demand is able to think that the Other has truly granted one of his demands, there is effectively no longer any limit – it becomes normal to entrust all one's needs to him. Hence the benefits of ingratitude, as I just mentioned, which puts an end to what otherwise can't be stopped.

But, equally, the experienced beggar isn't in the habit of presenting his demand so nakedly. A demand has nothing confiding about it. The subject knows only too well what he is dealing with in the other's mind, and this is why he disguises his demand. He demands something that he needs in the name of something else that he sometimes also needs, but which will be more easily admitted as a pretext for the demand. If he needs to, if he doesn't have this other thing, he will just simply invent it and he will above all take into account what the Other's system is in formulating his demand. He will address himself to a charity worker in one way, to a banker in another, in another to a marriage broker, and in yet another way to any of these characters who are so amusingly portrayed in this book on Witz. That is, his desire will be taken up and remodelled not just in the system of signifiers, but in the system of signifiers such as it is installed or instituted in the Other.

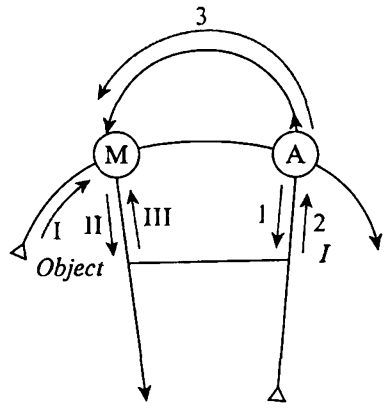
The formulation of his demand thus begins in the Other. It's initially deflected [1] onto this, namely the I, which has already been in an active state in his discourse for a long time. The I proffers the demand, deflecting it back [2] to the Other, and it will travel via the circuit A–M and arrive [3] at the message. This is the appeal, the intention and the secondary circuit of need. It isn't necessary to emphasize its rationality too much, apart from emphasizing its control by the system of the Other. Of course, the latter already implies all sorts of factors that, purely for the case at hand, we are warranted in describing as rational. Let's say that even if it is rational to take them into account, there is nevertheless no implication that they actually are rational in structure. 95

What happens along the chain of signifiers, according to the three moments we see described here? Something remobilizes the entire apparatus and the entire material, and initially arrives [I] here, at M. Then, it doesn't head towards the Other [A] straightaway, but is deflected [II] towards something which, at the second moment, corresponded to the appeal to the Other – namely, the object. This is an object that is admissible to the Other, the object of what the Other is willing to desire, in short, the metonymic object. Once it's deflected towards this object, it converges, at the third moment [III], on the message.



Here we don't find ourselves, then, in the happy state of satisfaction we had reached at the end of the three moments of the initial mythical representation of demand and its success which, with its surprising novelty and pleasure, is satisfying in itself. On the contrary, we find ourselves coming to a stop at a message that in itself possesses a character of ambiguity. This message is a formulation which is alienated from the very beginning insofar at it sets out from the Other, and which terminates on this side at what is, in some way, the Other's desire. The message is the meeting point of the two. On the one hand, the appeal has been evoked from the Other itself. On the other, all sorts of conventional elements are introduced into its very signifying apparatus, elements which form what I will call the communal or displacement nature of objects, insofar as the latter are profoundly reworked by the Other's world. And it's striking to see that at the third moment, as we have seen, discourse circulates between the tip and the tail of the arrow. This can culminate in what we call a lapsus, a slip of the tongue.

96 It's doubtful that meaning formed in this way is univocal. It's so doubtful that misunderstandings and misrecognitions are a fundamental feature of language, forming one of its essential elements. Witticisms exploit the ambiguity of this formation of messages. They are formed, in various ways, on the basis of this point.

I won't sketch out again, today, the variety of forms in which messages that are constituted in an essentially ambiguous form structurally are capable of being taken up and treated in a way that, as Freud tells us, ultimately aims at restoring the ideal pathway ending in the surprise of something novel, on the one hand, and in the pleasure of the play of signifiers, on the other. This is the point of a witticism. The point of a witticism is in effect to re-evoke for us the dimension by which desire, if it does not recapture, at least indicates everything that has been lost along the way, namely, on the one hand, what scraps it has left behind at the level of the metonymic chain and, on the other, what it has not fully actualized at the level of metaphor.

While we call 'natural metaphor' what took place earlier in the ideal transition by which desire reaches the Other, where desire is formed in the subject and is directed to the Other which takes it up, here we find ourselves at a more evolved level. Effectively, these two things known as the I, on the one hand, and the profoundly transformed, metonymic object, on the other, have already intervened in the subject's psychology. From that point on, we are no longer dealing with a natural metaphor, but with the ordinary use of one, whether it succeeds or fails in the ambiguity of the message, which now is to be highlighted under the conditions that remain in the natural state.

An entire aspect of desire continues to circulate in the form of scraps of signifiers in the unconscious. In the case of a joke, through a sort of forcing, a happy shadow or reflection of former satisfaction is conveyed. An astonishing success, one purely achieved by signifiers. Let's say that something happens the effect of which is, very precisely, to reproduce the initial pleasure of the satisfied demand even as it accedes to an original novelty. That is what a joke, essentially, accomplishes. How does it manage it?

This schema may help us appreciate that the completion of the initial curve of the signifying chain also extends what in intentional need passes into discourse. How so? Via a joke. But how is a joke going to come to light? Here again we find the dimensions of sense and nonsense – but we should examine them more closely.

If the indications regarding the metonymic function I gave 97 last time were directed at anything, it was at what equalization, levelling out and equivalences are produced simply by the unfolding of the signifying chain. There is an effacement or reduction of meaning, but this isn't to say that it's nonsense. I borrowed a Marxist reference in this connection – bringing two objects of need into operation in such a way that one becomes the measure of the value of the other, effaces what is specifically related to need from the object and thereby introduces it into the order of value. From the point of view of sense, this might be called, using a neologism that is also ambiguous, the de-sense [dé-sens]. Today, let's simply call it 'the bit-of-sense' ['le peu-de-sens']. Once you have this key in hand, the meaning of the metonymic chain will not fail to appear for you.

The 'bit-of-sense' is exactly what the majority of witticisms play on. We are not dealing with nonsense, for in a witticism we aren't one of those noble souls who, immediately following the great desert by which they are inhabited, reveal to us the great mysteries of general absurdity. If the discourse of the beautiful soul hasn't succeeded in ennobling our feelings, it has recently nobelled a writer. His address on nonsense remains the shallowest [vain] I've ever heard. It's absolutely not the case that there is a play on nonsense every time equivocation is introduced. If you recall the story of the calf – this calf I was having fun with last time almost to the point of giving Heinrich Heine's response for him – let's say that this 'veal's value' was almost nothing at the time it was talked about. Moreover, everything you can find in plays on words, and very specifically those called conceptual plays on words, consists in playing upon how bad words are at maintaining a full sense. It's this 'bit-of-sense', as such, that is taken up, and it's here that something occurs that reduces the message to its scope, insofar as the message is both a success and a failure, but always a form necessary for any formulation of a demand. The message questions the Other over this bit-of-sense. The dimension of the Other is essential here.

Freud dwells on the fact, as if it were something completely primordial that pertains to the very nature of jokes, that no joke exists in isolation. Even if we have forged it or invented it ourselves, even if the joke is our own invention and it's not that the joke invented us, we feel the need to put it to the Other. A joke is indissociable from the Other, who is charged with authenticating it.

What is this Other? Why this Other? What is this need for the Other? I don't know whether we will have enough time today to 98 define it and establish its structure and limits, but, at the point we have come to, I would simply say this. What in a joke is communicated to the Other essentially plays out, in a manner that is particularly cunning, along the dimension of this bit-of-sense. We need to keep in full view here the nature of what is at issue. A Witz is never about provoking the pathetic invocation of some fundamental absurdity like the one I was alluding to before when I referred to the work of one of the Great Woolly Thinkers of our time. It's always a matter of suggesting the dimension of the bit-of-sense by questioning value as such and by summoning it, as it were, to realize its value dimension, reveal itself as true value. Note that this is a ruse of language, for the more value reveals itself as true value, the more it will reveal itself to be supported by what I am calling the bit-of-sense. It can only respond in the sense of the bit-of-sense, and this is where the nature of the message specific to a joke lies, that is, that by which here at the level of the message I resume, with the Other, the interrupted path of metonymy, and ask it this question – 'What does that all mean?'

A joke is only complete once it gets beyond this point – that is, only after the Other has taken the joke on board, responded to it and authenticated it as a joke. A joke requires that the Other has perceived what is there as a demand for sense – that is, as an evocation of a sense that lies beyond – in this vehicle for this question about the bit-of-sense. In all of that, something marked by the sign of the Other has effectively remained. This sign marks every formulation of desire with its profound ambiguity, above all linking desire, as such, to the necessities and ambiguities of a signifier, to homonymy – that is, to homophony. The Other replies to this on the upper circuit, which goes from A to the message, by authenticating . . . but what?

Shall we say that it authenticates whatever nonsense it contains? Here too I'm going to insist. I don't think it's necessary to maintain this term 'nonsense', which only makes sense from the perspective of reason or critique, that is, of precisely what is avoided in this circuit.

I propose the formula 'step-of-sense', 'pas-de-sens' – just as one says 'pas de vis', screw thread, 'pas de quatre', four step, 'Pas-de-Suse', the Pass of Susa, or the 'Pas de Calais', the Strait of Dover.

This step-of-sense is, strictly speaking, what is actualized in metaphor. It's the subject's intention, his need, which introduces the 'step-of-sense' into metaphors beyond metonymic use and beyond anything commensurable, beyond any received values to be satisfied. Removing one element from its place and substituting another – I would almost say any other – for it, introduces this 'beyond need' in relation to every formulated desire, which is always at the origin of metaphor.

What do witticisms have to do with this? They indicate nothing more than the very dimension of the 'step' as such, strictly speaking. This is the form of the 'step', as it were. It's the 'step' voided of every kind of need. It's where what, in a witticism, can nevertheless manifest what is latent in my desire in me, and it's something that may resonate in the Other, though not necessarily. What's important in witticisms is that the dimension of the 'step-of-sense' be picked up and authenticated.

This is what displacement corresponds to. Novelty only emerges beyond the object at the same time as the step-of-sense does, and at the same time for both subjects. There's a subject and there's the Other. It's the subject who addresses the Other, who communicates the novelty to him as a joke. He travels along the segment of the metonymic dimension, he then gets the bit-of-sense received as such, the Other authenticates the step-of-sense within it, and pleasure is released for the subject.

The subject reaps pleasure inasmuch as he has succeeded in surprising the Other with his joke – and, indeed, this is the same original pleasure that the infantile, mythical, archaic, primordial subject I mentioned before obtains from his first use of signifiers.

I'll stop at this point. I hope it doesn't seem too artificial or too pedantic to you. My apologies to anyone who gets a headache from these sorts of little exercises on the high wire, not that I believe you incapable of grasping these things mentally. I don't think that what Kant calls your Mutterwitz, your good sense, is so degraded by the medical, psychological, analytic and whatever other studies you've pursued that you are incapable of following me down these paths with some simple allusions. Nevertheless, the laws of my teaching don't render the dismantling, one way or another, of these stages or essential moments in the progress of subjectivity in jokes off limits.

'Subjectivity' – that's the word I come to now, because up till the present day, and even still today, while working through the signifiers' pathways with you, something has been missing in the midst of it all – and not without reason, as you will see. It's not for nothing that in the midst of it all, today, we only ever find quasi-absent subjects, various kinds of support for using signifiers to put the ball back in the other's court. And yet, what is more essential to the dimension of jokes than subjectivity?

100 When I say 'subjectivity', I am saying that nowhere can the purpose of a joke be grasped. Even what a joke designates beyond what it expresses, even the feature of essential, internal allusion is an allusion to nothing other than the necessary requirement of the step-of-sense. And yet, in this total absence of a purpose, something ultimately underpins the joke, which is the liveliest of the lively, the most embraced of the embraced, and which makes it such a subjective thing. As Freud says somewhere, there is an essential subjective conditionality here, and the word 'sovereign' is here, emerging between the lines. 'The only joke', he says, in one of these formulas whose acerbic character can be found in almost no other literary author – I've never seen this comment made by anyone else – 'The only joke is one that I myself recognize as a joke.'

And yet I need the other. The entire chapter following the one on 'The Mechanism of Pleasure', which I have been speaking about today, namely, 'The Motives of Jokes – Jokes as a Social Process' – it has been translated into French as 'mobiles', I have never understood why – has this other as an essential reference. There is no pleasure in a joke without this other, who is there also as a subject. Everything comes back to the relations between two subjects, the one Freud calls the first person of a joke, the one who makes it, and the one to whom, he says, it's absolutely essential that it be communicated [SE 8: 100].

What sort of other does this suggest? To say it here and now, at this level the other, with its characteristic features that are ungraspable anywhere else with such clarity, is strictly speaking what I am calling the Other with a capital O.

I hope to show you this next time.

WHOAH, NEDDY!

Exorcizing the topic of thought
Queneau tells a joke
The joke machine
The Other between the real and the symbolic Being of like mind

I have some very important things to tell you today.

I ended last time on the subject's role in jokes, giving full weight to the word 'subject'. I am hoping that, on the grounds that we use it here, it has not become something that you wipe your feet on. When one uses the word 'subject', it generally carries lively, very personal and sometimes emotional reactions from those who cleave above all to objectivity.

Also, we had come to this sort of point of intersection located here at what I call A – that is, the Other. As the locus of the code, it is the locus that a message in the form of a joke reaches by following the path on our schema that goes from the message to the Other where the simple succession of signifiers in a chain, as the foundation of what is produced at the level of discourse, gets registered. At this level the essential something I have been calling 'the bit-of-sense' issues from the text of the sentence.

Last time I mentioned, without dwelling on it, the Other's confirmation of the bit-of-sense in a sentence, which is always more or less apparent in a joke. I limited myself to saying that what is transmitted from the Other, here [at A], in the circle that comes back to the level of the message, confirms the message and constitutes the joke, inasmuch as the Other, having received what is presented as a bit-of-sense, transforms it into what I have called, in an equivocal and ambiguous manner, the 'step-of-sense'.

What I stressed thereby is neither the absence of sense nor nonsense, but exactly the step that corresponds to a glimpse into what 102 sense reveals about its own procedure and what is always metaphorical and allusive in it. Thus it is that, once need has been through the dialectic of demand introduced by the existence of signifiers, it is never encountered again. Everything that is language proceeds via a series of steps like those of Achilles who never catches up to the tortoise – it aims at re-creating a full sense which, however, it never achieves, which is always somewhere else.

This is the schema I came to in the final quarter of an hour of our last session. It seems my discourse flagged a little. From what some people told me, I wasn't finishing sentences. And yet, when I read my text, I didn't find they lacked a tail. Because I am trying to project myself into something difficult to communicate step by step, there will necessarily be some stumbling. My apologies if it happens again today.

We have come to the point where we need to enquire into the Other's function and, in a word, essence, at this intersection that I have designated quite well by calling it the 'step-of-sense'.

This step-of-sense is in some ways a partial retrieval of the ideal plenitude, purely and simply realized, of demand, which is where we started from as the point of departure of our dialectic. By what transmutation, transubstantiation or subtle operation of communion, as it were, can this step-of-sense be embraced by the Other? What is this Other?

Our enquiry bears upon this junction that is indicated well enough by Freud's problematic when he speaks about jokes with that capacity he has to leave the question in suspense, and which means that, undeniably, of all the varied attempts carried out over the course of ages to get a good grip on the mystery-question of jokes – however many of these attempts I read, and I haven't held back, and whichever author I turn to, even going back to the fertile Romantic period – I truly see no one who has brought together even the most basic, material elements of the question.

Consider this, for instance, which Freud thinks about. On the one hand, he says, with that sovereign tone of his that cuts through the ordinary, blushing timidity of scientific discourse, 'The only joke 103 is one that I recognize is a joke.' It's what he calls the irreducible 'subjective conditionality' of jokes. Indeed, it is the subject who is speaking there, Freud says. On the other hand, he highlights the fact that as soon as I am in possession of something that qualifies as a joke, I am all in a hurry to try it out on the Other – and, what's more, to provide him with the context. This is even a condition for me to be able to enjoy its pleasure to the full. And it would not be difficult for me to reveal the play of mirrors in the background whereby, when I tell a joke – if I really am seeking the culmination, repose and acceptance of my pleasure in the Other's consent – the possibility remains on the horizon that this Other will recount the joke in turn, transmit it to others and so on and so on.

Let's grab the dilemma by the horns. On the one hand, the only joke is one that I myself experience as one. But, on the other, nothing in my acceptance of it is in any way sufficient in this respect – the pleasure in a joke is only complete in the Other and through the Other. Let's say – on condition that we pay careful attention to what we say and don't imply any simplification by this term – that a joke has to be communicated. This assumes that at the end of the communication we leave an opening without knowing what may come and fill it.

Freud's observation, then, confronts us with an essential question, which we have come across before. What is this Other which, in some way, is the subject's correlate? We find affirmation of this correlation here in what is a real need inscribed in the phenomenon. But we are already familiar with the form of this relation between subject and Other, and have been ever since we insisted, here, on the necessary form in which our reflection proposes the term 'subjectivity' to us.

I have alluded to the sort of objection that might occur to minds trained in a certain discipline, and which, on the grounds that psychoanalysis presents itself as a science, would introduce the requirement that we only ever speak of things that are objectifiable, namely, things on which experience can agree. Simply by virtue of speaking about the subject, analytic experience supposedly becomes something subjective and non-scientific. Implied in the term 'subject' is the notion, which at a certain level is a good one, that what is there underneath the object – which makes it possible to give the object support and which, also, lies beyond the object as well as behind it – presents us with a sort of unknowable substance, something resistant to objectification, which your education and psychological training has given you the arms to fight against. This naturally leads to other forms of objection that are even more crude.
I want to mention the identification of the term 'subjective' with the 104 distorting effects of feelings about the experience of another person, and also introduce, moreover, some kind of mirage of transparency that founds the subject on the immanence of consciousness itself which people rely on a little too quickly to sum up the theme of the Cartesian cogito. In short, a series of entanglements. They are only there to get between us and what we are describing when we bring the subjectivity in our experience into play.

Subjectivity cannot be eliminated from our experience as analysts. The concept is confirmed in a way that completely bypasses the ways in which one could object to it. As an analyst, just as for anyone who goes down the path of a certain dialogue, one has to take subjectivity into consideration in one's calculations when dealing with the other who is capable of introducing errors of his own into his own calculations, and not try to provoke them, as such. I give you this formula, and it clearly expresses something tangible that even a passing reference to chess, or even to the game of odds and evens, suffices to confirm.

When we express it in these terms, subjectivity seems to appear in two ways – there is no point in going back over all this here, I have already emphasized it elsewhere. It certainly seems to me that subjectivity can be seen reflected in what is produced whenever there is confrontation or camouflage in either fight or display. I illustrated this in its day with some ethological examples that I don't think I need return to. Fighting between animals, even display between the sexes, present us with phenomena of reciprocal approaching and fascinating erection in which a sort of natural coaptation is apparent. One thus observes forms of conduct that are reciprocal in nature and that tend towards an embrace – therefore, at the motor level called behaviourist. The spectacle of an animal that appears to be performing a dance is very striking.

This is also what, in this case, leaves something ambiguous in the notion of intersubjectivity, which, having briefly emerged from the opposition between two subjects, as it were, is liable to disappear again in an attempt at objectification. The reciprocal fascination can very easily be thought of merely as subject to a cyclical regulation isolatable in the instinctual process, which, following an appetitive stage, enables consummation to be achieved and the sought-for end to be reached. We can reduce everything here to an innate mechanism of relays, to the point where it fades into the general obscurity of the teleology of living things.

This is all completely different once we introduce any resistances whatsoever, in the form of a signifying chain, into the problem.
105 The signifying chain as such introduces an essential heterogeneity here. Hear 'heterogeneity' with the emphasis on 'heteros', which signifies 'inspired' in Greek, and whose true acceptation in Latin is remainder, residue. Once we bring signifiers into play, as soon as two subjects address one another and relate to one another through the intermediary of a signifying chain, there is a remainder, and the kind of subjectivity that is established is of another order, inasmuch as it refers to the locus of truth as such.

Consequently, my behaviour is no longer deceptive but provocative. The A is included in it, and this means that even a lie has to appeal to truth and that the truth itself may seem not to be in the register of truth. Recall this example, 'Why do you tell me you are going to Cracow when you really are going to Cracow?' This can mean that truth has need of lies. Later, when I lay my cards on the table, my good faith makes me reliant on the Other's evaluation insofar as he may be planning to take my strategy by surprise even as I am in the process of showing it to him. The detection of bluffing and deception is also at the mercy of the Other's bad faith.

These essential dimensions are apparent in simple experiences of everyday life. However, even though they are woven into our daily life, we will be no less inclined to avoid them as long as analytic experience and Freud's position have not shown us this hetero-dimension of signifiers at play on their own, autonomously. As long as we have not felt this and become aware of it, we will not fail to think that signifiers are there to serve the outpourings of consciousness.

Freud's entire thought is rife with the heterogeneity of the ways signifiers function – namely, with the radical character of the speaking subject's relation to the Other. Now, prior to Freud, this relation was hidden by the fact that we took for granted that the subject speaks, as it were, according to his good or bad consciousness, that he never speaks without intending a meaning, and that his intention lies behind his lying – or his sincerity, it makes no difference. Now, this intention is equally ridiculous whether the subject thinks he is lying or telling the truth, for he is deluding himself no less in his efforts to confess than in his efforts to deceive.

Until now intention has been confused with the dimension of consciousness, because it seemed that consciousness was inherent in what the subject has to say in terms of signification.

The least one could take for granted till now was that a subject always had a meaning to state, and that as a consequence consciousness was inherent in it. Objections to the idea of the Freudian 106 unconscious have always found their last resort here. How could the existence of Traumgedanken [dream-thoughts] have been foreseen before Freud, dream-thoughts such as he presents to us, thoughts that our usual intuitions understand as thoughts that are not thoughts? This is why we now need to carry out a veritable exorcism of the topic of thought.

If the topic of the Cartesian cogito clearly is still so powerful, its harmfulness, as it were, derives from the fact that it is always inflected. This 'I am thinking, therefore I am' is difficult to grasp at the height of its mainspring – and anyway perhaps it is only a joke.

But let's leave that alone, for we are not at the point of displaying the relations philosophy has with jokes. The Cartesian cogito is not effectively experienced in each of us as an 'I am thinking, therefore I am', but as an 'I am as I think', which naturally assumes, behind it, an 'I think as I breathe'.

One only need, on this matter, engage in the slightest of reflective experiences on what supports the mental activity of those around us. Since we are scientists, let me speak of those who are dedicated to doing major scientific work. We can very readily form the impression that there are, on average, probably not all that many more thoughts in action in this cogitating body overall than there are in that of any hardworking cleaning lady beset by the most immediate necessities for her subsistence. In itself thought has absolutely nothing to do with the significance of the discourse conveyed. Moreover, the more consistent and coherent the discourse is, the more it appears to lend itself to all sorts of gaps with respect to what can be reasonably defined as a question posed by the subject to his existence as a subject.

At the end of the day, we are confronted with the following, which is that a subject thinks in us, and thinks according to laws that turn out to be the same as those that organize the signifying chain. This signifier-in-action in us is called the unconscious. It was named as such by Freud. And it is so original, so separate from anything at work in our tendencies that Freud repeats to us in a thousand different ways that it involves another psychical scene. This term is repeated at every turn in the Traumdeutung.

Freud actually borrowed this term from Fechner, and I have already had occasion to emphasize the uniqueness of the Fechnerian context, which is far from being reducible to the observation of psychophysical parallelism, or even to the strange extrapolations he went in for regarding the existence, which he affirms, of the domain of consciousness. The term 'other psychical scene' that Freud borrows from his thorough reading of Fechner is always cor-107 related by him with the strict heterogeneity of the laws concerning the unconscious in comparison with everything that can be referred to in the domain of the preconscious, that is, in the domain of the comprehensible, of meaning.

The Other that's at issue, which Freud also calls 'reference of the psychical scene' concerning jokes, is the one that today we have to question. It is the one that Freud constantly brings us back to concerning the pathways and the very process of jokes.

There is no possibility, for us, he notes, of a joke emerging without an element of surprise. It is even more striking in German – 'Seine volle Wirkung auf den Hörer nur zu äussern, wenn er ihm neu ist, ihm als Überraschung ehtgegentritt.' This can be translated as: 'They only produce their full effect on the hearer if they are new to him, if they come as a surprise to him' [SE 8: 154].

There is something that must render the subject foreign to the immediate content of the sentence, and that is sometimes presented by means of what looks like nonsense. This is the nonsense in relation to signification which makes you say momentarily, 'I don't understand, I am confused, this sentence has no real content', marking a break in the subject's assent in relation to what he accepts. That's the first stage, Freud tells us, in the natural preparation for a joke, which will subsequently constitute a sort of pleasure-generator, a 'pleasurogenic'.

What is going on at this level? What is the order of the Other that is invoked in the subject? Since there is, also, something immediate in the subject that one does by means of a joke, the technique of this movement must tell us something about what mode of the Other has to be struck here in the subject.

This is what we are going to think about today.

I have only referred to jokes related by Freud himself till now, or almost only. I am now going to introduce a joke that has a different provenance. It hasn't been specially chosen, either. When I decided to explore the question of Witz or wit* with you this year, I carried out a small investigation. It will come as no surprise at all that I began by questioning a poet. It was a poet who introduces the dimension of an especially playful wit that runs through his work, as much through his prose as through more poetic forms, and it's a wit that he brings even when he happens to be talking about mathematics, for he is also a mathematician. I am referring to Raymond Queneau. 108

When we were having our first exchange of remarks on the matter he told me a joke. It's not only in analytic experience itself that things that fit like a glove come one's way. Having spent an entire year talking to you about the signifying function of horses, here, once again, we have a horse making its way into our field of attention in quite a curious way.

The joke that Queneau told me is not one that you will know. He took it as an example of what we might call long jokes as opposed to short jokes. This is, to be sure, very much an initial classification. 'Brevity', Jean-Paul Richter, quoted by Freud, says somewhere, 'is the body and soul of wit', to which we can add the sentence in Hamlet where it is said that if brevity is 'the soul of wit', 'tediousness' is no less 'its limbs and outward flourishes' [SE 8: 13]. Both things are true; both authors knew what they were talking about. You'll see whether the term 'long joke' is appropriate here, for there is a witticism in there somewhere.

Here, then, is the joke. It's a joke about exams, about university entrance exams, if you will. We have a candidate and we have an examiner.

'Tell me', says the examiner, 'about the battle of Marengo.'

The candidate pauses for a moment, with a dreamy air. 'The battle of Marengo . . . ? Bodies everywhere! It's terrible . . . Wounded everywhere! It's horrible . . . '

'But', says the examiner, 'can't you tell me anything more precise about this battle?'

The candidate thinks for a moment, then replies, 'A horse rears and whinnies.'

The examiner, surprised, seeks to test him a little further and says, 'In that case, can you tell me about the battle of Fontenoy?'

'The battle of Fontenoy? . . . Dead soldiers, wounded soldiers! Everywhere! All of that, and more.'

The examiner, interested, says, 'But, young man, could you give me some more precise details about this battle of Fontenoy?'

'Oh!' says the candidate. 'A horse rears and whinnies.'

The examiner, strategically, asks the candidate to talk about the battle of Trafalgar. The candidate replies, 'Dead everywhere! A bloodbath . . . Wounded everywhere! Hundreds of them . . . '

'But, my good man, can't you tell me anything more precise about this battle?'

109 'A horse –'

'Excuse me, I would have you note that the battle of Trafalgar was a naval battle.'

'Whoah! Whoah!' says the candidate. 'Back up, Neddy!'

To my mind, the value of this joke is that it enables us to dismantle, I believe, what is going on in a joke.

I think that the entirety of the joke's wittiness lies in its punchline. There would be no reason for the tale itself to come to an end, were it to consist solely of this kind of playing or sparring in which two interlocutors are opposed – and, moreover, no matter how far you extend it, the effect is produced immediately.

Prior to the punchline, this is a joke that makes us laugh because it is comical. I don't want to go any deeper into the question of the comic, because so many enormous and particularly obscure things have been proffered on this matter, ever since Mr Bergson wrote a book on laughter about which the only thing that can be said is that it is readable.

What does the comic consist in? For the moment let's just limit ourselves to the observation that it is bound up with a dual situation. It is because the candidate is there with the examiner that this joust unfolds in which their arms are obviously so radically different and also that this something liable to produce in us what we call 'lively amusement' is created. Is it the subject's lack of knowledge that makes us laugh? I am not convinced. Obviously, the fact that he produces these first truths about what can be called a battle, which no one ever mentions, at least not when taking a history exam, ought to give us pause for a moment's thought. But we can't go into that, for it would take us into questions concerning the nature of the comic, and I do not know whether we will have the opportunity to go there, unless it is to complete our examination of Freud's book.

This book effectively ends with a chapter on the comic in which it is striking to see Freud suddenly miles below his usual perspicacity, so much so that the question is rather why he says nothing more than the worst of authors focused on the most elementary notion of the comic and why in some ways he refused to do more. This will no doubt make us more indulgent towards our psychoanalytic colleagues who also lack a sense of the comic, to the point where it seems to be ruled out for anyone exercising the profession.

Insofar as we experience a lively comical effect with this joke, the comic concerns the preliminary part about the battles. It's against 110 this background that the punchline comes, which makes the joke witty in the strict sense of the term.

Please note the following. Even if some of you are not particularly receptive to what makes this joke witty, there is wit there nevertheless. It is lurking there at one point, namely the point at which it suddenly breaks free from the constraints of the format and the candidate does something that is almost unbelievable if we were to put ourselves momentarily in a position where we situated this joke in a real-life context. The subject all of a sudden seems to be leaning back and pulling on the reins. It's an image that in a flash takes on an almost phobic value. The moment is in any case of a kind, or so it seems, with what can be drawn from various childhood experiences beginning with phobias and extending to all sorts of excesses of imaginary life that we have such difficulty fathoming. It is not so rare to see reports, in recollections from a subject's life, of attraction to a big horse, or an image of this same horse descending from tapestries, or this horse entering a dormitory where the subject is there with fifty friends. The punchline therefore turns us into observers of the sudden emergence in this joke of the signifying fantasy of the horse.

Call this joke what you will, comical or poetic, but it surely deserves to be called witty, if, as Freud says, you are the final arbiter. Consequently, we may call it a funny story. It is, nevertheless, true that we are no longer surprised by the fact that its content coincides with an image borrowed from an observed and recognized form at the level of unconscious phenomena.

Moreover, the fact that this aspect of it is so clear is what gives the story its value. Am I saying that this is sufficient to make it a joke?

Here, then, are these two moments, broken down into what I will call its preparation and its punchline. Are we going to leave it there? We could leave it there at the level of what can be called the Freudian analysis of Witz. We would have no more difficulty, I think, highlighting these two moments or aspects of the phenomenon in another joke, but here they are especially distinct.

What makes the thing not simply poetical or funny but truly witty in character follows the retrograde or retroactive path of what in our schema I call the 'step-of-sense'. However elusive or ungraspable the punchline of this joke is, it is nevertheless heading towards something. It's perhaps forcing things a little bit, no doubt, to spell it out, but so as to indicate this direction, I am going to have to do 111 it nevertheless – the specific feature to which the subject returns with the sort of insistence that in another context would no longer be wit but humour, namely this horse rearing and whinnying, but that may be what we truly relish in the joke.

Of all the history that we have integrated into our experience, formation and culture, let's say that this image here is the most essential of all. We cannot take more than three steps in a museum and look at the paintings of battles without seeing this horse up on its hind legs, whinnying. The horse entered the history of war with a certain splendour. The moment at which men sat astride this animal was a milestone. At the time, with the Achaeans' arrival on horseback, this brought real and enormous progress. These men suddenly had an extraordinary tactical superiority in comparison with horses harnessed to chariots – right up to the First World War when the horse disappeared, when it was rendered practically obsolete by other weapons. Thus, from the Achaean period to the First World War, the horse was effectively something absolutely essential to this interhuman commerce known as war.

The fact that it has consequently been the central image of certain conceptions of history that we can bring together under the rubric of battle history is a phenomenon whose significant character we are inclined to have a liking for, to the extent that this age has passed and has been progressively purified as the discipline of history has advanced. Ultimately, an entire history is summed up in that image, which strikes us as futile in the light of this funny story. The indication of meaning that it harbours implies that in the end there is no real need to worry oneself over a battle, neither Marengo, nor Fontenoy, perhaps with a little more justification concerning Trafalgar.

Of course, none of this is there in the story. There is no question of extracting any wise lessons concerning the teaching of history. It doesn't teach but shows that the step-of-sense tends in the direction of a reduction in the value, an exorcism, of this fascinating element.

In what sense does this story act? And in what sense does it satisfy us, in what sense does it give us pleasure?

Introducing signifiers into our significations leaves a margin that makes us remain in bondage to them. Something escapes us beyond the bonds that the chain of signifiers maintains for us. The simple fact that this refrain that is repeated from the start of the joke – namely, 'The dead! The wounded!' – makes us laugh is indication enough of the extent to which we are refused access to reality as soon as we penetrate it by means of signifiers.

This joke will simply serve as a point of reference here. Freud 112 stresses that whenever it is a matter of the transmission of a joke and the satisfaction it is capable of bringing, there are always three people involved. The comic can make do with a play between two. In the case of a joke there are three. The Other, who is the second, is located in different places. He is sometimes the second person in the story, without our knowing, and without our even needing to know, whether it is the schoolboy or the examiner. He is also you, when I am recounting it to you.

Effectively, during the first part it is necessary for you to allow yourself to be taken for a bit of a ride. At first the joke elicits your various sympathies, either for the candidate or for the examiner, and it fascinates you or it makes you hostile – although really what is drawn upon in this joke is not so much our hostility as a certain captivation by the game the candidate is engaged in with the examiner, where the latter has a surprise in store for him. The same game is also sketched out in other kinds of tendentious jokes of a smutty or sexual kind. In fact, it's not so much a matter of getting around whatever resistance and repugnance lies within you as it is, on the contrary, of starting to activate it. Far from extinguishing something in you that you might object to, if a good joke is going to be smutty, there is already something at the start that will indicate to you that we are entering this domain. And so you prepare yourself either to consent or resist, but there is certainly something in you that emerges at the dual level. This is how, here, you let yourself get caught up in the prestige and display aspect foreshadowed by the register and the order of the joke.

Of course, what arrives unexpectedly at the end is invariably located on the plane of language. The playful side of words is developed much further here and is even so dismantled that we see, on the one hand, a pure signifier, the horse as it happens, and, on the other, the playful element in signifiers which presents itself in the form of a cliché that is much more difficult to locate, but where it is nevertheless obvious that that is all the joke contains. What surprises you is the fundamental equivocation, the passage from one meaning to another through the intermediary of the support of signifiers, as the examples I have previously given indicate. There's a hole here that makes you wait for the stage at which it hits you that what is being communicated is a joke.

As a general rule, it always hits you at a different spot from the place your attention – or agreement or opposition – has initially been attracted to and lured by, and this occurs whatever effects are at play, such as nonsense effects, comical effects or effects of smutty participation in a sexually exciting narration. Let's say that 113 this dual game is only ever a preparation, one that enables both what is always imaginary, reflexive and collusive in the communication, and the bringing into play of a certain tendency in which the subject is the second person to be separated into two opposing poles. This is no more than the joke's support. Similarly, everything that attracts the subject's attention and everything that is alert at the level of consciousness is only the base whose role is to enable the move onto another plane, which is always present as more or less enigmatic. This is where the surprise occurs, and it's here, then, that we find ourselves at the level of the unconscious.

Given that the issue is always bound up with the mechanism of language on a plane on which the Other seeks and is sought, on which the Other is joined, on which the Other is the aim and on which the Other is reached by means of a joke – given this, how should we define this Other?

Let's pause for a moment at our schema and say some very simple things, some first truths.

You can use this schema as a grid or framework for locating the signifying elements as such. When we take the various modes or forms that establish the basis for our classifications of jokes, we find ourselves led to enumerate something like the following – word plays, puns in the strict sense, word plays via transposition or displacement of meaning and jokes via transposition or displacement of meaning, jokes via a small modification to a word that is sufficient to throw light on something and bring out an unexpected dimension. Whatever classificatory elements we choose, we tend, along with Freud, to reduce them to terms that are recorded in the register of signifiers. Imagine, then, a machine.

This machine is located somewhere at A or M. It receives data from both sides. It has the capability to dismantle the means of access by which both the construction of the term 'famillionaire' and the passage from the Golden Calf to the butcher's veal are achieved. Let's suppose that it is sufficiently complex for an exhaustive analysis of the signifiers' components. Will it be up to the task of authenticating a joke, as such? Of calculating and replying, 'This is a joke'? That is, of ratifying a message in relation to the code correctly, so that we remain within the limits, at least the possible limits, of what we call a joke?

I am producing this imaginary machine for purely humorous reasons, and it goes without saying that there's no question of 114 making one. But what does that mean? Is it enough to say that we have to be in the presence of a person? That may be self-evident, and we're quite happy with that. Saying so corresponds to experience more or less, overall. But given that the unconscious exists for us, with its enigma, 'a person' is a response that needs to be broken down.

We can start by saying that we have to be in the presence of a real subject. It's effectively in meaning, in a direction for meaning, that jokes play their part. Now, as we have already indicated, this meaning is only conceivable in relation to the interaction between a signifier and a need. Therefore, the absence of the dimension of need in a machine is an objection and an obstacle to its ratifying a joke in any way at all.

Is it possible for us to say, though, that this real subject has to have needs that are homogeneous with our own? It is not necessarily assumed that we must impose this requirement from the outset of our exercise. Effectively, the need is nowhere designated in jokes. On the contrary, jokes point to the distance that exists between a need and whatever is put into play in a discourse. Whatever is articulated in a discourse takes us, by virtue of this very fact, to a series of reactions that is an infinity away from what a need is, strictly speaking.

Here, then, is an initial definition – the subject must be a real subject. God, animal or man? We have no idea!

What I am saying is so true that stories about the supernatural, which do not exist for no reason in human folklore, in no way exclude the possibility of making a joke with fairies or devils, namely with a subject said to have quite different relations, in its own reality, from those defined by human needs. You will tell me no doubt that these verbal beings, beings of thought, are nevertheless fabricated out of human images. I don't disagree, and indeed that's the issue. Effectively, we find ourselves between the following two elements. First, having dealings with a real subject, namely a living subject. Second, a living subject that understands language and, moreover, that possesses a stock of what is verbally exchanged – usages, uses, locutions, terms – without which there would be no question of entering into communication with him via language.

What do jokes suggest to us and in some way put us in touch with?

Bear in mind that these images are present in the human economy in a disconnected way, with an apparent freedom between them which makes possible all kinds of coalescences, exchanges, condensations and displacements, the juggling that we see at the origin of so many manifestations that make for the richness and heterogeneity of the human world in relation to biological reality. From an analytic perspective, we very often inscribe this freedom in a system of reference that leads us to consider it as being conditioned by an initial lesion concerning the interrelationship between man and his entourage, which I have attempted to designate by the prematurity of birth, and which means that it is via the image of the other that man finds unification of his movements, even the most elementary of them. Whether this starts here or somewhere else, what is certain is that these images, in their characteristic state of anarchy in the human order, in the human species, are activated, caught up in and used through the operation of signifiers. This is the way in which they enter into what's involved in a joke.

It is these images, which have become more or less everyday signifying elements, more or less ratified in what I have called the metonymic treasure trove, that are at play in jokes. It's the Other that possesses this treasure trove. It is assumed that the Other knows the multiplicity of signifying combinations, moreover completely abridged, elided and, let's say, even purified with respect to their signification. All metaphorical implications are already piled up and compressed in language. It's a matter of everything that language bears within itself, which manifests itself at moments of significant creation and is already there, latent, in a non-active state. That's what I am invoking in a joke, that's what I am seeking to awaken in the Other and in some way I am relying on the Other to support it. In a word, I only ever address the Other by assuming that what I bring into play in my joke is already contained in it.

Take one of Freud's examples. It's a quip by a witty man, famous in Viennese society, about a bad writer who floods the newspapers with his idle and interminable output on Napoleon and his descendants. As this writer has the particular physical characteristic of being a redhead, our wit skewers him with the words 'rote Fadian', which signifies that he's redheaded and that he speaks drivel, 'rouquin filandreux', as it has been translated into French [SE 8: 22ff].

What makes the joke a joke is the reference to the red thread, 'roter Faden', a metaphor which is itself poetical and which, as you know, Goethe borrowed from a practice of the British Navy. The red thread effectively makes it possible to recognize the smallest piece of rope, even and above all stolen rope, stolen from vessels of His British Majesty at a time when sailing ships used rope a lot. This red thread definitively authenticated ownership of the material. The metaphor is certainly more famous for German-speaking subjects 116 than it may be for us, but I suppose that quite a number of you are familiar, at least via this quotation, and perhaps even without being aware that you are, with this passage from Elective Affinities. This retort, very much in the style of the time, which was found very funny at a particular moment and in a particular context referred to as cultural, whether rightly or wrongly, lodges itself in the play between the red thread and the ropey character who utters banalities. This is what makes something work as a successful wisecrack or joke. That's where I'm going with this.

Freud says somewhere that something that finds satisfaction under the cover of wit is the subject's aggressive tendency – otherwise it would never show itself. One would not allow oneself to be so rude about a literary colleague. It is only possible under the cover of wit. That's just one aspect of the question, but it is obvious that there is a very great difference between purely and simply proffering an insult and expressing oneself in this register, for in expressing oneself in this register one is appealing to all sorts of things in the Other that are supposedly part of its usage, of its most everyday code.

I chose this example to give you a perspective taken from a specific moment in the history of Viennese society. In this context, reference to Goethe's red thread is immediately accessible to everybody, and up to a point it flatters the desire for recognition in all of us by offering us a shared symbol we are all familiar with.

There's also something else indicated in the tendency of this joke that calls into question not only the person ridiculed but also a very particular value in the social order. As Freud emphasizes, the essayist who approaches history from the perspective of anecdotes has a habit of including basic ideas in which the author's own insufficiencies, the poverty of his categories and even the laziness of his writing are only too apparent. In short, it's a confused style at the borders of history that he is taking aim at here, one whose writings clutter the newspapers of the day. Undoubtedly, this tendency, quite well characterized in this joke, is not over, is not finished, but still it is what gives this joke its value and its impact.

We are, then, in a position to say that far from its being the case that the subject here with us has to be a real living creature, this Other is essentially a symbolic locus.

The Other is the locus of the treasure trove of, let's say, the sen-117 tences or even the received ideas without which jokes cannot have value or impact. But at the same time let's observe that no particular signification is emphasized therein. On the contrary, this common treasure trove of categories presents a characteristic that we can describe as abstract. I am alluding here very precisely to this element of transmission which makes it the case that there is something there that, in a way, is supra-individual, and that is tied by an absolutely undeniable community to everything that has been in preparation ever since the origins of culture. What one is addressing when one attacks a subject at the level of the equivocations of signifiers has, as it were, a singularly immortal characteristic. This is really the other term of the question.

The question of knowing who the Other is arises between two poles. For us this Other has to be a real, living being, one made of flesh, even though it is not his flesh that I'm arousing. But, on the other hand, there is also something quasi anonymous, which is present in what I refer to as I reach out to him and arouse his pleasure at the same time as my own.

What is the mainspring that lies there between the two poles of the real and the symbolic? It's the function of the Other. It's this function that is, strictly speaking, brought into play. I have of course said enough about it to be able to say that this Other is the Other as the locus of signifiers, but I have only extracted a direction for meaning from this locus of signifiers, only a step-of-sense, which is where, in the final analysis, the active mainspring lies.

We may say that a joke appears like a Spanish inn here. Or, more exactly, it's the contrary of one, for in a Spanish inn you have to bring your own food and they bring you wine, whereas here I have to bring the wine of speech, since I won't find it here, even if – an image that is more or less comical and ridiculous – I were to consume my adversary.

The wine of speech is always present in everything I say. A joke is usually present, ambient in everything I recount as soon as I speak, for I necessarily speak in the double register of metonymy and metaphor. The bit-of-sense and the step-of-sense are always in the process of crossing over one another, just as a thousand shuttles cross back and forth, as Freud mentions in the Traumdeutung. But also, this wine of speech usually seeps into the sand. What is produced between the Other and me in a joke is, as it were, a very special communion between the bit-of-sense and the step-of-sense. This communion is no doubt more specifically humanizing than any other, but it is humanizing precisely because we begin at a level which, on both sides, is very inhuman.

If I invite the Other to this communion, it is because I have even 118 greater need of his assistance because he is the vase or Grail. This Grail is empty. I mean that I address nothing in the Other that is specified, nothing that unites us in any kind of communion that might lead to any kind of agreement in desire or judgement. It is solely a form.

By what is this form constituted? It is constituted by what is always at issue in jokes, what in Freud are called inhibitions. It is not for nothing that when I prepare a joke I evoke something in the Other that tends to set him in a certain direction. This is still nothing more than a shell in comparison with something more profoundly linked to the stock of metonyms without which, in this order, I am absolutely unable to communicate anything to the Other.

In other words, in order for a joke to make the Other laugh, as Bergson says somewhere, and it's the only good thing that there is in Laughter, you have to have a lot in common, you have to belong to the same church.

What does that mean? The very term 'paroisse', parish, is of no small help to our making progress in understanding the question. I do not know if you know what the origin of the word 'paroisse' is. It's quite unusual, but ever since etymologists turned their attention to the matter, they have been unable to learn by what miracle a thing that at the outset was 'parodia' – namely, people who are not from our house, I mean our house here on earth, who are from another world and who have their roots in another world, namely Christians, for the term appeared with Christianity – was, as it were, metaphorized by another term which recorded its signifying element in 'khi', which reappears in the Italian 'parrocchia'. This other term is the Greek 'πάροχος', which means the purveyor, the intendant to whom the functionaries of the Empire knew that they had to address themselves so as to procure from him pretty well everything that a functionary of the Empire might desire, and in the blessed days of the Pax Romana that could go a very long way indeed.

We are here, then, at the level designated by the ambiguous term 'paroisse', which clearly shows the limits of the field in which a joke will work. You can see that jokes don't have the same effect always and everywhere, since the one about the red thread has only a feeble effect upon you in comparison with the earlier joke about the candidate at an exam. Given that you are the public that you are, it was quite natural that something as much from our shared background as the baccalaureate or any other exam should be the kind of thing to serve as the container for what was being conveyed, namely a direction for meaning. Undoubtedly, inasmuch as this direction 119 doesn't result in any meaning, it is only the distance that always remains there between every actual meaning and what I could call an ideal of full-sense.

I would add one more play on words. The manner in which this Other is constituted at the level of a joke is something that we are familiar with from Freud's use – he calls it 'the censor' – which bears upon 'sense' or meaning. The Other is constituted as a filter that puts order into, and places an obstacle before, what can be accepted or simply even heard. There are things that cannot be heard, or which habitually are never heard any more, and which a joke strives to make heard somewhere, as an echo. To get them to be echoed back, it uses precisely the thing that forms an obstacle to it, like some sort of reflecting concavity. I had already come to this metaphor earlier, and something inside it was resisting, something that is comprised entirely of a series of imaginary crystallizations in the subject.

We are not surprised to see things occur at this level. The little other, to call him by his name, contributes to the possibility of a joke, but it's within the subject's resistance – which for once, and this is highly instructive for us, I am rather seeking to provoke – that something that makes itself heard will resonate much further, and this means that the joke will resonate directly in the unconscious.

Last time I spoke to you about the Grail. You are the Grail, which I'm solidifying by placing your contradictions on alert in all sorts of ways, with the aim of getting you to authenticate 'in spirit', so to speak, the fact that I am conveying this message to you. The essence of this Grail consists in its very defects.

Since it's always a good idea to go back over even the best understood of things, I am going to attempt to materialize on the blackboard what I was saying to you last time.

What I was saying to you last time was about the Other, this damned Other, who, when one communicates a Witz, completes and, in a way, fulfils the gap formed by the insolubility of desire. It can be said that a Witz restores an essentially unsatisfied demand its jouissance, under the double and moreover identical aspects of surprise and pleasure – the pleasure of surprise and the surprise in pleasure.

Last time I stressed the process of immobilizing the Other and forming what I called 'the empty Grail'. This is represented in Freud by what he calls the joke's 'façade' [SE 8: 55]. It diverts the Other's attention away from the path down which the joke is heading, it attaches the inhibition somewhere in order to leave another path open somewhere else for the witty words to take.

This, then, is more or less how the thing might be schematized. The path goes from speech, here condensed into a message, to the 122 Other to whom it is addressed. An obstacle, a gap or a flaw in the message is authenticated by the Other as a witticism, but it is thereby restored to the subject himself, and forms the indispensable complement to the desire specific to witticisms.

This, then, is the schema we have been using. The Other, the message, the I and the metonymic object are here [see the graphs on pages 10 and 80]. We have already covered these points, which I assume you know. The Other is indispensable for closing the loop that is discourse insofar as it arrives at the message in a position to satisfy, at least symbolically, the fundamentally insoluble character of demand as such. This circuit is the authentication by the Other of what is, in short, an allusion to the fact that once man enters the symbolic world no demand can be attained except through an infinite succession of steps-of-sense. By virtue of the fact that his desire is caught up in the mechanism of language, man, a new Achilles in search of another tortoise, is destined to this never-to-be-satisfied, infinite approach linked to the very mechanism of desire, which we shall simply call discursiveness.

While the Other is essential to the final, symbolically satisfying step, the instantaneous moment of a joke – when it comes off – it is nevertheless worth remembering that the Other also exists. He exists in the same way that what we call the subject exists, circulating somewhere as in the game of pass the parcel. Don't imagine that there is a subject at the start of need – need is not yet a subject. Where is he, then? Perhaps I can say more about this today.

The subject is the entire system and, perhaps, something in the system. The Other is the same, he is constructed in the same way, and this is why he is able to relay my discourse.

I am going to encounter certain specific conditions that will have to be representable on my schema if it is going to be of any use. These conditions are the ones we spoke about last time. Take note of the directions on the segments. Here there are vectors that go from the I towards the object and towards the Other [$\beta \rightarrow \beta'$, $\beta \rightarrow \alpha$], and vectors that go from the message towards the Other and towards the object [$\gamma \rightarrow \alpha$, $\gamma \rightarrow \beta'$], for there is a strong relationship of symmetry between the message and the I, just as there is clockwise [$\alpha \rightarrow \beta \rightarrow \beta'$], and again counter-clockwise [$\alpha \rightarrow \gamma \rightarrow \beta'$] between the Other as such, as locus of the treasure trove of metonymies, and the metonymic object itself, insofar as it is constituted in the system of metonymies.

What was it I explained to you last time concerning what I called the preparation for a joke? The best thing is sometimes not to prepare it – but it is clear that it is not a bad thing to do so. We only have to recall what happened when I didn't – you were left high and 123

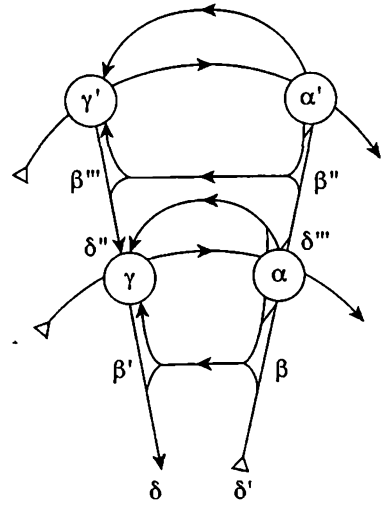
dry. Something as simple as the '-t' that I related to you one day seems to have left some of you stumped. If I had prepared you on the reciprocal attitudes of the little count and the well-bred young lady, perhaps you might have been sufficiently tantalized and the 'Ahhht' might have more easily overcome something. Because some of you were paying close attention, you took the time to understand. By contrast, last time you laughed much more easily at the joke about the horse because it included a lengthy preparation, and while you were having a good time with the candidate's remarks that struck you as marked by the powerful insolence that lingers at the bottom of ignorance, you were then quite well disposed to see this flying horse come in at the end of the joke and really give it its punchline.

What I produce with this preparation is the Other. This, of course, is what in Freud is called 'Hemmung', inhibition. This is merely the opposition that is the fundamental basis of the dual relation, and which, here, is comprised of all the objections you could make against what I was presenting as the object. That is quite natural, you were preparing yourself to be shocked by it, its approach and its pressure. What is organized in this way is what we habitually refer to as 'defence', which is the most elementary of forces. It is very much what is involved in these preludes that can be performed in a thousand ways. Non-sense sometimes plays the role of a prelude in the form of an inducement that draws the mental gaze in a certain direction. It is a lure in this sort of bullfight. Sometimes it's comical, sometimes obscene.

In effect, this is all about focusing the Other on an object. Let's say that, in the opposite sense to the metonymy of my discourse, it's a matter of bringing about a kind of fixation of the Other as discoursing on a particular metonymic object. In a way, this could be any object. It is not at all necessary that it have the slightest connection with my own inhibitions. It makes no difference, it will work with anything provided that the Other is occupied with some object at that particular moment. That is what I was explaining to you last time when I spoke about the imaginary solidification of the Other, which is the first position in making a witticism possible. 124

We must, then, find a place in our schema for the homologue of the object relation at the level of the Other, whom we are taking here as a subject, and this is why I am giving you another system, which I have drawn [see dotted lines]. I am plotting the homologue of the line that I call β - β', which is the I's relationship with the metonymic object for the first subject. I am thereby indicating the superimposition of the system of the Other subject onto the system of the first.



For the baton to be passed from the Other towards the message that authenticates a joke as a joke, it has to be bound up in its own system of signifiers, that is, as it were, the problem is referred back to him [the Other] in such a way that he himself, in his own system, authenticates the message as a joke.

In other words, my γ - α presupposes the inscription of a parallel γ' - α', which is just what is recorded on this schema. A requirement inherent in jokes gives them a theoretical perspective of reproduction ad infinitum, given that a good joke is made for being recounted and is not complete until it has been recounted and others have laughed at it. The very pleasure of recounting it includes the fact that others can, in turn, try it out on others.

While there is no necessary relationship between what metonymic captivation I must produce in the Other to leave the way open for the witty words, there is, on the other hand, necessarily a relationship between the systems of the two subjects. This is made sufficiently clear on the schema by the relationship between the signifying chain, as organized in the Other, which goes from δ''' to δ'' here, and the 125 one that goes from δ' to δ. There has to be a relationship, and this is what I was expressing last time when I said that the Other has to be from the same church, of like mind. It is not enough that he more or less understands French, even though this is the first way to be of like mind. If I make a joke in French, for it to work and succeed there are many other things assumed known and that the Other must share.

Here, then, represented on the schema, are two conditions that we could write as follows. The β'' – β''' designates an inhibition produced in the Other. Here I am using a sign with two small arrowheads going in opposite directions, and which is equal to, and goes in the opposite direction to, my metonymy, that is, opposite to $\gamma - \alpha$. By contrast, there is a sort of parallel between $\gamma - \alpha$ and $\gamma' - \alpha'$, which can be expressed by saying that $\gamma - \alpha$ can find its certification, which I have indicated by putting a rough breathing incidentally, on α' and γ'. The Other certifies it as a message and authenticates it as a witticism.

This has at least the advantage of clarifying these ideas by visualizing them, since that is one of the mental organs most familiar to the intellect. It visualizes for you what I meant when I was talking last time about the subjective conditions for the success of a witticism, namely, what is demanded of the imaginary other so that, within the goblet that this imaginary other proffers, the symbolic Other understands it.

I leave to ingenious minds the task of aligning this with what, curiously, I previously managed to say in a metaphor, when I was above all interested in imaginary images and in the conditions of the appearance of imaginary unity in a particular organic reflection. I must have had a reason to employ almost the same formal schema when I used the image of a concave mirror in relation to narcissism. But let's not engage in a parallel that would only be forced, as suggestive as it might be.

I am now going to put this schema to one little supplementary use, since, whatever interest there may be in thus reminding you of the meaning of what I said last time, it would be fairly limited if it did not take us any further.

The initial schema that we have been using since the start of the year has been transformed, then, by the modifications I have been making to the formula of the Other as a subject. We have $\gamma - \alpha$, here, for the subject, and $\beta - \beta'$ for the relation to the metonymic object. Beyond this, at the next level up, this same arrangement is reproduced and this means that the Other also has a relation to the metonymic object, $\beta'' - \beta'''$, whereas here the $\gamma - \alpha$ becomes $\gamma' - \alpha'$, and so on indefinitely. The final loop, the one through which need, 126 on its return, passes on the way to indefinitely deferred satisfaction, has to run across the entire circuit of Others, before returning here to its endpoint in the subject.

We will use this schema again shortly. For the moment, let's pause at a special case that Freud considers immediately following his analysis of the mechanisms of jokes, on which this is nothing but a commentary. He speaks about what he calls the social motives of jokes, and from there he goes on to the problem of the comic.

That's what we're going to try to explore today, without exhausting it. Freud explicitly says that he is only exploring it from the perspective of jokes, for there is a field here that is much too vast for him even to think about taking it on, at least on the basis of his experience. To introduce his analysis of the comic, Freud foregrounds what, in the comic, is closest to jokes. It is striking that with the sureness of orientation and touch that is his, what he presents us as being the closest to jokes is very precisely what at first sight might seem to be the furthest from jokes, namely the naive [SE 8: 182].

Naivety, he says, is based on ignorance, and quite naturally he gives examples of it taken from children. I've already mentioned the scene where children enact an entire and very pretty little story for the benefit of the adults. A couple separate, the husband goes off to seek his fortune. He returns several years later, having become rich, and on his return the woman greets him with these words, 'You see, I have behaved wonderfully, I haven't wasted my time either while you were away.' And she draws the curtain on a line of ten dolls. It's like a little scene of marionettes. The children are astonished, perhaps simply surprised – they perhaps know more than one thinks – by the outburst of laughter from the adults in the audience.

This is the type of naive joke Freud presents. He also gives it to us in a form that is technically much closer to the processes of language in the story about the little girl who offers a 'Bubizin' to her brother who has a bit of a tummy ache. Having heard mention of a 'Medizin' for her, since 'Mädi' designates little girls and 'Bubi' little boys, she thinks that if there is a 'Medizin' for little girls, there must 127 also be a 'Bubizin' for little boys. It's still a story that, provided one has the key to it, which is that one understands German, can easily be presented as a joke.

Although the reference to children is not unfashionable, what is essential is not there but in a feature that we won't say is one of ignorance but which Freud defines very specifically and whose easily substitutive character in the mechanism of jokes he emphasizes. What pleases us in jokes, says Freud, and this plays precisely the same role as what earlier I called fascination or metonymic captivation, is that we sense a lack of inhibition in the speaker. It's the lack of inhibition that makes it possible for us to convey what is essential in a joke – namely, the beyond that it evokes – to the Other we are telling it to and who is himself already fascinated by this absence of inhibition. Here, in the case of the child, in the cases that I have just referred to, what is essential does not consist in the humour, but in evoking the time in childhood when there is such a close relationship to language that it thereby directly evokes for us the relationship of language to the desire that constitutes the specific satisfaction of a joke.

I will take another example, one from an adult, which I think I already quoted at one time. One of my patients, who was not normally known for making very elaborate circumlocutions, was telling me one of those stories that are just a little sad, as he would do fairly regularly. He had made a date with a young woman he had met on his peregrinations and, as would often happen to him, the aforementioned stood him up. He concluded his story, 'I understood, once again, that it was a case of a knockback [femme de non-recevoir].'

He wasn't being witty; he thought that the expression was in use and that he was saying something completely innocent, which, however, has a highly amusing quality and satisfies something in us that goes well beyond the comical perception of this character in his disappointment.

If this story evokes a feeling of superiority in us, which is entirely doubtful, it is surely much inferior in this respect. I am alluding here to one of the mechanisms that have often been unduly elevated to the origin of comical phenomena, namely, the feeling of superiority over others. This is entirely questionable. Although it was a very great mind who attempted to sketch out the mechanism of the comic in this sense, namely Lipps, it's entirely refutable that this is where the essential pleasure of the comic lies. If there is anyone who happens to retain his superiority intact, it is our character, who possibly finds on this occasion a reason for his disappointment that is far from wounding his unshakeable confidence in himself. If any feeling of superiority takes shape in relation to this story, it 128 acts more like a lure. Everything momentarily engages you in the mirage created by the way you situate the person who is recounting the story, or situate yourself, but what is going on here goes well beyond this.

Effectively, what is looming behind the term 'femme de non-recevoir' is the fundamental disappointment, in itself, whenever one approaches desire, well beyond the satisfaction of this or that specific approach. What amuses us here is the satisfaction that the subject who has let drop this innocent phrase derives from his very disappointment. He finds that his disappointment is sufficiently explained by a locution that he thinks is an accepted locution, a ready-made metonymy for such occasions. In other words, he rediscovers his disappointment in a top hat in the guise of a baby's stuffed bunny that he thinks is the living rabbit of the valid explanation, and which is actually imaginary. Always expecting the rabbit that constitutes his very disappointment to turn up yet again, he will remain unshaken and constant, without otherwise being affected by it, when he nears the object of his illusion.

You see, therefore, that a joke by an ignorant or naive person, by the person from whom I've borrowed this phrase and made it into a joke, is complete on this occasion, as it were, at the level of the Other. No longer do I need to bring about anything in the Other that constitutes this solid cup. It has already been given to me in its entirety by the one from whom I gather the precious words which when communicated will form the basis of the joke, and which my story thus raises to the dignity of a master word. In short, the entire dialectic of a naive joke is located in the upper part of my schema. What has to be brought about in the Other in the imaginary order so that a joke in its standard form is admitted and received is formed here by its naivety, ignorance and self-satisfaction. And to elevate this blunder to the level of a joke, I simply have to present it and have it ratified by a third party, the big Other, to whom I communicate it.

Promoting the imaginary other in this analysis of metonymies and in the pure and simple satisfaction he finds in language – and uses to avoid appreciating the extent to which his desire is leading him on – introduces us, and this is why Freud places it at the intersection of witticisms and the comic, to the domain of the comic.

We haven't come to the end of our pains, for, in fact, on the subject of the comic there has been no shortage of more or less unsatisfactory theories advanced – and it's certainly not an idle 129 question to ask why this is so and also why they have been propounded. They have been presented in all sorts of forms that we don't need to spell out here, but their summation, succession and past history, as we say, do not lead us to anything fundamental. Let's leave all that behind and say that, in any case, the question of the comic is evaded when one undertakes to examine it, and I'm not saying resolve it, solely at the psychological level.

At the psychological level, both wit and the comic can obviously be easily combined under the category of what provokes laughter. Now you cannot fail but be struck by the fact that even though I have stressed that a witticism has been more or less well received and registered by the fact that you sanction it with a discreet laugh, or at the very least with a smile, till now I have not examined the question of laughter.

The question of laughter is far from having been resolved. Everyone agrees on making laughter an essential characteristic of what occurs in the witty and the comic, but as to linking it to its expressive character or even simply describing which emotion this phenomenon might correspond to – where it is possible to say, although this is not absolutely certain, that it is unique to man – one generally enters into matters that are extremely difficult. From some, one gets the impression that in trying to examine the relationship between laughter and phenomena that are thought to correspond to it in an analogical way, they are skirting around the issue. But even those who have said the most defensible or prudent things about the phenomenon of laughter hardly do more than note that it can leave 'oscillatory traces'. For Kant, it is a spasmodic movement with a particular mental oscillation, which passes from tension that is being reduced to nothing, an oscillation between an active tension and its sudden collapse in the face of the absence of anything that, supposedly, might resist it once the tension is activated. Similarly, the sudden passage from a concept to its contradiction emerges with a psychologist from the last century, Léon Dumont, whom Dumas refers to in his article on the psychology of laughter – a very Dumasian article, very fine and subtle, which this fortunate man didn't go to much effort over, but which is well worth reading, for even without making an effort he contributes some very nice elements.

In short, the question of laughter goes a lot further than that of wit or the comic.

It is not rare to see the different varieties of the phenomenon discussed. There is the mere communication of laughter, the laughing at laughter, there is the laughter that is linked to the fact that one must not laugh. The mad laughter of children under certain conditions also deserves to attract our attention. There is also the laughter 130 of anxiety, and even the laughter of an imminent threat, the nervous laughter of the victim who suddenly finds himself threatened by something that goes well beyond the limits of his expectation, the laughter of despair. There is even the laughter over a bereavement that one has just learned about. I leave it there, for I do not intend to treat all these forms of laughter, nor is it my aim to give you a theory of laughter.

I would simply stress, in passing, that nothing is further from what we should be satisfied with than Bergson's theory about the mechanical appearing in the midst of life. His work on laughter reapplies in a condensed and schematic way the myth of vital harmony, of élan vital, characterized by its supposedly endless novelty and permanent creation. You cannot fail to appreciate how outrageous this is when you read that one of the characteristics of the mechanical as opposed to the vital is said to be its repetitive character – as if we don't piss in the same way every day, or go to sleep in the same way every day, or as if one is reinventing love whenever one has a fuck. There is something truly incredible there. This explanation by means of the mechanical appears throughout the book like a mechanical explanation. What I mean is that it lapses into a lamentable stereotype that entirely leaves out what is essential in the phenomenon.

If the mechanical really were at the origin of laughter, where would we go? What would we do with Kleist's subtle remarks about marionettes, which run completely contrary to the supposedly amusing and inferior character of the mechanical? Very subtly, he stresses the fact that a true ideal of grace is achieved by these little objects which, controlled by nothing more than pieces of string, create movements whose elegant paths are linked to the stability of the centre of gravity of their curves, provided they are properly made – that is, according to the precise features of articulations in humans. No dancer, he says, can rival the grace of a skilfully operated marionette.

Having simply remarked how much Bergson's theory neglects even the most elementary understanding of the mechanism of laughter, let's leave it aside even before we involve it in anything as elaborate as the witty or the comic. Laughter effectively touches everything that is an imitation, a doubling, a Doppelgänger or a mask, and if we look at it more closely it's not just a matter of masks, but of unmasking – and unmasking at moments that are worth thinking about. You go up to a child with your face covered 131 by a mask, he laughs in a nervous or embarrassed way. You move a bit closer, a manifestation of anxiety starts to appear. You take off the mask, the child laughs. But if you are wearing another mask beneath this mask, he won't laugh one bit.

All I want to indicate here is that a study is called for, one that can only be experimental – but can only be experimental if we begin to have some idea of the direction in which it is pursued. In any case, this phenomenon, like others that I could bring in in support of my affirmation if I intended to highlight it, shows us that there is a very intense, very close relationship between the phenomena of laughter and the function of the imaginary in man.

Images as such have a captivating character beyond their corresponding instinctual mechanisms, as is shown in both sexual and combative animal display. There's an extra touch to it in man due to the fact that in him the other's image is very closely linked to the tension I mentioned earlier, which is always elicited by the object at which the tension is directed, leading it to be placed at a certain distance with a connotation of desire or hostility. I am referring to the ambiguity that is at the very foundation of the ego's formation and this means that for the ego its unity lies outside itself, that it is in relation to its semblable that it is established and that it finds this unity of defence which is the unity of its being as a narcissistic being.

The phenomenon of laughter is located in this field. And it is here that the collapse of tension, to which authors attribute the instantaneous triggering of laughter, is produced. If someone makes us laugh simply by falling over, it is as a result of his more or less pompous image that we hadn't paid all that much attention to before. The phenomena of stature and status are so rife in our lived experience that we do not even notice them. We burst out laughing when in our imagination the imaginary character goes on in his affected way, whereas what he is supported by in the real is lying spreadeagled on the ground. This is about the liberation of or from the image. Take this in the two senses [in French] of this ambiguous expression – on the one hand, something is freed from the constraints of the image while, on the other, the image is also free to wander off on its own. This is why there is always something comical about the duck with its head cut off taking a few more steps around the farmyard.

This is why, somewhere, the comic connects with what makes one laugh. I locate it at the level of the direction I → object, $\beta \rightarrow \beta'$ or $\beta'' \rightarrow \beta'''$. Certainly, inasmuch as the imaginary is somehow 132 implicated in the relationship to the symbolic, laughter, insofar as it connotes and accompanies the comic, reappears at a higher level, which interests us infinitely more than the totality of the phenomena of pleasure.

Let's move on to the comic.

To introduce the notion of the comic today I'll go back to the joke about the Golden Calf.

Soulié's quip in talking about the Golden Calf in relation to the banker – it's almost a witticism already, it's at least a metaphor – meets with this response, then, from Heinrich Heine. 'For a calf, he seems a bit past it to me.' Observe that if Heinrich Heine had said that quite literally, it would be because he hadn't understood, and he would be like my ignoramus from before who said, 'la femme de non-recevoir'. In this case, his retort would have been comical.

It's this that constitutes the underside of this witticism. Heine's retort is in effect something of a flat rejection [fin de non-recevoir], he puts Soulié in his place, makes him feel uncomfortable, as it were. After all, Soulié didn't say anything particularly funny, and Heine checkmates him by showing that it can be dealt with differently.

He erects a metonymic object different from the first calf. In this respect, he is playing at the level of comic opposition.

One cannot avoid noticing one essential difference at the outset. On the occasion of a Witz, the comic is grasped in a fleeting state, in a trait, a word, in the repartee – but, really, the comic goes much further. A witticism doesn't need to be massaged at length for it to work, whereas for the comic a simple, brief encounter is not enough. Here I am, then, addressing all of you, whatever your current position, without knowing where you're from, nor even who you are – well, in order for there to be comical relations between us, there has to be a relationship that involves us with one another much more personally. That's what you can already see taking shape in the relationship between Soulié and Heine, and it concerns a mechanism of seduction, because, all the same, Heinrich Heine's response does rebut something on Soulié's side just a little.

To put it briefly, for the comic to be possible it is necessary that the relationship between demand and satisfaction be inscribed, not 133 in an instantaneous moment, but in a dimension that gives it stability and constancy and its own pathway in relation to a determinate other. Now, if, in what underpins witticisms, we have located one of the essential structures of demand according to which, insofar as it is taken up by the Other, it has to be essentially unsatisfied, there is nevertheless a solution, the fundamental solution, the one that all human beings seek from the start of their lives to the end of their existence. Since everything depends on the Other, the solution is to have an Other of one's own. This is what we call love. In the dialectic of desire it's about having an Other of one's own.

The field of full speech, as I've said to you in the past, is defined in this schema by the very conditions under which, as we have just seen, something equivalent to the satisfaction of desire can and must be realized. We have an indication that it can only be satisfied in something beyond speech. The link uniting the Other, the I, the metonymic object and the message defines the zone in which full speech has to reside [see graphs pp. 85 and 112]. As an image of the message it is typically constituted by, I have given you 'You are my master' and 'You are my woman'. 'You, the other, are my woman.' I would therefore say to you that this is the form in which a man gives an example of the full speech in which he commits himself as subject, founds himself as the man of the woman to whom he is speaking and declares it to her in an inverted form. I also showed you its strangely paradoxical character, which is that everything rests on what must close the circuit. The metonymy that it contains, the passage from the Other to this unique object that is constituted by the statement, nevertheless requires that the metonymy be received, that something subsequently pass from γ to α, namely that the 'you' in question does not simply reply, 'Ah, no! No way!'

Even if he does not answer like that, something else happens much more often. It's that, by virtue of the very fact that no preparation as clever as a witticism comes along so that the line β″ - β‴ merges with the line parallel to it at the lower level, the two lines remain completely independent of one another – so much so that the subject in question well and truly retains his own system of metonymic objects. We will thus see produced the contradiction that is established in the circle of the four βs – namely, that since everyone has, as they say, his own little idea, this foundational speech comes up against what I will call, since we are in the presence of a square, the problem not of squaring the circle, but of 'circling' the metonymies, which remain quite distinct, even with the most ideal partner. 'There are good marriages, but no delightful ones,' said La Rochefoucauld.

Now, the problem of love and the Other is at the centre of the 134 comic. To see this, it is a good idea first to remember that, if one wants to inform oneself about the comic, it would not perhaps be such a bad thing to read comedies.

Comedy has a history, comedy even has an origin – something that many people have studied. The origin of comedy is narrowly bound up with the id's relationship to language.

What is this id that we occasionally talk about? It is not purely and simply some original radical need, one that is at the root of the individualization of an organism. The id can only be grasped beyond the elaboration of desire in the network of language, only actualized at its limit. Here, human desire is not initially caught in the system of language that defers it indefinitely and leaves no place for the id to be constituted and named. However, beyond all of this elaboration of language, it is what represents the realization of the first need which, at least in man, has no chance of ever being known. We don't know what the id of an animal is, and there is very little chance that we ever will, but what we do know is that the id of man is entirely caught up in the dialectic of language and that it conveys and preserves the first existence of tendencies.

Where does comedy originate? We're told that it comes from the banquet at which, in a word, men say 'Yes' in a kind of orgy – leave this word in all its vagueness. The meal is constituted by offerings to the gods, that is, to the Immortals of language. Ultimately, the entire process of the elaboration of desire in language comes back to and comes together in consumption at a banquet. The whole detour is only taken so as to come back to jouissance, and the most elementary at that. That is how comedy makes its entrance into what, with Hegel, we can regard as the aesthetic face of religion.

What does Classical comedy show us? It would be a good thing for you to poke your nose into Aristophanes from time to time. This is always where the id gets the upper hand, pulls on the boots of language for its own use of the most elementary kind. It is well known that in The Clouds Aristophanes makes fun of Euripides and Socrates, particularly Socrates, but how does he portray this to us? He shows us an old man making use of all his beautiful dialectics to satisfy his cravings by all sorts of tricks – escaping his creditors, getting money from people – or a young man using them to escape his commitments, fail in all his duties, rail against his ancestors and so on. This is the return of need in its most elementary form. What enters at the start in the dialectic of language – namely, sexual needs most especially, all hidden needs in general – is what you see produced right before your eyes on Aristophanes' stage. It's powerful stuff.

I particularly commend to your attention the plays involving women. In the return to the elementary needs that underlie the entire process, a special role devolves upon women, insofar as it's by their intermediary that Aristophanes invites us, at the moment of imaginary communion that comedy represents, to appreciate what can only be appreciated retroactively, which is that if the State – and the City – exist, it's for one's benefit, so that the table of plenty, which, moreover, nobody believes in, is established on the Agora. After good sense has been thwarted by the perverse evolution of a city subject to all the indecision of a dialectical process, one emerges from it through the intermediary of women, who are the only ones who really know what men need, and one returns to this good sense, which naturally assumes the most excessive forms.

This is of interest to us only because of what it shows us about the violence of certain images. It also makes us imagine a world in which women were not quite what we are made to imagine they were by authors who depict a civilized Antiquity to us. In Antiquity, or so it seems to me, the women – I'm talking about real women, not the Venus de Milo – would have had lots of hair and not smelt good, if we are to believe the insistence that is placed on the role of the razor and on certain perfumes.

Be that as it may, in this Aristophanesque twilight, especially the one that concerns the vast insurrection of women, there are some quite beautiful images that one cannot but be struck by. There's one image that is suddenly expressed in the words of one of a group of women who are in the process of not just dressing up as men but also sporting beards to suggest omnipotence – it is simply a matter of knowing which beard it is. She starts laughing and says to them, 'How funny! We look like a school of grilled cuttlefish with beards!'

This vision from the shadows seems like it could suggest an entire foundation of relations in Classical society.

What did this comedy evolve into? Into the New Comedy which began with Menander and has continued right up to our day. What is the New Comedy? It shows us people engaged in the most fascinated and obstinate of manners, in general, with some metonymic 136 object. We encounter every human type there. They are the same characters as the ones you find in Italian comedy. They are defined by having a certain relationship to an object. Something has taken the place of the irruption of sex, and it's love – love that is named as such, the love that we would call naive love, ingenuous love, the love that unites two young and, in general, fairly bland people. This is what forms the pivot of the intrigue. Love plays the role of being the axis around which the entire comedy of the situation revolves, and it will remain so until the appearance of Romanticism, which we will leave to one side for today.

Love is a comedic sentiment. The high point of comedy is readily locatable. The highpoint of comedy in the strict sense, in the sense in which I am presenting it to you here, is found in a unique masterpiece.

The latter is situated in history at the pivotal moment at which the presentation of relations between the id and language, in the form of a taking possession of language by the id, is about to give way to the introduction of the dialectic of man's relations with language in a blind, closed form, which is achieved in Romanticism. It is very important in the sense that without knowing it Romanticism turns out to be a confused introduction to the dialectic of signifiers as such, of which psychoanalysis is, in short, the articulated form. But in the, let's say, Classical line of comedy, the high point is reached when the comedy of which I'm speaking, which is by Molière and is called The School for Wives, raises the problem in an absolutely schematic way because it is indeed a question of love, but love as a tool of satisfaction.

Molière presents the problem to us in a manner that gives it a matrix. It possesses a clarity that is absolutely comparable to one of Euclid's theorems.

The play is about a person named Arnolphe. As a matter of fact, the rigour of the thing would not even have required that he be a person with just one idea. It just so happens that it works better that way, but in the same way in which a witticism uses metonymy to fascinate us. We see him enter right at the start with an obsession about not being cuckolded. That is his principal passion. It's a passion just like any other. All passions are equivalent, all are equally metonymic. It's the principle of comedy to present them as such, that is, to focus the attention on an id that believes entirely in its metonymic object. It believes in it, which doesn't mean that it is tied to it, for it is also one of the characteristics of comedy that the id of the comedic subject, whatever it may be, always remains intact at the end. Whatever happens during the comedy is like water off a duck's 137 back. The School for Wives ends with a 'Phew!' from Arnolphe, and yet God only knows what extremes he has been through.

I will try briefly to recount what it's about. Arnolphe is, then, taken with a young girl who, with her 'sweet and poised appearance', 'inspired me with love for her at the age of four'. He has, then, chosen his little woman, he has already instituted the 'You are my woman'. It's even for this reason that he gets so upset when he sees that this dear angel is about to be taken from him. The fact is that, at the point he has come to, he says, she is already his wife, he has already established her socially as such, and he has found an elegant solution to the matter.

'He is an enlightened man,' says his friend, who is called Chrysalde, and enlightened he is indeed. He has no need to be the monogamous person that we were talking about at the start – behind this monogamy he is an educator. Old men have always been preoccupied with the education of girls and have even proposed principles for it. Here, he's found a very happy principle, one that consists in keeping her in a state of being a complete idiot. He himself sets the programme of care supposedly contributing to this end. 'And you won't believe', he says to his friend, 'how far this can go. Just the other day didn't she ask me if children were made through the ears?' This was something that really should have made him prick up these very same ears, for if the girl had had a healthier physiological understanding of things, she might have been less dangerous.

'You are my woman' is full speech whose metonymy is the duly explained duties of marriage that have to be read out to little Agnès. 'She is a complete idiot,' he says, and he thinks, like all educators, that his scheme is thereby guaranteed.

What do the story's developments tell us? It could be called 'How girls grow wise'. The originality of the character of Agnès seems to have created a real enigma for psychologists and critics – is she a woman, a nymphomaniac, a flirt, is she this or is she that? Absolutely not. She's a being who has been taught to speak, and she does so.

She is captivated by the words of a character, a complete dimwit of a young man, moreover. This Horace comes into the picture on this question, when, in the important scene in which Arnolphe tells her he would tear half his hair out, she calmly replies, 'Horace could do more than you with two words.' She thus perfectly punctuates what is present throughout the play, namely that what has come to her in her encounter with the character in question is precisely that he says things that are amusing and sweet to the ear, that delight her. She is quite incapable of telling us, and of telling herself, what he says, but it comes through speech – that is, through what ruptures the system 138 of learned and educational speech. This is how she gets captivated.

The sort of ignorance that is one of the dimensions of her being is simply connected with the fact that for her there is nothing but speech. When Arnolphe explains to her that the other held her hands, her arms, she asks, 'What else is there?' She is very interested. She is a goddess of reason, this Agnès. Moreover, the word 'reasoner' comes back to choke Arnolphe when he reproaches her for her ingratitude, her lack of sense of duty, her betrayal, and she answers him with admirable pertinence, 'But what do I owe you? If it is only for having made me stupid, your expenses will be reimbursed.'

At the beginning we thus find ourselves with the reasoner alongside the ingenuous, and what constitutes the comical mainspring is that as soon as the girl starts becoming clever we see the emergence of a reasoner alongside a character who, for his part, becomes the ingenuous one – for in words that leave no ambiguity he then tells her that he loves her, and he tells her in every possible way, telling her to the point where his declaration culminates in telling her more or less the following, 'You will do exactly everything you want to, you can also have Horace if it so happens that you want him.' Ultimately, the character overturns even the very principle of his system. He even prefers to be cuckolded, which was his principal starting point in the matter, rather than lose the object of his love.

Love – I am saying that this is the point at which the highpoint of Classical comedy is located. Love is here. It is curious to see to what extent we no longer perceive love except through all kinds of partitions, romantic partitions, that stifle it, whereas the mainspring of love is essentially comical. It is precisely in this respect that Arnolphe is truly in love, much more authentically in love than the said Horace, who is always vacillating. The romantic change in perspective that took place around the term of love means that we can no longer grasp it so easily. It's a fact – the more the play is performed, the more Arnolphe is played as Arnolphe, the more people lean over and say to one another, 'This Molière is so noble and profound, you laugh when you should be crying.' People almost never find the comic compatible with the authentic and overwhelming expression of love as such. However, love is comical when the love that declares itself and shows itself is love that is love at its most authentic.

That, then, is the outline of the story. Still, I must also tell you how it ends.

139 The story is brought to an end by the stupidity of the third person, namely Horace, who happens to conduct himself like a little baby, going so far as to hand back the very person he has just taken out of the hands of her legitimate possessor, without even having been able to identify him as the jealous party whose tyranny Agnès was suffering from, and who, moreover, is her chosen confidant. This doesn't matter. He is a secondary character. Why is he there? So that the problem is posed in these terms – namely, that Arnolphe is kept informed at every instant, hour by hour, minute by minute, about what is happening in reality, by the very person who is his rival and, also, in a manner that is just as entirely authentic, by his pupil herself, the said Agnès who hides nothing from him.

Indeed, she is a complete idiot, as was his wish, uniquely in the sense that she has absolutely nothing to hide, says everything and says it simply, in the most pertinent manner. But from the moment she is in the world of speech, whatever the power of her educational formation, her desire lies beyond. Her desire is not simply on the side of Horace whom – here we are in no doubt – she will in the future subject to the very same fate so feared by Arnolphe. It's just that, by virtue of the fact that she is in the domain of speech, her desire lies beyond, she is charmed by words, she is charmed by wit and – insofar as something lies beyond this metonymic actuality that Arnolphe is attempting to impose on her – she slips away. Even as she always says the truth to Arnolphe, she is still deceiving him, because everything that she does is tantamount to deceiving him.

Horace is aware of this himself when he recounts how she threw his little stone out of the window, telling him, 'Off you go, I do not want to hear any more of your words, and that is my response', which sounded like it meant, 'Here is the stone that I am throwing to you', but the stone was also the vehicle for a little letter. Horace emphasizes it very well – for a girl that Arnolphe wanted to keep in extreme ignorance, there is an ambiguity here that is not at all badly done, and that is the start of these double meanings and an entire game that augurs well for the future.

That is the point at which I wanted to leave you today. By its very nature, the id lies beyond desire's capture in language. The relationship to the Other is essential inasmuch as the path of desire necessarily passes through it, but not insofar as the Other is the unique object, but rather insofar as the Other is the correspondent of language and subjects it to its entire dialectic.

THE LOGIC OF CASTRATION

VIII

FORECLOSURE OF THE NAME-OF-THE-FATHER

Mrs Pankow expounds the double bind*
Typography of the unconscious
The Other in the Other Psychosis between code and message
Symbolic triangle and imaginary triangle

I get the impression that I pushed you a bit too hard last trimester – I got some feedback about it. I hadn't noticed, otherwise I wouldn't have done it. I was under the impression that I was repeating myself and getting nowhere. This still didn't prevent me from perhaps leaving behind some of the things I wanted to get you to understand, and it's worth retracing our steps a little and, let's say, looking back over how I have been approaching things this year.

What I am trying to show you concerning jokes, for which I have extracted a schema whose usefulness may not be immediately clear to you, is how things fit together and how they mesh with the earlier schema. Ultimately, you have to be aware of something constant in what I teach you – although, certainly, you shouldn't just view this constant as a little flag on the horizon by which you can get your bearings, but you should understand where it is taking you and where the detours are. What is constant is my belief that fundamental to understanding what is in Freud is that one recognize the importance of language and speech. I was the first to say this, but the closer we get to our object, the more aware we become of the importance of signifiers in the economy of desire – let's say, in the formation and information of signifieds.

You could appreciate this when listening to the interesting things Mrs Pankow was saying at our scientific meeting last night. It so 144 happens that in America people are concerned with the same thing as I am explaining to you here. They are trying to introduce the fact of communication and what they call the message into the economic determination of psychical disturbances. You were able to hear Mrs Pankow talking about someone who certainly wasn't born yesterday, namely Mr Bateson, anthropologist and ethnographer, who has contributed something that makes us think a little bit beyond the end of our noses concerning therapeutic action.

Bateson tries to locate and formulate the basis of the genesis of psychotic disturbances in something that is established at the level of the mother–child relationship and is not simply an elementary effect of frustration, tension, retention, relaxation and satisfaction, as if interhuman relationships take place at the ends of a piece of elastic. He introduces the notion of communication from the outset, insofar as it is not merely centred on contact, a relationship or an entourage, but on a meaning. He places it at the beginning of what was originally conflicting and harmful in the child's relationship to its mother. What he designates as being the essentially conflicting element in this relationship is the fact that communication is presented in the form of a double bind.

As Mrs Pankow put it so well last night, in the message in which the child has deciphered the behaviour of its mother there are two elements. They are not defined in relation to one another, in the sense in which one would be presented as the subject's defence in relation to what the other means, which is the common notion that you have of a defence mechanism when you analyse. You consider that the intention behind what the subject says is to misrecognize some signification somewhere there inside him, and that what he says to himself – and says to you – is something else [la couleur à côté]. That is not what it is about. It's about something that concerns the Other, which the subject receives in such a way that, if he answers one way, he knows, by virtue of this alone, that he's going to find himself cornered with respect to the other. The example that Mrs Pankow gives is this – if I respond to my mother's declaration of love, I provoke her withdrawal, and if I don't listen, that is to say, if I don't respond to her, I lose her.

We are thereby introduced to a true dialectic of double meaning, where the latter already involves a third party. There are not two meanings one behind the other, with a second meaning, located beyond the first and the more authentic of the two. There are two simultaneous messages in the one single meaningful utterance, as it were, which creates a position in the subject whereby he finds himself at an impasse. This proves that even in America they are making huge progress. 145

Am I saying this is adequate? Mrs Pankow nicely highlighted what is there at the ground level or, one might say, at the empirical level, in this attempt – though it's not a matter of empiricism, of course. If there were not very important work on game theory in America alongside this, Mr Bateson would not have dreamed of introducing into the analysis what is, after all, a reconstruction of what is thought to have occurred early on, or of determining a subject position that is deeply rent or falsified with respect to what in the message is constitutive for him. I say 'constitutive for him' because if his conception did not imply that the message is constitutive for the subject, it is difficult to see how one could attribute such major effects to the original double bind.*

The question that arises concerning the psychoses is what the nature of this process of communication is, precisely, when it fails to be constitutive for the subject. We have to look for another point of reference. Up to this point, when you read Mr Bateson, you see that while everything is, to put it simply, centred on the double message, it is centred on the double message as double meaning. This is precisely where the system fails, and it fails precisely because this conception neglects the signifier's constitutive role in meaning.

Last night I jotted something down in passing – it has now gone missing – where I recorded a remark by Mrs Pankow about psychosis, which amounted more or less to this. There is no speech, she said, that grounds the act of speech. In speech itself, there has to be speech that grounds speech as an act in the subject. This is in line with what I am coming to now.

By stressing the fact that somewhere in speech there has to be something that grounds speech as true, Mrs Pankow was exhibiting a demand for the stabilization of the entire system. To this end, she had recourse to the perspective of 'personality', which at the very least has the merit of demonstrating her sense of the inadequacy of a system that leaves us in a state of uncertainty and fails to deliver an adequate deduction or construction.

I absolutely do not think that it can be formulated this way. I believe that this personalist reference is only psychologically grounded in the sense that we cannot fail to feel and sense that meanings create the impasse that supposedly triggers this profound disturbance in the schizophrenic subject. But, also, we cannot fail to feel and sense that something must be the cause of this deficit, and that this something is not simply the registration of the experience of impasses in meaning, but rather the lack of something that founds meaning itself, and that what is lacking is a signifier – and something 146 more, which is precisely what I am going to explore today. It is not something that presents itself simply as the personality, as what grounds speech as an act, as Mrs Pankow was saying last night, but something that presents itself as giving the law its authority.

By 'law', here, I mean that which is properly articulated at the level of the signifier, namely the text of the law.

Saying that there has to be a person there in order to sustain the authenticity of speech is not the same as saying that there is something that authorizes the text of the law. Effectively, it is sufficient that what authorizes the text of the law is at the level of signifiers. This is what I call the Name-of-the-Father, namely the symbolic father. It's a term that subsists at the level of signifiers and that, in the Other as the seat of the law, represents the Other. This is the signifier that gives the law its support, that promulgates the law. It is the Other in the Other.

This is just what the myth of the Oedipus complex, necessary for Freud's thought, expresses. Look at it closely. If he is obliged to procure the origin of the law in this mythical form, if there is anything that makes it the case that the law is founded on the father, it is necessary for the father to be murdered. The two things are closely linked – the father, insofar as he promulgates the law, is the dead father, which is to say the symbol of the father. The dead father is the Name-of-the-Father, who is there, constructed over the content.

This is quite essential. I will remind you why.

What has been the nub of everything that I have taught you about psychosis these last two years? It's what I have called Verwerfung. I have tried to make you sense that it is different from Verdrängung, that is, different from the fact that the signifying chain continues to unfold and continues to be organized in the Other, whether you know it or not. This is essentially Freud's discovery.

Verwerfung, as I have said, is not simply what is inaccessible to you, that is, what exists in the Other as repressed and as signifiers. That is Verdrängung, and it is the signifying chain. The proof of this is that it continues to act, even though you do not attach even the slightest signification to it yourself, and determines even the slightest signification without your knowing it to be the signifying chain.

I have also told you that there are other things which, on occasion, are verworfen. There may be a missing signifier or a missing 147 letter in the chain of signifiers, one that is always missing in the typography. The space of the signifier, the space of the unconscious, is effectively a typographical space, which we must try to define as being constituted along lines and little squares, and as corresponding to topological laws. There may be something lacking in a chain of signifiers. You have to understand the importance of the lack of the particular signifier I have just mentioned, the Name-of-the-Father, that grounds, as such, the fact that the law exists, that is, its articulation in a certain order of signifiers – the Oedipus complex, the Oedipal law or the law of prohibition of the mother. It is the signifier that signifies that, within these signifiers, the signifier exists.

That is the Name-of-the-Father and, as you see, it is an essential signifier in the Other, and on which I have tried to centre what takes place in psychosis – namely, that the subject must compensate for the lack of the signifier, the Name-of-the-Father. Everything that I have called the chain reaction or disarray produced in psychosis is organized around that point.

What should I do now? Should I immediately go back over what I have said concerning President Schreber? Or should I first show you, more precisely, in detail, how to formulate what I have just been showing you at the level of this year's schema?

To my great surprise, not everybody finds this schema interesting – though some do. It has been constructed, don't forget, so as to represent what occurs at a level that deserves to be called a technique, which is the technique of witticisms. This is something quite unusual, since a Witz can obviously be constructed by a subject in the most unintentional way in the world. As I have shown you, a witticism is sometimes only the converse of a slip, and experience shows that many witticisms are born in this way – one realizes after the fact that one has been witty, but it happened all by itself. In some cases, this could be taken for exactly the contrary, a sign of naivety, and last time I alluded to naive witticisms.

It was around witticisms, with the satisfaction that results from them and is particular to them, that I tried to organize this schema for you last trimester. I was trying to work out how to think about the source of the special satisfaction they give. This brings us back 148 to nothing less than the dialectic of demand on the basis of the ego.*

Recall the schema for what I managed to refer to as the primordial ideal symbolic moment, one that is completely non-existent.

The moment at which a demand is satisfied is represented by the simultaneous arrival at the Other of the intention, as it appears in the message, and the message as such. The signifiers – this is what is at stake, since this chain is a chain of signifiers – arrive at the Other. The perfect identity, simultaneity, or exact superimposition between the manifestation of the intention, insofar as it is the ego's* intention, and the fact that the signifiers are ratified, as such, in the Other is at the heart of the very possibility of the satisfaction of speech. If this moment, which I am calling the ideal primordial moment, exists, it must be constituted by the simultaneity, the precise coextensivity, of desire, insofar as it manifests itself, and the signifiers, insofar as they carry and convey it. If this moment exists, then, what follows, that is, what succeeds the message in its passage into the Other, is thus realized both in the Other and in the subject and corresponds to what is necessary for there to be satisfaction. This is, very precisely, the required starting point for understanding that this never happens.

That is, the nature and the effect of signifiers are such that what happens here at M [see graph, p. 85] appears as the signified, that is, as something that is the result of the transformation or refraction of desire when it passes through signifiers. This is why these two lines cross over one another – so as to get you to sense the fact that desire is expressed through, and passes through, signifiers.

Desire crosses the signifying line, and what does it encounter at the level at which it crosses the signifier line? It encounters the Other. We shall see shortly, since we will have to come back to it, what the Other is on the schema. I am not saying it encounters the Other as a person. It encounters it as the treasure trove of signifiers, as the locus of the code. This is where the refraction of desire by the signifier occurs. Desire, then, as the signified, is different when it arrives from what it was at the start, and there you have – I won't say why the moon is not made of blue cheese – but why your desire is always cuckolded. Or, rather, it's you who are cuckolded. You yourself are betrayed in that your desire has slept with signifiers. I do not know how I could articulate these things better to get you to understand them. The entire meaning of the schema is to get you to visualize the idea that the mere passage of desire – as the expression, the high point of the radical ego* – through the chain of signifiers introduces an essential change in the dialectic of desire.

149 It is quite clear that, concerning the satisfaction of desire, everything depends on what passes through point A, originally defined as the locus of the code, which, in itself, ab origine, merely by virtue of its signifier structure, introduces an essential modification to a desire at the level at which it passes through signifiers. Here, everything else is implied, since not only is the code here, there is more besides. I locate myself here at the most radical level – but, of course, there is the law, there are prohibitions, there is the superego and so on. But in order to understand how these various levels are constructed, we have to understand that, even at the most radical level, as soon as you speak to someone, there is an Other, another Other in him, as subject of the code, and that we already find ourselves subject to the dialectic of the cuckoldification of desire. Therefore, everything depends, as it turns out, on what happens at this point of crossover, A, at this level of crossing.

The possibility of satisfying any human desire happens to depend on how it fits into the signifying system, insofar as it is formulated in the subject's speech, and, as M. de la Palice would have said, on the system of signifiers insofar as it resides in the code – that is, at the level of the Other as locus and seat of the code. A child would be convinced on hearing this, and I am not claiming that what I have just explained to you moves us forward one little bit. But it still needs to be spelt out.

This is where we are going to explore the connection I want to make between this schema and what I was telling you before about the essentials of the question of the Name-of-the-Father. You'll see it being prepared and sketched out, not being engendered, and above all not engendering itself, for it involves making a leap to get there. Not everything happens in continuity, it being a characteristic of signifiers to be discontinuous.

What does the technique of jokes bring to our experience? This is what I have been trying to get you to appreciate. While a joke gives no particular immediate satisfaction, it consists in the fact that something happens in the Other that symbolizes what could be called the necessary condition of all satisfaction – namely, that you are understood beyond what you say. In no case, effectively, can what you say really make you understood.

Witticisms unfold in the dimension of metaphor, that is, beyond signifiers, insofar as when you try to signify something with a signifier, you will always signify something else, whatever you do. It is a signifier that gives the appearance of stumbling that satisfies you, simply by virtue of the fact that, by this sign, the Other is acknowledging this dimension of the beyond where what is at issue has to be signified and which you cannot signify as such. This is the dimension 150 that witticisms reveal to us.

This schema is thus grounded in our experience. I realized I had to construct it to explain what goes on in witticisms. What, in witticisms, replaces the failure of desire to be communicated via signifiers, to the point of giving us a kind of happiness, comes about in this way – the Other confirms that a message has stumbled or failed and, in this very stumbling, recognizes the dimension that lies beyond and where true desire is located, that is, what, because of signifiers, never gets to be signified.

You see that the dimension of the Other is a little bit more extensive here. Effectively, here it is not just the seat of the code any more. It intervenes as a subject, ratifies a message in the code and renders it more complicated. That is, it is already at the level of who it is that constitutes the law as such, since he is capable of adding this trait or message to it as supplementary – that is, as itself designating something beyond the message.

This is why, when the theme came to be formations of the unconscious, I began the year by speaking about witticisms. Let's now try to look at this Other a little more closely – and in a less unusual situation than that of witticisms – insofar as in this dimension we are seeking to discover the necessity for the signifier that founds signifiers, the signifier that institutes the legitimacy of the code or the law. Let's return, then, to our dialectic of desire.

When we address the other, we don't always express ourselves by means of witticisms. We'd be all the happier if we could in a way. This is what I try to do in the brief time I have for the discourse I address to you. I'm not always successful. Whether it is your fault or mine is completely indiscernible from this point of view. But, in the end, at the banal level of what happens when I address the other, there is a word that makes it possible for us to found him in the most elementary way, and which is absolutely marvellous in French if one thinks about all the ambiguities and puns it lends itself to – which I would be embarrassed to make use of here except in the most discreet way possible. As soon as I say this word, what I am evoking will immediately come back to you. It is the word 'you' ['tu'].

This 'you' is quite essential to what on several occasions I have called full speech, speech as foundational in the subject's history, the 'you' of 'you are my master' or 'you are my woman'. This 'you'
151 is the signifier of the appeal to the Other, and I remind those of you who were so kind as to follow my entire chain of Seminars on psychosis about the use I put it to, the demonstration that I tried to bring alive for you around the distance between 'Tu es celui qui me suivras', 'You are the one who shall follow me' and 'Tu est celui qui me suivra', 'You are the one who will follow me'. What I was already exploring for you at that time and was trying to engage you in is precisely what I am going to allude to now, which I have already given a name to.

In these two sentences, with their differences, there is an appeal. It is more present in one than in the other, and even completely present in one and not at all in the other. In the 'You are the one who shall follow me', there is something that is not in the 'You are the one who will follow me', and it is what is called invocation. If I say, 'You are the one who shall follow me', I invoke you, I pick you out as being the one who will follow me, I solicit in you the 'Yes' that says, 'I am yours, I devote myself to you, I am the one who will follow you.' But if I say, 'You are the one who will follow me', I do nothing of the kind, I announce, I state, I objectify, and even, on occasion, I reject. It can mean, 'You are the one who will always follow me, and I'm sick of it.' In the most ordinary and most consequential way that this sentence is pronounced, it is a refusal. Of course, the invocation requires quite another dimension, namely that I make my desire depend upon your being, in the sense that I call upon you to follow the pathway of this desire, whatever it happens to be, unconditionally.

This is the process of invocation. The word means I make an appeal to the voice – that is, to what supports speech. Not to speech, but to the subject insofar as he carries it, and that is why I am there at the level that earlier I called the personalist level. Indeed, this is why the personalists pile it on with their 'thou', 'thou, 'thou', 'thou', all day long, with their 'thou' and their 'thine'. Mr Martin Buber, for example, whose name Mrs Pankow mentioned in passing, is an eminent name in this register.

There is, of course, an essential phenomenological level there, and we cannot do without it. Nor must we give in to its mirage and prostrate ourselves. The personalist attitude – this is the danger that we encounter at this level – lends itself fairly freely to mystical prostration. And why not? We don't refuse any attitude to anyone, we simply request the right to understand these attitudes, and this moreover is not forbidden from the personalist side, though it is forbidden from the scientistic side – if you begin to attach authenticity to the mystical position, you yourself are thought to be succumbing to some ridiculous indulgence.

Every subjective structure, of whatever kind, to the extent that we can follow what it articulates, is strictly speaking equivalent to every 152 other from the point of view of subjective analysis. Only stupid idiots like Mr Blondel, the psychiatrist, can object, in the name of some supposedly ineffable morbid consciousness of the lived experience of another, to what seems ineffable but is articulated. This should be rejected out of hand, because there is a confusion here arising from the fact that one thinks that what is not articulated lies in the beyond, whereas it is nothing of the sort – that which lies beyond can be articulated. In other words, we don't need to speak of the ineffable concerning the subject, whether delusional or mystical. At the level of subjective structure, we are in the presence of something that cannot be presented in any other way than the way it is presented, and which, as such, as a consequence, is presented with full value at its own level of credibility.

If there is something ineffable, whether in the delusional or mystical order, by definition he doesn't say it, because it's ineffable. So we are not to judge what he articulates, namely his speech, on the basis of what he cannot say. If it can be supposed that the ineffable exists, and we are very happy to suppose that it does, we never turn away from grasping whatever is demonstrated as structure in speech, of whatever kind, under the pretext that the ineffable exists. It is possible we will get lost in it, and then we abandon it. But if we don't get lost in it, the order that this speech demonstrates and unveils is to be taken for what it is. In general, we notice that it is infinitely richer to take it as it is and try to articulate the order that it establishes, provided we have the right reference points – and that is what we are trying to do here. If we were to set out with the idea that speech was essentially made for representing the signified, we would go under immediately, because this would be to fall back upon previous oppositions, namely that we have no knowledge of the signified.

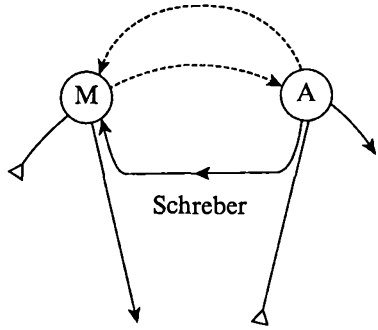
The 'you' in question is the 'you' we invoke. For sure, when we invoke it, this subjective personal impenetrability is involved, but this is not the level at which we are trying to reach it. What is involved in an invocation? The word 'invocation' has a historical usage. It's what was performed in a particular ceremony that the ancients, who had more wisdom than us on certain points, carried out before combat. This ceremony consisted of doing what was necessary – they probably knew what this was – to get the gods of the others on their side. This is exactly what the word 'invocation' means, and it's where the essential relationship that I am now leading you to resides – at this second stage, that of the appeal, the necessary appeal for desire and demand to be satisfied.

153 It is not enough just to say to the Other, 'you', 'you', 'you', and obtain his assistance in a heartbeat. One needs to give him the very voice we want him to have and evoke this voice, which is present in witticisms as their true dimension. A witticism is a provocation, one that does not achieve any great feat, one that does not achieve any great miracle of invocation. An invocation is located at the level of speech insofar as it is articulated vocally in conformity with one's desire.

At this level we find the fact that all satisfaction of demand, to the extent that it depends on the Other, will hinge on what happens here, in this to-and-fro between message and code, code and message, which enables the Other to authenticate my message in the code. We come back to the earlier point – that is, to what constitutes the essence of our interest that together we are bringing to witticisms this year.

I would simply have you remark, in passing, that if you had had this schema, that is to say, that if I had been able, not to give it to you, but to forge it for you at the time of my Seminar on the psychoses, if together we had come to the same witticisms at the same time,

I would have been able to use this to picture what is essentially happening in President Schreber, insofar as he fell prey to, and became a subject absolutely dependent upon, his voices.



Pay close attention to this schema behind me and simply suppose that everything in the Other that might correspond, in whatever way possible, to the level that I am calling the Name-of-the-Father, which incarnates, specifies and particularizes what I have just been explaining to you – that is to say, which represents the Other as what gives the law in the Other its significance – were verworfen. Well then, if you imagine the Verwerfung of the Name-of-the-Father, that is, that the signifier is absent, you will see that the two links in dotted 154 lines here – namely the to-and-fro between message and code and code and message – are thereby destroyed and rendered impossible. This makes it possible to enter on this schema the two fundamental types of voice phenomena experienced by President Schreber as a substitute for this defect or lack. Let me add that when this hollow or void appears, it's because the Name-of-the-Father has been evoked at least once – because what has been appealed to at the level of the 'you' at a given moment is precisely the Name-of-the-Father, insofar as it is capable of endorsing the message and insofar as, by virtue of this fact, it is the guarantor of the fact that the law as such presents itself as autonomous. That's where the tipping point is, the turning point that tips the subject into psychosis – and I am leaving to one side for the moment in what way, at what moment, and why.

That year I began my discussion of psychosis with a sentence I had extracted from one of my patient interviews. People grasped very well the moment at which the sentence muttered by the patient, 'I have just come from the butcher's', tipped over onto the other side. It was when the word 'sow' appeared in apposition. No longer able to be assumed or integrated by the subject, it tipped over, through its own movement, through its own inertia as a signifier, from being one of her lines in her own script, into the Other. This was elementary phenomenology, pure and simple. In Schreber what was the result of the exclusion of the links between the message and the Other? The result presented itself in the form of the two broad categories of the voice and hallucinations.

First, there are the utterances at the level of the Other, involving the signifiers of what is presented as the Grundsprache, the fundamental language. They are the original elements of the code articulable in relation to one another, for this fundamental language is so well organized that it literally covers the world with its network of signifiers. Nothing else in it is sure or certain, except that total, essential signification is involved. Each of these words has its own weight, emphasis and mass as a signifier. The subject articulates them to one another. Whenever they are isolated, the properly enigmatic dimension of signification, insofar as the latter is infinitely less apparent than the certitude it conveys, is altogether striking. In other words, here the Other only transmits beyond the code, as it were, without there being any possibility of integrating into it what might come from the place in which the subject articulates his message.

From another perspective, if you put the little arrows back in here, messages come. They are not in any way authenticated by the Other's return, as the support of the code, back to the message, nor 155 are they integrated into the code with any intention of any kind. They come from the Other, as does every message, since there is nowhere for a message to come from except from the Other, given that it is made from a language that is the language of the Other – even when it comes from one of us as a reflection of the other. These messages, then, issue from the Other, they leave this reference point behind and become articulated in this sort of proposal, 'And now I want to give you . . .', 'Specifically I want this for myself . . .', 'And now, that must however . . .'.

What's missing? The principal thought, the one expressed at the level of the fundamental language. The voices themselves, which know the entire theory, also say, 'Reflection is missing'. This means, in effect, that messages of the other category of messages come from the Other. They are a type of message that cannot be ratified as such. The message appears here, in that pure and broken dimension of signifiers, as something whose signification is only contained beyond oneself, as something that, by virtue of not being able to contribute to authentification by the 'you', appears as having no other aim than to present as lacking the position of the 'you', where signification is authenticated. Of course, the subject is driven to complete the signification himself, and therefore gives the sentence its complements. 'I do not now wish', say the voices, but elsewhere he says to himself that he, Schreber, 'cannot acknowledge that he is a . . .'. The message remains broken in that it is unable to go via the path of the 'you' and can only arrive at point gamma as an interrupted message.

I think I have indicated well enough that in order for the dimension of the Other to be fully able to exercise its function as Other, as the locus of the depot or treasure trove of signifiers, it must include the following, which is that it also contain the signifier of the Other as Other. The Other also has, beyond itself, this Other capable of giving the law its foundation. This is a dimension which, of course, is also of the order of signifiers, and is embodied in people who underpin this authority. The fact that on occasion these people are absent, that for example the father is deficient in the sense that he is too stupid, is not what's essential. What is essential is that, in one way or another, the subject has acquired the dimension of the Name-of-the-Father.

Of course what actually happens, and you can glean this from biographies, is that the father is often there in the kitchen doing the dishes and wearing his wife's apron. This is not at all sufficient to make a schizophrenic.

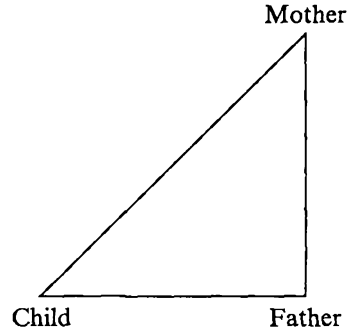
I am now going to write up on the blackboard the little schema with which I will introduce what I will talk about next time and which will make it possible for us to find a way to draw the distinction, which might seem a bit scholastic to you, between the Name-of-the-Father and the real father – the Name-of-the-Father insofar as it may possibly be missing and the father who doesn't seem to need to be there for him not to be lacking. I will therefore introduce what will be the theme of my Seminar next time, namely what, as of today, I will call the paternal metaphor.

A name is never a signifier just like any other. To be sure, it is important to have one, but that does not mean for all that that one has access to it, any more than one has access to the satisfaction I was talking to you about earlier – the satisfaction of desire, cuckolded in principle. This is why, in the famous speech act Mrs Pankow was talking about yesterday, the invocation I was talking about earlier is going to be actualized concretely, psychologically in a dimension that we call metaphorical.

In other words, you have to have the Name-of-the-Father – but you also have to know how to use it. It's on this that the destiny and outcome of the entire affair may largely depend.

There are the real words that flow around the subject, notably in his childhood, but the essence of the paternal metaphor, which I announce to you today and which we will talk about at greater length next time, consists of the following triangle:



157 And we also have this schema:

Schema L

Everything that happens at S, the subject, depends on what signifiers are placed at A. If A truly is the locus of signifiers, it must itself carry some reflection of the essential signifier that I represent here by this zigzag, and which elsewhere, in my article,'The Purloined Letter', I called schema L.

Three of these four cardinal points are given by the three subject terms of the Oedipus complex as signifiers, which we encounter at each of the vertices of the triangle. I will return to this next time, but I ask you for the moment to grant me what I am telling you – a story to whet your appetite.

The fourth term is the S. He – not only do I grant you this but this is where one starts – is in effect ineffably stupid, for he does not have his own signifier. He lies outside the three vertices of the Oedipal triangle, and he is dependent on what takes place in this game. He is the dummy in the game. It's even because the game is structured in this way – I mean that it is conducted not only as a particular game, but as a game that is correctly instituted – that the subject will find himself dependent upon the three poles called ego-ideal, superego and reality.

But to understand the transformation of the first triad into the second, you have to see that, dummy that he is, the subject – and there is a subject – gets little reward for his efforts in this game. From the unconstituted point where he is, it will be necessary for him to contribute to it – if not with his dollars, which perhaps he doesn't have as yet, then at least with his hide, that is to say with his images, his imaginary structure and all that follows. This is how the fourth term, the S, is going to be represented in something imaginary that is opposed to the signifier of the Oedipus complex and which, if it is to work, has to be ternary.

Of course, there is an entire stock, the entire baggage of images. 158
To see this, open the books by Mr Jung and his school, and you'll see that there is no end to such images – they sprout and they vegetate everywhere. There is the serpent, the dragon, tongues, the flaming eye, the green plant, the pot of flowers, the concierge. They are all fundamental images, incontestably stuffed with signification. It is just that we can do strictly nothing with them, and if you move about at this level, you will only succeed in losing yourself, along with your little lamp, in the vegetating forest of primitive archetypes.

As to what interests us, namely the intersubjective dialectic, there are three images selected – I am articulating my thought a little too strongly here – to take on the role of guides. This is not difficult to understand, since something is in some way already ready, not only for being the homologue of the base of the triangle mother–father–child, but for merging with it – it is the relationship between the body, fragmented and by the same token enveloped by a good number of these images we have been talking about, and the unifying function of the total image of the body. In other words, the ego's relationship with the specular image already gives us the base of the imaginary triangle, here indicated by the dotted line.

The other point [φ] is where we will see the effect of the paternal metaphor.

I gave you this other point in my Seminar last year on the object relation, but now you will see what place it has in formations of the unconscious. I think that you will have recognized this point just in the fact of seeing it here in the third position with the mother and the child. We see it here in another relation, which I did not at all hide from you last year, since we ended on the relation between the Name-of-the-Father and what caused the fantasy of the little horse to emerge in our little Hans. This third point – I will name it, finally, 159 I think you already have it on the tip of your tongue – is nothing other than the phallus. And this is why the phallus occupies such a central place as an object in the Freudian economy.

This alone is enough to show us where La psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui is in error, which is moving further and further away from it. It eludes the fundamental function of the phallus, with which the subject imaginarily identifies himself, reducing it to the notion of part object. This brings us back to comedy.

I will leave you there for today, having shown you the ways in which the complex discourse, in which I am trying to bring together everything I have been presenting to you, comes together and holds together.

THE PATERNAL METAPHOR

Superego, reality, ego-ideal
Ways the father can fail
The delicate question of the inverted Oedipus complex
The phallus as a signified
The dimensions of something Other

I made an exception and announced the title of what I am going to talk about today, namely the paternal metaphor.

Not long ago, someone, slightly worried, I imagine, about the direction in which I was taking things, asked me, 'What do you intend to speak about for the rest of the year?' And I replied, 'I intend to address questions of structure.' That way, I didn't compromise myself. Nevertheless, I actually do intend to talk to you about questions of structure this year concerning formations of the unconscious. To put it simply, it's a matter of putting in place things that you talk about every day and by which you get confused every day in a way that in the end you don't even worry about any more.

The paternal metaphor, then, is about the father's function, as one might say in terms of interhuman relations. You encounter complications every day in the way in which you might have to make use of it as a concept that has taken on a certain familiar appearance since you started talking about it. What you need to know is precisely whether you are talking about it in the form of a coherent discourse.

The father's function has a place, a fairly large place, in the history of analysis. It lies at the heart of the question of the Oedipus complex. And that's where you see it presented. Freud introduced it right at the start, as the Oedipus complex appears as early as The Interpretation of Dreams. What the unconscious reveals in the beginning is first and foremost the Oedipus complex. The importance of the revelation of the unconscious is what infantile amnesia relates to. What it relates to is the existence of the child's desires for the mother and the fact that these desires are repressed. And not only are they suppressed, but it has been forgotten that these desires are 162 primordial. And not only are they primordial, but they are always there. That is where analysis started, and that is the basis on which a number of clinical questions arise.

I have tried to organize the questions that have been raised in the history of analysis in relation to the Oedipus complex in a number of directions.

I distinguish three historical poles, which I will briefly situate for you.

In the first, I will inscribe a question of historical importance. It's the question whether the Oedipus complex, initially promoted as fundamental in neurosis but which Freud's work turns into something universal, was to be encountered not only in neurotics but also in the normal person. And the question arose for a good reason, since the Oedipus complex has an essentially normalizing function. On the one hand, then, one could consider that it's an accident of the Oedipus complex that produces neurosis, but also raise the question whether there exist neuroses without an Oedipus complex.

A number of observations seem to indicate, effectively, that the Oedipal drama doesn't always play the essential role but, for instance, that the child's exclusive relationship to its mother does. Experience thus obliged us to admit that there could be subjects presenting with a neurosis in which one did not at all find an Oedipus complex. I remind you that 'Névrose sans complexe d'Oedipe?' ['Neurosis without Oedipus Complex?'] is precisely the title of an article by Charles Odier.

The notion of a neurosis without an Oedipus complex correlates with the totality of questions raised about what has been called the maternal superego. At the time at which the question of neurosis without an Oedipus complex was raised, Freud had already formulated that the superego was of paternal origin. And so the question arose – is the superego really uniquely of paternal origin? Is there not, in neurosis, behind the paternal superego, a much more demanding, more oppressive, more devastating and more insistent maternal superego?

I do not want to go on at length, for we have a long road to travel. That, then, is the first reference point, where the exceptional cases and the relationship between the paternal superego and the maternal superego are grouped together.

Now for the second pole.

Independently of whether the Oedipus complex is present or lacking for a subject, the question has been raised whether an entire field of pathology that falls under our jurisdiction and presents itself to our jurisdiction should not be referred to what we can call the pre-Oedipal field.

There is the Oedipus complex. This Oedipus complex is thought 163 of as representing a phase, and while maturity is present at a certain moment in the subject's evolution, the Oedipus complex is always there. But what Freud had himself put forward in the early stages of his work, five years after The Interpretation of Dreams, in Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, was likely to make it understood that what happens prior to the Oedipus complex also has its importance.

This assumes importance in Freud, to be sure, but via the Oedipus complex. It's just that at no point at that time was the notion of retroaction highlighted, the Nachträglichkeit of the Oedipus complex, to which as you know I am always insistently drawing your attention. This notion seemed to have escaped thought. People have only thought about the demands of the temporal past.

Certain parts of our field of experience refer especially to this field of pre-Oedipal stages in the subject's development – namely, perversion on the one hand, and psychosis on the other.

For some people, perversion was the primary, untouched state. We are no longer at that point, thank goodness. While in the early days this was a legitimate conception, at least in the name of an approximation to the question, it's certainly less so in our day. Perversion was essentially thought to be a pathology whose aetiology supposedly referred specifically to the pre-Oedipal field, a pathology conditioned by an abnormal fixation. It is, moreover, for this reason that perversion was only ever thought to be an inverted neurosis or, more precisely, a neurosis that hadn't been inverted, with the neurosis remaining patent. What in neurosis had been inverted was openly apparent in perversion. Because perversion had not been repressed, since it had not passed through the Oedipus complex, the unconscious was there, out in the open. It's a conception that nobody entertains any longer, which, however, doesn't mean that we have advanced any further.

I make the point, then, that questions of perversion and psychosis are grouped around the question of the pre-Oedipal field.

Everything that is involved here can now be clarified for us in a number of ways. Whether we are dealing with perversion or psychosis, it's always a matter of the imaginary function. Even without being particularly familiar with the use we make of the image here, each and every one of you is able to appreciate the special importance it has in these two registers – from quite different angles, of course. An endophasic invasion comprised of words heard doesn't have the troublesome, parasitic character of an image in a perversion, but, in both cases, it's a matter of pathological manifestations 164 in which the field of reality is profoundly disturbed by images.

The history of psychoanalysis shows us that our experience, the concern for coherence and the manner in which theory is constructed and makes sense have led to some occasionally profound disturbances to the field of reality by the invasion of the imaginary being attributed to the pre-Oedipal field. Moreover, the term 'imaginary' seems to render better service than the term 'fantasy', which would be unsuitable for talking about the psychoses and the perversions. An entire direction in analysis committed itself to the exploration of the pre-Oedipal field, even to the point that one could say that this is the direction in which all essential progress since Freud has been made.

In this respect I emphasize the paradox, essential to today's theme, of the testimony that Mrs Melanie Klein's work constitutes.

In any work, as with anything that is put into words, there are two levels. On the one hand, there is what she says, what she formulates in a discourse and what she wants to say, insofar as, if we separate the wanting and the saying, her intention is there in the meaning. And then, we would not be analysts in the sense in which I am trying to get you to hear things here, if we did not know that she sometimes says a little bit more beyond that. This is even habitually what our approach consists in – grasp what one is saying beyond what one means to say. Mrs Melanie Klein's work says things that are full of importance, but sometimes through nothing other than the internal contradictions of her texts, which may be subject to certain criticisms – which have been made. Then, there is also what she says without meaning to say it, and one of the most striking things in this respect is the following.

This woman has contributed views that are so profound and enlightening, not only about pre-Oedipal times, but about the children that she examines and analyses at a stage that, in a first approximation of the theory, is presumed to be pre-Oedipal. This analyst, who forcibly explores, in children, in terms it seems that are sometimes preverbal, almost at the emergence of speech – well then, the further back she goes into the supposedly pre-Oedipal time of history, the more she sees there, the more she always, all the time, permanently, sees the Oedipal question there.

Read her article on the Oedipus complex, specifically. She describes an extremely precocious stage of development, the so-called stage of the formation of bad objects, which is prior to the so-called paranoid-depressive phase and is bound up with the appearance of the mother's body in its totality. Listening to her, the predominant role in the evolution of the child's initial object relations is played by the insides of the mother's body as the centre 165 of the child's entire attention. Now, you will be surprised to observe that, basing herself on drawings, words and an entire reconstruction of the psychology of children at this stage, Mrs Melanie Klein testifies to us that amongst the bad objects present in the mother's body – including all the rivals, the bodies of brothers and sisters, past, present and future – there is, quite precisely, the father represented in the form of his penis.

This is indeed a discovery that merits our attention, since it's situated at the initial stages of imaginary relationships, to which the properly schizophrenic functions, and psychotic functions in general, can be attached. This contradiction is a highly valuable one, when Mrs Melanie Klein's intention was to go off and explore pre-Oedipal states. The further back she goes on the imaginary plane, the further back she discovers – very difficult to explain if we cling to a purely historical notion of the Oedipus complex – the appearance of the paternal third term, and this is so from the child's earliest imaginary phases. This is why I say that her work says more than she means to say.

Here, then, we have already defined two poles in the evolution of interest around the Oedipus complex – first, questions of the superego and neuroses without the Oedipus complex and, second, questions concerning disturbances that are produced in the field of reality.

The third pole, equally deserving of comment – the Oedipus complex's relationship with genitalization, as one says. This is not the same thing.

On the one hand – a point that so many explorations and discussions in history have moved into the background, but which always remains implicit in everything clinical – the Oedipus complex has a normative function, not simply in the subject's moral structure, nor in his relations with reality, but concerning the assumption of his sex, which, as you know, still retains a certain ambiguity in analysis. Moreover, the properly genital function is the object of a maturation that follows an initial sexual spurt in the order of the organic, for which an anatomical support has been sought in the double growth of the testicles and the creation of spermatozoa. The relationship between this organic growth and the existence of the Oedipus complex in the human species has remained a phylogenetic question over which a lot of obscurity hovers, to the point where nobody takes the risk of writing articles on the subject any more. But, actually, this question has been no less present in the history of analysis.

The question of genitalization is therefore twofold. There is, on 166 the one hand, growth which carries an evolution or a maturation. There is, on the other hand, in the Oedipus complex, the subject's assumption of his own sex – that is, to call things by their name, what makes it the case that a man assumes the virile type and that a woman assumes a certain feminine type, recognizes herself as a woman and identifies with her functions as a woman. Virility and feminization are the two terms that translate what is essentially the function of the Oedipus complex. Here we find ourselves at the level at which the Oedipus complex is directly tied to the function of the ego-ideal – it has no other meaning.

Here, then, are the three chapters into which you can classify every discussion that has been produced around the Oedipus complex and, consequently, around the function of the father – for they are one and the same thing. There is no question of the Oedipus complex if there is no father, and, inversely, to speak about the Oedipus complex is to introduce the function of the father as essential.

I will repeat for those who take notes. On the historical subject of the Oedipus complex, everything revolves around three poles – the Oedipus complex in relation to the superego, in relation to reality and in relation to the ego-ideal. The ego-ideal, to the extent that genitalization – insofar as it has been assumed – becomes an element in the ego-ideal. Reality, insofar as it concerns relations between the Oedipus complex and the afflictions that involve a disruption of the relationship to reality – perversion and psychosis.

I will summarize this on the blackboard, with an addition whose signification you will see later.

Superego	R.i
Reality	$S \leftarrow S'.r$
Ego-ideal	I.s

Now let's try and go a bit further.

Now that you have these broad, global groupings, underlined by history, amply present to assist you, we are going to move forward into the third chapter – the function of the Oedipus complex insofar as it directly affects the assumption of one's sex – and what has been so little clarified with respect to the castration complex.

We are happy enough to take things from the clinical angle and naively ask, concerning cases, 'And what about the father? What was he doing during that time? What was his involvement in the 167 situation?'

The question of the father's absence or presence, of his beneficial or harmful nature is clearly not hidden. We have even seen the term 'paternal deficiency' appear recently, which was not a minor topic to take on – knowing what people have said on the matter, and whether it holds up, is another question. But in the end, this paternal deficiency, whether known by this name or not, is a topic on today's agenda in the evolution of analysis that is becoming increasingly environmentalist, as it's elegantly expressed.

Not every analyst falls into this trap, thank goodness. A lot of analysts, if you bring them biographical information as interesting as, 'But the parents didn't get on, there was marital conflict and that explains everything', will answer, even those with whom we are not in agreement, 'So what? This proves absolutely nothing. We would expect no particular kind of effect', and they would be right.

That said, when one is seeking this paternal deficiency, what is one interested in concerning the father? Questions in the biographical register come flooding in. Was the father there or not? Did he travel? Was he away? Did he return often? And also – can an Oedipus complex be constituted in a normal manner when there is no father? These are questions that are very interesting in themselves, and I would say even more. It was from this angle that the first paradoxes were introduced, those that led to raising the questions that followed. It was then noticed that an Oedipus complex could be very well formed even when the father was not there.

At the very beginning, it was always thought that it was some excess in the father's presence, or excess in the father, that created all the dramas. This was the time when the image of the terrifying father was considered a damaging element. In neurosis, it was very soon observed that it was even more serious when he was too nice. We were slow to learn these lessons, and now we are at the other extreme, wondering about paternal deficiencies. There are weak fathers, submissive fathers, subjugated fathers, fathers castrated by their wife, and, finally, ill fathers, blind fathers, bankrupt fathers and whatever you want. We should nevertheless try to detect what can be extracted from such a situation and find the minimum of formulas that will enable us to move forward.

First of all, the question of his concrete presence or concrete absence, as someone in the surroundings. If we place ourselves at 168 the level at which these researches take place, that is to say at the level of reality, one can say that it's completely possible, conceivable, actualized and palpable in our experience that the father is there even when he isn't there, which should already encourage us to adopt a certain level of prudence in the use of the environmentalist point of view concerning the father's function. Even in cases in which the father isn't there, or the child has been left alone with its mother, completely normal Oedipus complexes – normal in both senses, normal as normalizing on the one hand, and also normal insofar as they denormalize, I mean by their neuroticizing effect, for example – are established in a manner that is exactly homogeneous with other cases. First point that should grab our attention.

Concerning the deficiency of the father, I would simply point out to you that one never knows in what respect the father is deficient. In certain cases, we're told he's too nice, which would seem to mean that he should be nasty. On the other hand, the fact that, manifestly, he can be too nasty, implies that it would perhaps be better if from time to time he were nice. In the end, we went around this little merry-go-round a long time ago. We discerned that the problem of the father's deficiency did not directly concern the child in question, but, as was obvious from the outset, that one could begin to say things that were a little more effective concerning this deficiency by taking it in the context of the place he has to occupy as a member of the fundamental trio of the family. But one did not, for all that, manage to formulate what was at stake any better.

I do not want to dwell on this at length, but last year we spoke about it with respect to little Hans. We saw the difficulties that we had in pinpointing where the deficiency of the paternal character lay, taken solely from the environmentalist point of view, whereas he was far from being deficient in his family – he was there, close to his wife, he fulfilled his role, he talked about things and she would tell him where to shove it a bit too often, but in the end he was very involved with his child, he was not absent, and so little absent that he even had his child analysed, which is the best outlook that one could expect from a father, at least in this sense.

It's worth coming back to the question of the father's deficiency, but one enters here into a world that is so much in movement that we should try to draw a distinction that makes it possible to see in what way the research falls down. It falls down, not because of what it finds, but because of what it seeks. I believe that the fault in the orientation is that one is confusing two things that have a relation-169 ship but are not to be confused – the father as normative and the father as normal. Of course, the father can be very denormativizing insofar as he himself isn't normal, but that is to reject the question at the level of structure – neurotic, psychotic – of the father. Therefore, the father's normality is one question, that of his normal position in the family is another.

The third point I put forward – his position in the family isn't to be confused with an exact definition of his normativizing role. Speaking of his deficiency in the family isn't the same as speaking of his deficiency in the complex. Effectively, to speak about his deficiency in the complex, we have to introduce another dimension than the realist dimension defined by his characterological, biographical or other mode of presence in the family.

It's in that direction that I am going to take my next step.

Now that you can see the current state of the question, more or less, I am going to attempt to introduce a little bit of order and get a broader view of these paradoxes. Let's now introduce the father's role more accurately. Since it's his place in the complex that can give an indication of the direction in which to move forward and establish a correct formulation, let's now investigate the complex and go back to the ABC of it.

At the outset, the terrifying father. Still, this image summarizes something much more complex, as the name indicates. The father intervenes at several levels. First, he prohibits the mother. That is the function and origin of the Oedipus complex. It's where the father connects to the primordial law of the prohibition of incest. It's this father, we are told, who is charged with representing this prohibition. Sometimes he has to directly, as when the child is too effusive, demonstrative or indulges in its inclinations, but he plays his role well beyond this. It's through his entire presence, through his effects in the unconscious, that he succeeds in prohibiting the mother. You are waiting for me to say, 'under the threat of castration'. It's true, it has to be said, but it's not so simple. It's understood that castration has a manifest role here, one that is increasingly confirmed. The link between castration and the law is essential, but let's see how this presents itself to us clinically. I feel obliged to remind you of this because my remarks produce all sorts of textual echoes in you.

Let's start with the boy. The relationship between the boy and his father is regulated – this is taken for granted – by the fear of 170 castration. What is this fear of castration? How are we to take it? We encounter it in the initial experience of the Oedipus complex, but in what form? We encounter it as a form of retaliation within an aggressive relationship. The aggression arises in the boy insofar as his privileged object, the mother, has been prohibited him and is directed towards the father. It returns to him as a function of the dual relationship, insofar as he imaginarily projects intentions onto the father that are equivalent to or reinforced in relation to his own but which find their point of departure in his own aggressive tendencies. In short, the fear experienced towards the father is clearly centrifugal – I mean it has its centre in the subject. This presentation agrees both with experience and with the history of analysis. It's from this angle that, as experience very quickly taught us, the effect of the fear experienced in the Oedipus complex with respect to the father has to be assessed.

Although castration is profoundly bound up with the symbolic articulation of the prohibition of incest, it appears, then, in our entire experience, and particularly with respect to those who are its privileged objects, namely neurotics, on the imaginary level. That is where it starts. It doesn't start with a commandment of the type that the law of Manu formulates – 'Whosoever should sleep with his mother shall cut off his genitals, and holding them in his right hand' – or left, I don't remember which very well – 'will go towards the west until he dies.' That's the law, but this law has not particularly, as such, reached the ears of our neurotics. In general, it's even somewhat left in the shadows. There are, moreover, other ways of dealing with it, but I do not have the time to spend on it today.

And so, the manner in which a neurotic embodies the castrating threat is bound up with imaginary aggression. It's retaliation. Just as Jupiter is quite capable of castrating Chronos, our little Jupiters fear that Chronos will do the job himself first.

Our examination of the Oedipus complex, the way it presents itself in experience, was introduced by Freud and has been articulated in theory, gives us something different again, which is the delicate question of the inverted Oedipus complex. I do not know if it seems self-evident to you, but in reading Freud's article, or any other article by any other author on the subject, whenever the question of the Oedipus complex arises, one is always struck by the extremely shifting, nuanced and disconcerting role that the function of the inverted Oedipus complex plays.

171 tion of the Oedipus complex – I mean, the element of love for the father cannot be avoided. It's what brings the Oedipus complex to an end, its dissolution, in a dialectic that remains very ambiguous between love and identification, identification as rooted in love. Identification and love, these are not the same thing – one can identify with someone without loving them, and vice versa – but the two terms are nevertheless closely tied to and absolutely indissociable from one another.

In Freud's article about the dissolution of the complex, 'Die Untergang des Ödipuskomplexes' ['The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex'], from 1924, read the explanation he gives of the final identification which is its outcome. It's insofar as the father is loved that the subject identifies with him and discovers the final solution to the Oedipus complex in a composite of amnesic repression and the acquisition within himself of this ideal term, owing to which he becomes the father. I am not saying that he is henceforth and immediately a little male, but he too can become someone, he already has the titles in his pocket, the matter in reserve, and when the time comes, providing things go well and the little piglets don't eat it, at the time of puberty he will have his penis all ready with its certificate – 'Daddy was there to confer it on me at the right moment'.

That's not how it happens if a neurosis declares itself, precisely because something's not in order in the title in question. However, the inverted Oedipus complex isn't so simple either. It's via the same pathway, that of love, that the position of inversion can be produced – namely, in lieu of a beneficial identification, the subject finds himself affected by a nice little passive position at the unconscious level which will reappear in due course, placing him in a kind of angle bisector – squeeze-panic. It's a position the subject is caught in, which he has discovered all alone, and it is quite advantageous. It consists in placing oneself in the right place to gain the favours of this redoubtable father who has forbidden so many things but who is otherwise quite nice – that is to say, getting him to love one. But since getting him to love one consists first of all in joining the ranks of women, and since one still retains one's little virile self-love, this position, as Freud explains, carries the danger of castration – hence this form of unconscious homosexuality that places the subject in a conflictual situation with multiple consequences. On the one hand, the constant return of the homosexual position with respect to the father and, on the other, its suspension, that is, its repression, by virtue of the threat of castration that this position entails.

None of this is simple. Well, we are trying to develop something that allows us to conceptualize it in a more rigorous manner and ask better questions in any given case.

So let's summarize. As before, the summary will consist of introducing a number of distinctions that serve as a prelude to realigning the point that isn't working. Already, earlier, we were getting to this – that the question has not been raised with respect to the ego-ideal. Let us also try here to carry out the reduction that we have 172 just started to undertake. I put the following to you – it's not too great a claim to say here and now that, here, the father comes to the position of intruder. And not simply because his sheer volume makes him an encumbrance, but because he prohibits. What does he prohibit, exactly?

Let's press on and draw some distinctions. Do we have to bring the emergence of the genital drive in and say that, in the first instance, he prohibits its real satisfaction? On the one hand, the latter seems to take place earlier. But it's also clear that something revolves around the fact that he prohibits the small child from making use of his penis at the time at which the tendencies of the said penis start to manifest themselves. We will say, therefore, that it's a question of prohibition by the father with respect to the real drive.

But why the father? Experience shows that the mother does too. Recall the observation of little Hans, where it's the mother who says, 'Put it away, you don't do that.' In general, it's most often the mother who says, 'If you keep on doing that, we will call the doctor who will cut it off.' It's therefore correct to point out that the father, as he who prohibits at the level of the real drive, isn't so essential. Let's return, in this connection, to what I contributed last year – as you see, these things always end up being useful – my table with three levels.

symbolic mother	frustration	real imaginary father	privation	symbolic

What is the issue at the level of the threat of castration? The issue is the real intervention of the father concerning an imaginary threat, R.i, since it's a fairly rare occurrence that he gets it cut off in reality. I point out to you that on this table castration is a symbolic act, the agent of which is someone real, the father or the mother who tells him, 'You will have it cut off', and whose object is an imaginary 173 object – if the child feels it has been cut off, it's because he imagines it. I point out to you that this is paradoxical. You could make the following objection – 'This is the actual level of castration, and you are telling me that the father isn't all that useful!' That is indeed what I am saying. Yes, it is.

Also, what does the father prohibit? This is the point we started with – he prohibits the mother. As object, she is his, she isn't the child's. This is the level at which this rivalry with the father, which engenders aggression quite by itself, is established. The father does indeed frustrate the child of its mother.

Here you have another level, that of frustration. Here, the father intervenes as having rights and not as a real person. Even if he isn't there, even if he calls the mother on the telephone, for example, the result is the same. Here it's the father as symbolic who intervenes and frustrates – an imaginary act concerning an object that is quite real, which is the mother insofar as the child needs her, S′.r.

Then we have the third level, that of privation, which intervenes in the articulation of the Oedipus complex. This level involves the father insofar as he is preferred by the mother, which is a dimension that you are absolutely obliged to bring into the final function, the one that results in the formation of the ego-ideal, $S \leftarrow S'.r$. It's inasmuch as the father becomes, in whatever way, through strength or weakness, an object that the mother prefers that the final identification can be established. The question of the inverted Oedipus complex and its function is established at this level. I would go even further – this is where the question of the difference of the effect of the complex upon the boy and the girl is centred.

Everything proceeds smoothly as far as the girl is concerned, and it's for this reason that the function of the castration complex is said to be asymmetrical for the boy and the girl. It's the entry that she finds difficult, whereas at the end the solution is made easier, since the father, as bearer of the phallus, has no difficulty in getting himself preferred over the mother. For the boy, on the other hand, it's a different matter, and this is where there remains a gap. How does the father get himself preferred over the mother insofar as this is how the exit from the Oedipus complex occurs? We find ourselves faced with the same difficulty we encountered with respect to the establishment of the inverted Oedipus complex. It seems to me as a consequence that, for the boy, the Oedipus complex is always the least normativizing, whereas, really, the implication of what we are told is that it's the most, because virility is assumed via identification with the father.

In the end, the problem is how, in the case of the boy, it comes about that the father's essential function of prohibition doesn't result in what is the very clear conclusion on the third level – 174 namely, the privation that is correlated with identification with the ideal, which tends to be produced for both boy and girl. It's to the extent that the father becomes her ego-ideal that the girl's recognition that she doesn't have the phallus occurs. But this is good for her – whereas for the boy it would be an absolutely disastrous outcome, as it sometimes is. Here, the agent is I, whereas the object is s – I.s.

In other words, at the time of the normativizing outcome of the Oedipus complex, the child recognizes not having – not truly having what he has, in the case of the boy, and what she doesn't have, in the case of the girl.

What happens at the level of identification with the ideal, a level at which the father gets the mother to prefer him, and not at all at the exit from the Oedipus complex, must literally result in privation. For the girl, this result is entirely admissible, and entirely conformizing, even though it's never completely achieved, for there always remains a little aftertaste, which is called Penisneid, proof that it doesn't really work rigorously. But in the case where it must work, if we stick to the schema, the boy should always be castrated. There is, therefore, something that doesn't work, that is missing in our explanation.

Let me now attempt to introduce the solution.

What is a father? I am not saying 'in the family', for in the family he is whatever he wants to be – he is a shadow, he is a banker, he is whatever he has to be, he is or he isn't it. This is of overriding importance sometimes, but it may also be of none at all. The question is entirely about what he is in the Oedipus complex.

Well then, there, the father isn't a real object, even if he has to intervene as a real object to embody castration. If he isn't a real object, what is he?

He isn't solely an ideal object either because, on that side of things, it's only accidents that can happen. Well, the Oedipus complex is, nevertheless, not solely a catastrophe since it's the foundation of our relationship to culture, as one says.

And so, naturally, you are going to tell me, 'The father is the symbolic father, you have already said as much.' In effect, I have already said it to you often enough for me not to repeat it to you today. What I am bringing you today is giving precisely a bit more precision to the notion of the symbolic father. It's this – the father is a metaphor.

What is a metaphor? Let's state it straight out and put it up on our table, which will enable us to rectify the difficult consequences 175 of the table. A metaphor, as I have already explained to you, is a signifier that comes to take the place of another signifier. I am saying that this is the father in the Oedipus complex, even if that must be astonishing to the ears of some people.

I am saying exactly this – the father is a signifier substituted for another signifier. That is the mainspring, the essential and unique mainspring, of the father's intervention in the Oedipus complex. And if you don't look for the paternal deficiencies at this level, you won't find them anywhere else.

The father's function in the Oedipus complex is to be a signifier substituted for the first signifier introduced into symbolization, the maternal signifier. According to the formula that, as I once explained to you, was the formula for metaphor, the father comes to the place of the mother, S in the place of S′, S′ being the mother insofar as she is already linked to something that was x, which is the signified in relationship to the mother.

The mother comes and goes. It's because I am a small being who is already caught up in the symbolic, because I have learnt to symbolize, that it's possible to say that she comes and goes. In other words, I perceive her or I do not perceive her, the world changes with her arrival, and it may disappear.

The question is – what is the signified? What does she want? I would really like it to be me that she wants, but it's very clear that it's not just me that she wants. There are other things at work in her. What is at work in her is the x, the signified. And the signified of the mother's comings and goings is the phallus.

The child, more or less shrewdly, or with more or less luck, may come to discern very early on what the imaginary x is and, once he has understood this, may make himself the phallus. But the imaginary way isn't the normal way. Moreover, it's for this reason that it leads to what one calls fixations. And also, this way isn't normal because in the end it's never pure, it's not completely accessible, it always leaves something that is approximate and unfathomable, even something dual, which makes for all the polymorphism of perversion.

What is the symbolic way? It's the metaphorical way. I will give 176 you the schema that will serve as our guide first and explain it to you later, since we have come more or less to the end of today's discussion – it's insofar as the father is substituted for the mother as signifier that the usual outcome of metaphor will be produced, the one that is expressed in the formula on the blackboard.

The intermediary signifying element falls, and the S enters into possession of the object of the mother's desire by way of the metaphor, which henceforth presents itself in the form of the phallus.

I am not saying that I am giving you the solution in an already transparent form. I am giving it to you in the form of its end result to show you where this is going. We shall see how one gets there and what the point of going there is – that is, everything that this solution resolves.

I leave you with this rough affirmation in your hands – my claim is that the entire question of the impasses of the Oedipus complex can be resolved if we regard the father's intervention as the substitution of one signifier for another signifier.

So as to begin to explain the thing to you a little bit, I will introduce a remark which, I hope, will nourish your dreams for the week.

A metaphor is located in the unconscious. Now, if there is one thing that is truly surprising, it's that no one discovered the unconscious earlier, since it has always been there and, moreover, it's still there. The fact of the matter is, no doubt, that one needed to know it on the inside in order to perceive that this place existed.

I would simply like to give you something with which you, who wander about the world as, I hope, so many apostles of my word, could introduce the question of the unconscious to people who have never heard it mentioned. You would say to them, 'How astonishing it is that ever since the world has been the world none of these people who call themselves philosophers has ever dreamt of producing' – at least not in the classical period, these days we 177 have lightened up a bit, but there is still some way to go – 'this essential dimension that I have spoken to you about under the name of "something Other".'

I have already spoken to you about the desire for something Other – not as you feel it at the moment, perhaps, the desire to go out and eat a sausage rather than listen to me, but at any rate, and whatever it's about, the desire for something Other as such.

This dimension isn't present solely in desire. It's present in many other states that are permanent. Wakefulness, for example, what do we call wakefulness? It's not something we think about enough. 'To be awake, so what?' you will tell me. Being awake is what Freud evokes in his study of President Schreber when he speaks to us about 'Before Dawn', a chapter of Nietzsche's Zarathustra. This is indeed the type of reference that reveals to us the extent to which Freud lived in this something Other. When I spoke to you formerly about the day, the peace of the evening and some other little things like that which more or less reached you, it was centred entirely on this suggestion. Before sunrise, is it really the sun that is going to appear? It's something Other that is latent, expected at the moment of waking.

And then, claustration. Isn't this an essential dimension? As soon as a man arrives somewhere, in the virgin forest or in the desert, he commences by closing himself in. If needs be, he'll put up two doors, like Cami, to get the air circulating between them. It's a matter of setting oneself up inside, but it's not simply a notion of interior and exterior; it's the notion of the Other, of what the Other is as such, of what is not the place in which one is shut off.

I would go even further – if you were to explore the phenomenology, as some might say, of claustration, you would realize to what extent it's absurd to limit the function of fear to a relationship with a real danger. The close relationship fear has with security should be obvious to you via the phenomenology of phobia. You would know that, for the phobic, his moments of anxiety occur when he observes that he has lost his fear, when you start to alleviate his phobia for him a little bit. It's at that moment that he will tell himself, 'This is not good. I no longer know at what places I have to stop. In losing my fear, I have lost my security.' In short, everything I said to you last year about little Hans.

There is also a dimension that you do not think about enough, I'm convinced of it, because you live in it as if it were the air you breathe – it's called boredom. You have perhaps never thought enough about the extent to which boredom is typically a dimension of this something Other that even manages to be formulated as such in the clearest of manners – you would like something Other. We 178 are happy to eat shit, but not always the same shit. These are types of diversion, formulated diversions, already symbolized, away from the essential relationship with something Other.

You are going to think that, all of a sudden, I am falling into romanticism and melancholy. You can see it – desire, claustration, wakefulness – I was on the point of offering a prayer while I was at it, why not? 'Where is he headed? Where's he going?' No, no.

I would like to end by drawing your attention to the various manifestations of the presence of something Other insofar as they are institutionalized. You can classify the human formations that men institute wherever they go, and everywhere they go, what we call collective institutions, according to the satisfaction they give to the different ways of relating to something Other.

As soon as man arrives somewhere, he builds a prison and a brothel – that is, the places where desire truly is – and he waits for something, a better world, a future world. He is there, he conducts a vigil, he waits for the revolution. But above all, above all, as soon as he arrives somewhere, it's excessively important that all his occupations ooze boredom. An occupation only begins to become serious when what constitutes it – that is to say, in general, regularity – has become perfectly boring.

Think in particular of everything in your analytic practice that has been very precisely set up to make you bored. Being bored, that's the key. A large part, at least, of what are called the technical rules to be observed by analysts are nothing other than the means for giving this occupation a guarantee of professional standards – but if you look very closely at things, you will see that it's insofar as they approve, sustain and maintain the function of boredom at the heart of practice.

That is a little introduction that doesn't yet introduce you to what I will be talking about next time when I will show you that it's at the level of this Other, as such, that the dialectic of the signifier is located and that it's from there that it's best to explore the function, the impact, the precise pressure and the inductor effect of the Name-of-the-Father, also as such.

THE THREE MOMENTS OF THE OEDIPUS COMPLEX (I)

From the Name-of-the-Father to the phallus
The key to the decline of the Oedipus complex Being and having Caprice and the law
The a-subject child

We will continue our examination of what I have been calling the paternal metaphor.

We got to the point where I was claiming that all possibilities of clearly articulating the Oedipus complex and its mainspring – namely, the castration complex – resided in the structure that I have been advocating as that of metaphor.

To those of you who might be astonished that I have come so late to formulating the question that has been so central in the theory and practice of analysis, I would reply that it was impossible to do so without having demonstrated to you, in various theoretical and practical areas, the deficiencies in the formulas that are commonly used in analysis and, above all, without having shown how it's possible to give more adequate formulas, as it were. To begin to formulate the problems, I first need to accustom you, for example, to think in terms of the subject.

What is a subject? Is it something that is purely and simply confused with the individual reality opposite you when you say 'the subject'? Or is it rather that, from the moment you get him to speak, something else is necessarily implied? What I mean is this. Is speech like an emanation floating above him, or does it develop? Does it, yes or no, by itself, impose a structure like the one I have been commenting on at length and familiarizing you with? A structure that says that once there is a speaking subject there is no longer any question of simply reducing the question of the subject's relations, insofar as he speaks, to an other, but that there is always a third party, the big Other, who is constitutive of the subject's position, insofar as he speaks, which is also to say, insofar as you analyse him.

180 This is not simply a supplementary theoretical requirement. It actually makes things easier when it comes to understanding where the effects you are dealing with are located, namely what happens when you encounter in a subject demands, desires, a fantasy – which is not the same thing – and, also, what, in short, seems to be the most uncertain and difficult to grasp and define of all, a reality.

We will get the chance to see this at the point we have now arrived at in explaining the term 'paternal metaphor'.

What is the paternal metaphor? Strictly speaking, in what has been constituted out of a primordial symbolization between child and mother, it's the substitution of the father as a symbol or signifier in the place of the mother. We shall see what the meaning of this 'in the place of the mother' is, which constitutes the turning point or the motor nerve essential to the Oedipus complex's forward movement.

The terms I set out for you last year concerning the child's relations with its mother are summarized in the imaginary triangle that I taught you how to use. Now, introducing the child–father–mother triangle as fundamental is bringing in something that is undoubtedly real, but that already places a symbolic relationship, I mean an established one, in the real. It places it objectively, as it were, insofar as we ourselves are able to make an object of it, are able to look at it.

The initial reality relationship takes shape between the mother and the child, and it's here that the child experiences the first realities of its contact with the living world. In order to describe the situation objectively, we will bring the father into the triangle, whereas for the child he has not yet made his entry.

The father, for us, is, he is real. But let's not forget that he is only real for us insofar as the institutions confer upon him, I am not even going to say his role and function as father – it's not a sociological question – but his name as father. That the father is, for example, the real agent of procreation is in no case a truth of experience. It so happens that at a time when analysts still discussed serious matters it was observed that, in some primitive tribe, procreation was attributed to, I don't know, a fountain, a stone or an encounter with a spirit in some far-off place. On this point Mr Jones

181 had made the remark, very relevant moreover, that it was entirely unthinkable that this truth of experience would elude intelligent beings – and we attribute a minimum of this intelligence to all human beings. It's quite clear that, barring exceptions – but exceptional exceptions – a woman does not give birth unless she has had coitus and, moreover, within a very precise timespan. But in making this particularly pertinent remark, Mr Ernest Jones was quite simply leaving out everything important in the matter.

What is important, in effect, is not that people know perfectly well that a woman can only bear a child if she has had coitus. It's that they acknowledge with a signifier that the one with whom she has had coitus is the father. For otherwise, in the way that the order of symbols is intrinsically constituted, absolutely nothing precludes the 'something' responsible for procreation from continuing to be maintained, in the symbolic system, as identical to whatever you like – that is, a rock, a fountain or an encounter with a spirit in some far-off place.

The father's position as symbolic doesn't depend on people's having more or less recognized the need for a certain sequence of events as different as coitus and giving birth. The Name-of-the-Father's position as such, the attribution of father as procreator, is something that is located at the symbolic level. It can be brought about in various cultural forms, but as such it does not depend on its cultural form. It's a requirement of the signifying chain. Merely by virtue of the fact that you institute a symbolic order, something corresponds to, or does not correspond to, the function defined as the Name-of-the-Father. And within this function you place significations that may be different according to the case, but which in no case depend on any other necessity than the necessity of the father's function, to which the Name-of-the-Father corresponds in the signifying chain.

I believe I have stressed this sufficiently already. Here, then, is what we can call the symbolic triangle, as it is instituted in the real when there is a signifying chain or the articulation of speech.

I'm saying that there is a relationship between this symbolic ternary and what I brought here last year in the form of the imaginary ternary to represent the child's relationship to the mother, insofar as the child finds itself dependent on the mother's desire, on the first symbolization of the mother as such, and nothing else. Through this symbolization, the child detaches its effective dependence on the mother's desire from the pure and simple lived experience of this dependence, and something that is subjectivized at an initial or primitive level is instituted. This subjectification consists simply in posing the mother as this primordial being who may 182 be there or not. In the child's own desire this being is essential. What does the subject desire? It's not simply a matter of appetition for the mother's care, contact or even her presence, but of appetition for her desire.

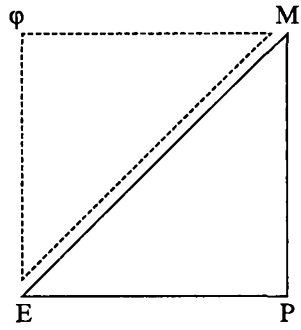
Immediately following this first symbolization in which the child's desire takes shape, all the subsequent complications of symbolization begin. As a result, a dimension opens up by which what the mother – as a being who lives in the world of symbols, a world in which symbols are present, a speaking world – objectively desires is inscribed virtually. Even if she only lives in it partially, or even if she is, as sometimes happens, a being ill-adapted to this world of symbols or who has refused certain elements within it, this primordial symbolization nevertheless opens up, for the child, the dimension of whatever else it is that the mother may desire on the imaginary plane.

This is how the desire for something Other that I spoke about last week makes its entry, in a manner that is still confused and completely virtual – not in the substantial manner that would enable it to be recognized in all its generality, as I did in the last seminar, but in a concrete manner. There is in her the desire for something Other than to satisfy my own desire, which is starting to pulse with life.

Down that path, there is both access and there is no access. In this relationship of illusion by which the first being reads or anticipates the satisfaction of his desires in the hint of a movement in the other, in this dual adaptation of image to image which occurs in all interanimal relations, how are we to conceptualize that what is Other in what the subject desires is able to be read therein as in a mirror, as it's expressed in Scripture?

Surely, it's both difficult to think about and too difficult to bring about, since this is the whole issue around what happens at this primitive level of a switch point for perversions. It's difficult to bring about, in the sense that it's brought about in a faulty way, though it's brought about nevertheless. It's certainly not brought about without the intervention of a little more than the primordial symbolization of this mother who comes and goes, whom one calls when she is not there and whom, when she is there, one pushes away so that one can call her back again. This something extra, which must be there, is precisely the existence behind her of this entire symbolic order on which she depends, and which, since it's always there more or less, permits a degree of access to the object of her desire, which is already such a specialized object and so marked with the necessity the symbolic system institutes that in its prevalence it's absolutely unthinkable in any other way.

183 This object is called the phallus, and it's what I made our entire dialectic of the object relation revolve around last year.



Why? Why would this object be necessary in this place unless it was privileged in the symbolic order? This is the question I want to enter into now in greater detail.

In this drawing there is a relationship of symmetry between 'phallus', which is here, at the vertex of the imaginary ternary, and 'father', at the vertex of the symbolic ternary. As we will see, there is not simply a symmetry here, but rather a connection. How is it that I can already claim that this connection is metaphorical in kind?

Well, this is precisely what takes us to the dialectic of the Oedipus complex. Let's try to articulate what is at issue step by step, as Freud did and as others have done after him.

Not everything is always completely clear therein, nor clearly symbolized. We shall try to go further, and not just for the satisfaction of our intellect. If we articulate step by step the genesis, if I can use this term, that makes the position of the signifier of the father in the symbolic foundational for the position of the phallus on the imaginary plane, if we can manage to clearly distinguish the logical moments, as it were, of the constitution of the phallus on the imaginary plane as a privileged and predominant object, and if, as a result of these distinctions, we are better able to orient ourselves and better able to question the patients we interview, the meaning of our clinical work and the management of the treatment, then we shall regard our efforts as justified. Given the difficulties we encounter in our clinical work, interviews and examinations and in the management of the therapy, these efforts are justified in advance.

Take this desire of the Other, which is the mother's desire, and which contains something beyond. Just reaching this beyond alone requires mediation, and this mediation is given precisely by the 184 father's position in the symbolic order.

Rather than proceeding dogmatically, let's think about the way in which the question arises in concrete terms. We shall see that there are very different states, cases and also stages where the child identifies with the phallus. That was the point of the course we adopted last year. We showed an exemplary perversion in fetishism, in the sense that the child there has a particular relationship with the object of what lies beyond in the mother's desire, whose predominance and value of excellence, as it were, he has observed and to which he attaches himself to by way of an imaginary identification with the mother. I also pointed out that in other forms of perversion, and notably in transvestism, it's in the contrary position that the child assumes the difficulty of the imaginary relation with the mother. It has been said that he identifies himself with the phallic mother. I think it's more correct to say that he identifies with the phallus as hidden under the mother's clothing.

I am giving you this reminder to show you that the child establishes a relationship to the phallus insofar as it is the object of the mother's desire. Moreover, experience proves to us that this element plays an active and essential role in the child's relations with the parental couple. I recalled this last time at the theoretical level in the commentary on the decline of the Oedipus complex in relation to the so-called inverted Oedipus complex. Freud emphasizes cases where the child identifies with the mother and, having adopted this position that is both significant and promising, fears the consequences – namely, the privation of his virile organ that will result from it for him, if he's a boy.

This is indicative, but it goes much further. Analytic experience proves that the father, as the one who deprives the mother of the object of her desire, namely the phallic object, plays an absolutely essential role in, I won't say the perversions, but in every neurosis and in the entire course, even the easiest and most normal, of the Oedipus complex. In experience, you will always find that the subject has adopted a position of a particular kind, at a moment of his childhood, towards the role the father plays in the fact that the mother does not have a phallus. This moment is never left out.

The reminder I gave last time left the question of the favourable or unfavourable outcome of the Oedipus complex suspended around the three planes of castration, frustration and privation exercised by the father. It's the level of privation that we are concerned with here. At this level, the father deprives someone of what, 185 in the final analysis, he does not have, namely something that only exists insofar as you bring it into existence as a symbol.

It's quite clear that the father does not castrate the mother of something that she does not have. For it to be posited that she does not have it, it has to have already been projected onto the symbolic plane as a symbol. But it's well and truly privation, given that every real privation requires symbolization. It's therefore at the level of privation of the mother that at a given moment of the evolution of the Oedipus complex the question arises for the subject whether to accept, register, symbolize for himself and render meaningful this privation of which the mother proves to be the object. The child subject either assumes or does not assume this privation, accepts or refuses it. This point is an essential one. You will rediscover it at every crossroads, whenever your experience takes you to a certain point that I am now trying to define as nodal in the Oedipus complex.

Let's call it a nodal point, since this has just occurred to me. I am not essentially committed to it. What I mean by it is that it does not coincide, far from it, with this moment to which we are seeking the key, which is the dissolution of the Oedipus complex, its result and the fruit it bears in the subject – namely, the child's identification with the father. But there is the earlier moment at which the father enters into his function as depriver of the mother – that is, he is profiled behind the mother's relationship to the object of her desire as 'that which castrates', but I am only putting it there in quotes because what is castrated, in the event, is not the subject. It's the mother.

This point is not very new. What is new is to focus on it and for you to turn your gaze towards this point insofar as it makes it possible for us to understand what comes before, about which we already have some enlightenment, and what follows.

Don't be in any doubt about it, and you will be able to verify it and confirm it whenever you have occasion to see it. Experience proves that, insofar as the child does not cross this nodal point, that is to say, does not accept the privation of the phallus carried out on the mother by the father, he maintains, as a rule – it's a correlation grounded in the structure – a certain kind of identification with the mother's object, this object that I present to you from the outset as a rival object, to use the term that comes up here, and this is so whether it's a question of phobia, neurosis or perversion. This is a point of reference – there is perhaps no better word – around which you are able to regroup the elements of the observations by asking yourself this question in each particular case – what is the special configuration of the relationship to the mother, the father and the phallus that makes it the case that the child does not accept that the mother is deprived of the object of her desire by the father? To 186 what extent is it necessary in any given case to emphasize the fact that, in correlation with this relationship, the child maintains its identification with the phallus?

There are degrees, of course, and this relationship is not the same in neurosis, psychosis and perversion. But the configuration is nodal in every case. At this level, the question that arises is, 'To be or not to be*' the phallus? On the imaginary plane, the question for the subject is one of being or not being the phallus. The phase that is to be passed through places the subject in the position of choosing.

Put this 'choosing' in quotes, moreover, since the subject is as much passive as active there, for the good reason that he is not the one pulling the strings of the symbolic. The sentence started before him, it was started by his parents, and what I am leading you towards is, precisely, the relationship each of these parents has with this sentence that has been started and with the way it's agreed that this sentence is supported by a certain reciprocal position of the parents in relation to this sentence. But let's say, because it's necessary to express oneself, that, in the neuter, there is an alternative between being and not being the phallus.

You get the sense that there is a huge step required to understand the difference between this alternative and the one in question at another moment, and which, all the same, we do have to expect to find, which is that of 'to have or have not' – to draw on another literary reference. In other words, having or not having the penis is not the same thing. Between the two, there is the castration complex, let's not forget. What is at issue in the castration complex is never articulated and is made almost completely mysterious. We know, however, that the following two facts depend on it – that on one side the boy becomes a man, that on the other side the girl becomes a woman. In both cases, the question of having or not having is settled by the intermediary of the castration complex – even for him who in the end has the penis by right, that is, the male. This presupposes that, in order to have it, there must have been a time at which he didn't have it. What is involved would not be called the castration complex if, in some way, it didn't put in the foreground the fact that in order to have it, it first of all has to be the case that one might not have it – so much so that the possibility of being castrated is essential to assuming the fact of having the phallus.

This is a step that has to be taken, and it's one where at some moment the father has to intervene effectively, really and efficaciously.

Till now, as the direction of what I have been saying suggests, I have only been able to speak to you from the point of view of the subject, saying to you, 'He accepts or does not accept, and if he does not accept, that leads him, man or woman, to being the phallus.' But now, for the following step, it's essential to have the father intervene effectively. I'm not saying that he wasn't already intervening effectively before, but till now I've been able to leave him in the background of what I've been saying and I could even have left him out altogether. And now that it's a question of having it or not having it, we are obliged to bring him into consideration. First of all, I would emphasize that, along with the subject, he needs to be constituted as a symbol. For if he isn't, no one will be able to actually intervene under the sign of this symbol. It's as a real person under the sign of this symbol that he will now effectively intervene at the next stage.

What can we say about this real father as the conveyor of a prohibition? I have already pointed out that, regarding the prohibition of the first appearance of the sexual instinct as it comes to its initial maturity in the subject, when the latter starts to draw attention to his tool, even displays it and offers its good offices to the mother, the father is not necessary. I would go even further – when the subject exhibits himself to his mother and propositions her, which is a moment still very close to that of imaginary identification with the phallus, what occurs unfolds most of the time – as we saw last year with respect to little Hans – on the plane of imaginary deprecation. The mother is quite capable of showing the child to what extent what he offers her is insufficient, and she is also capable of placing a prohibition on the use of his new tool.

However, the father enters into play – this is not in doubt – as the vehicle of the law and prohibitor of the mother as object. This is fundamental, as we know, but it's completely separate from the question that is actually brought into play for the child. We know that the father's function, the Name-of-the-Father, is bound up with the prohibition of incest, but nobody has ever dreamt of placing the fact that the father actually promulgates the law of prohibition of incest in the foreground of the castration complex. It's said sometimes, but it's never articulated by the father qua legislator ex cathedra, as it were. He is an obstacle between the child and its mother. He is the vehicle of the law, but de jure, whereas de facto he intervenes in a different way, and it's also in a different way that his failures to intervene manifest themselves. This is what we are examining close up. In other words, insofar as culturally he is the vehicle 188 of the law, insofar as he is invested with the signifier of the father, the father intervenes in the Oedipus complex in a more concrete, more graduated manner, as it were, and this is what I want to spell out today. This is the most difficult level at which to understand anything, whereas it is, however, the level where, we are told, the key to the Oedipus complex, namely its outcome, is found.

This is where the little schema I was commenting on for you in the first trimester – so massively boring for some of you, it seems – turns out, however, not to have been completely useless.

I remind you what one must always come back to – it's only after having traversed the already constituted order of the symbolic that the subject's intention – by which I mean his desire once it has passed over to the state of a demand – encounters what he addresses himself to, which is his object, his primordial object, namely his mother. Desire is something articulated. The world it enters into and progresses through, this world, this world here below, is not simply an Umwelt in the sense that one can find a way to satiate one's needs in it, but a world in which speech reigns, and this submits the desire of each of us to the law of the desire of the Other. The young subject's demand more or less satisfactorily crosses the line of the signifying chain, which is here, latent and already structuring. By this fact alone, the first test that he undergoes in his relationship with the Other, he undergoes with this first Other that is his mother, insofar as he has already symbolized her. It's insofar as he has already symbolized her that he addresses her in a manner that is articulated regardless of how much of a squawk it is, for this first symbolization is linked to the first articulations we have located in the Fort-Da. It's therefore insofar as this intention, or this demand, has traversed the signifying chain that it can come to the attention of the maternal object.

Therefore, the child who has made its own mother a subject on the basis of the first symbolization finds itself entirely subject to what we can call, but purely in advance, the law. This is only a metaphor. We have to unpack the metaphor contained in the term, 'the law', if we are to give it its proper place when I use it.

The mother's law is, of course, the fact that the mother is a speaking being, and this suffices to justify saying 'the mother's law'. Nevertheless, this law is, if I may say so, an uncontrolled law. It consists simply in the fact, at least for the subject, that something in his desire is completely dependent upon something else that is doubtless already articulated as such and is of the order of the law, but it is a law that lies entirely within the subject that supports it, namely within the good or bad will of the mother, the good or bad mother.

189 This is why I am about to propose a new term to you which, as you will see, is not as new as all that, since you only need to force it a little and it will join up with something that language has discovered, and not by chance.

Let's begin with the principle I am proposing here, which is that there is no subject unless there are signifiers that found it. It's insofar as primary symbolizations have been formed by the signifying couple Fort-Da that the mother is the first subject. In the light of this principle, what can we say about the child at the start of its life? One wonders whether for the child there is a reality or not, autoerotism or not. You will see things become especially clear as soon as you centre your questions on the child as a subject from whom demand emanates and in whom desire forms – and all analysis is a dialectic of desire.

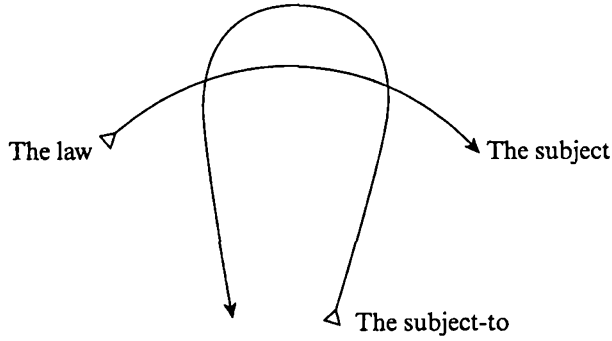
Well then, I say that the child takes shape as a 'subject-to'. He is a subject-to because he experiences himself and feels himself initially as profoundly subject-to the capriciousness of what he is dependent on, even if this capriciousness is articulated capriciousness.



What I am proposing is a necessity in all our experience, and I will illustrate it by taking the first example that comes to mind. Last year you could see how little Hans found an atypical solution to his Oedipus complex, which is not the outcome that I am about to try to describe, but a suppletion. Effectively, he needs his all-purpose horse as a suppletion for everything that he lacks during this time of transition, which is nothing other than the stage of assuming the symbolic in the form of the Oedipus complex, which is where I am taking you today. His suppletion is, then, this horse which is at one and the same time the father, the phallus, the little sister and whatever else you want, but which essentially corresponds to what I am about to show you now.

Remember how it ends for him, and how this ending is symbol- 190
ized in the final dream. What he summons to the father's place is this imaginary and all-powerful being called a plumber. The plumber is precisely there to desubjectify something, for little Hans's anxiety is essentially, as I told you, the anxiety of subjectification. Literally, at a certain moment, he realizes that in being subjected in this way, there's no knowing where it might lead. You remember the schema of the carts that come and go, and which embody the core of his fear.

It's precisely from this moment on that little Hans establishes in his life a number of centres of fear around which the re-establishment of his sense of security will revolve. Fear, which is something that has its source in the real, is a component of a child's security. He uses his fears to provide a beyond to this anxiety-provoking subjectification that he produces when the lack of this external domain, this other plane, appears. Something to make him afraid has to emerge if he is not to be purely and simply a subject-to.

Here it's appropriate to observe that this Other to whom he addresses himself – specifically, the mother – has a relationship with the father. Everyone realizes that many things depend on her relations with the father, especially when – experience has shown this to be the case – the father fails to play his role, as they say. I don't need to remind you that last week I spoke about all the types of paternal deficit concretely designated in terms of interhuman relations. Our experience effectively requires that this is how it is, but no one fully formulates what is involved. It's not so much a question of the mother's relations with the father, in the vague sense in which there would be a kind of rivalry of prestige between them, one that is supposed to converge upon the subject of the child. Undoubtedly, this schema of a convergence is not false, and that there be two is more than a requirement – without them there could not be this ternary. But this is not sufficient, even if what happens between the two, as everybody admits, is essential.

We come, then, to these bonds of love and respect around which some people make the entire analysis of the case of little Hans revolve, namely – was the mother nice, affectionate enough towards the father, and so on? And we fall back into the rut of environmental sociological analysis. Now, it's not so much a question of the personal relations between the father and the mother, nor whether they are each up to the task or not, as it is of a moment that has to be lived through as such, concerning the relations, not simply of the 191 person of the mother to the person of the father, but of the mother with the father's speech – with the father insofar as what he says is not completely equivalent to nothing.

What matters is the function in which three things intervene – first, the Name-of-the-Father, second, the father's spoken words, third, the law insofar as the father has a more or less intimate relationship to it. What is essential is that the mother establish the father as the mediator of what lies beyond her law and her capriciousness – namely, the law as such, purely and simply. It is, therefore, a question of the father qua Name-of-the-Father, closely tied to the declaration of the law, as the entire development of the Freudian doctrine declares and promises. This is the respect in which he is accepted or not accepted by the child as the one who deprives or does not deprive the mother of the object of her desire.

In other words, in order to understand the Oedipus complex, we must consider three moments that I am going to try to schematize for you with the help of our little diagram from the first trimester.

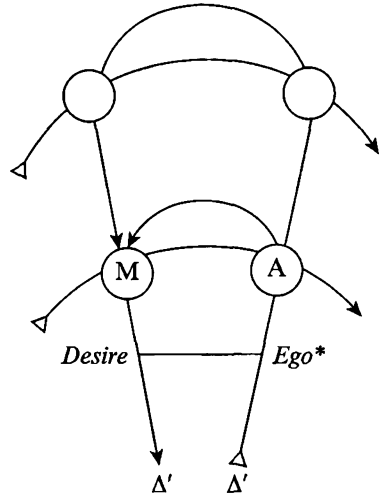
First moment. What the child is seeking, qua desire for desire, is to be able to satisfy the mother's desire, that is to say, 'to be or not to be' the object of the mother's desire. He therefore introduces his demand, here, in Δ.



The fruit or result of this will appear here, in Δ'. Two points 192 are plotted on this path – one that corresponds to the ego* and, opposite, one that here is his other, with which he identifies, this something other that he is going to seek to become, namely the object that satisfies the mother. As soon as something begins to stir at the base of his stomach, he will start to show it to his mother, a matter of finding out 'what I am capable of', with the disappointments that ensue. He will seek it and he will find it, insofar as the mother is questioned by the child's demand. She herself is also pursuing her own desire, and its components are located somewhere thereabouts.

At the first moment and first stage, it is, then, a matter of the following – the child identifies in the mirror with the object of the mother's desire. This is the primitive phallic stage, the one in which the paternal metaphor per se acts inasmuch as the primacy of the phallus is already instituted in the world by the existence of symbols, discourse and the law. But the child himself is only ever aware of its outcome. In order to please the mother, if you will allow me to go quickly and employ words of imagery, it's necessary and sufficient to be the phallus. At this stage, many things come to a halt and in a certain sense become fixed. Depending on the more or less satisfactory way the message at M is realized, a number of disturbances and perturbations can be established, including the identifications I have been calling perverse.

Second moment. I told you that on the imaginary plane the father definitely intervenes as the depriver of the mother, which means that the demand addressed to the Other, provided it's relayed as it should be, is referred to a higher court, if I may express myself in these terms.

What the subject effectively questions the Other about, provided he traverses it completely, will always encounter in the Other, in some ways, the Other of the Other, that is, its own law. At this level, what occurs is what brings it about that what comes back to the child is purely and simply the law of the father, insofar as the subject imaginarily construes it as depriving the mother. This is the nodal and negative face, as it were, by which what detaches the subject from his identification at the same time reattaches him to the initial appearance of the law in the form of the fact that the mother is dependent upon an object that is no longer simply the object of her desire, but an object that the Other either has or does not have.

The close connection between the mother's deferral to a law that is not hers but an Other's and the fact that the object of her desire is in reality sovereignly possessed by this same Other to whose law 193 she defers provides the key to the Oedipal relation. What gives it its decisive character is to be identified as a relation, not to the father, but to the father's speech.

Recall little Hans from last year. The father is as nice as can be, he is as present as can be, he is as intelligent and as friendly towards little Hans as can be. He does not seem to have been an idiot at all. He took little Hans to Freud, which at the time really was proof of an enlightened mind, and yet he is nevertheless totally inoperative, insofar as what he says is exactly as if he were whistling in the dark – I mean as far as the mother is concerned. This is perfectly clear, whatever the relations were between the two parental characters.

Observe that the mother is in an equivocal position in relation to little Hans. She prohibits, she plays the castrating role that one might see attributed to the father on the real plane and says to him, 'Don't touch it, it's disgusting' – which does not prevent her, on the practical level, from admitting him into her intimacy, and not only allowing him to retain the function of her imaginary object, but encouraging him to do it. He effectively renders her the greatest of services, he well and truly incarnates her phallus for her, and thus finds himself maintained in the position of 'subject-to'. He is 'subjected to', and that's the whole source of his anxiety and his phobia.

This is a problem to the extent that the father's position is called into question by the fact that his speech does not lay down the law to the mother. But that's not all – it seems that in the case of little Hans what should occur at the third moment fails to. That's why I emphasized last year that the outcome of the Oedipus complex in the case of little Hans was skewed. Although, thanks to his phobia, he came through it, his love life will remain completely marked by this imaginary style the repercussions of which I showed you in the case of Leonardo de Vinci.

The third stage is as important as the second, for the outcome of the Oedipus complex depends on it. The father testified that he was giving the phallus insofar as, and only insofar as, he is the bearer, or the supporter, if I may put it like that, of the law. Whether the maternal subject possesses this phallus or not depends on him. Now that the stage of the second moment has been traversed, it's necessary, at the third moment, that the father deliver what he has promised. He can give or he can refuse to give, insofar as he has the phallus, but he must give proof that he has it. It's insofar as he intervenes at the third moment as the one who has, and not who is, the phallus that the shift can occur that restores the instance of the phallus as the mother's desired object and no longer only as an object of which the father can deprive one.

It's the all-powerful father who is the depriver. That's the second 194 moment. It's at this phase that the analyses of the Oedipus complex ceased at the time it was thought that all the ravages of the complex depended upon the father's omnipotence. One was only thinking of this second moment, except that no one emphasized that the castration that is in operation here is the privation of the mother and not the child.

The third moment is this – the father is able to give the mother what she desires and can give it to her because he has it. Here, then, the fact of potency in the genital sense of the word intervenes – let's say that the father is a potent father. By dint of this fact, the mother's relationship to the father moves back onto the real plane.

The identification with the paternal instance that may occur has, therefore, been achieved here in these three moments.

First, the paternal instance is introduced in a veiled, or not yet apparent, form. This does not prevent the father from existing in mundane reality, I mean in the world, by virtue of the fact that the law of the symbol reigns therein. By virtue of this fact, the question of the phallus is already posed somewhere in the mother, which is where the child has to locate it.

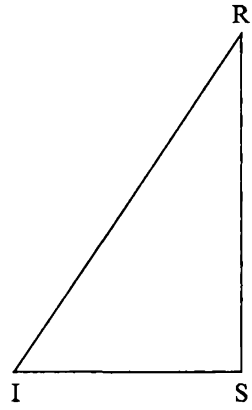
Second, the father affirms himself in his privative presence, insofar as he is the one who supports the law, and this no longer happens in a veiled manner but in a manner mediated by the mother, who accords him the place of the one who lays down the law to her.

Third, the father is revealed as having it. This is the exit from the Oedipus complex. The exit is favourable insofar as the identification with the father occurs at this third moment, where he intervenes as the one who has it. This identification is called 'the ego-ideal'. It's inscribed on the symbolic triangle at the pole where the child is located, insofar as it's at the maternal pole that everything that will subsequently become reality starts to form, whereas it's at the level of the father that everything that will subsequently become the superego starts to form.



195 At the third moment, then, the father intervenes as real and potent. This moment succeeds the privation, or castration, that bears upon the mother, the imagined mother, in her own imaginary position of dependency at the level of the subject. It's insofar as the father intervenes as the one who has it that he is internalized in the subject as ego-ideal, and that, henceforth, let's not forget, the Oedipus complex declines.

What does that mean? It doesn't mean that the child is going to enter into possession of all his sexual powers and deploy them, as you well know. On the contrary, he does not deploy them at all, and one could say that he is apparently disappointed by the deployment of the functions that had begun to awaken. Nevertheless, if what Freud formulated makes any sense, the child has all the titles in his pocket for later use. The paternal metaphor plays a role here, which is precisely the role we would expect from a metaphor – it results in the institution of something which is of the order of signifiers, which is there in reserve and whose signification will develop later. The child has all the entitlements for being a man, and what may be challenged in him later, at the time of puberty, is to be referred to something that has not entirely fulfilled the metaphorical identification with the image of the father, insofar as it has formed across these three moments.

I point out to you that this means that, insofar as he is virile, a man is always more or less his own metaphor. This is even what places this touch of ridicule, which should be mentioned all the same, upon the term 'virility'.

I should also point out that the outcome of the Oedipus complex is, as everyone knows, different for the woman. For her, in effect, this third stage, as Freud emphasizes – read his article on the decline of the Oedipus complex – is much simpler. She does not have to carry out this identification nor retain this title to virility. She knows where it is, and she knows where she has to go to get it. It's on the side of the father and she goes to him as having it.

This is also indicative of the respect in which femininity, true femininity, always has a bit of a dimension of escape. True women always have something a little lost about them.

I only make this suggestion so as to stress the concrete dimension of this development.

Today, this is still only a diagram, as you will be well aware. We will return to each of these three stages, and we will see what we can add to them. I will conclude by justifying my term 'metaphor'.

Note that what is at stake here is, at the most fundamental level, 196 exactly the same thing as the long metaphor common in the field of mania. Effectively, the formula that I have given you of metaphor means nothing but this – that there are two chains, the Ss of the upper level, which are signifiers, while underneath one finds all the wandering signifieds that are circulating because they are always sliding around. The pinning down I have spoken about, the quilting point, is only a mythical affair, for nobody has ever managed to pin a signification to a signifier. On the other hand, what one can do, is pin one signifier to another signifier and see what happens. In this case, something new is always produced, which is sometimes as unexpected as a chemical reaction – namely, a new signification emerges.

The father is the signifier in the Other that represents the existence of the locus of the signifying chain as law. He places himself, if I may say so, above the signifying chain.

The father is in a metaphorical position inasmuch as, and solely to the extent that, the mother makes him the one who, by his presence, sanctions the existence as such of the locus of the law. Immense latitude is therefore left to the modes and means by which this can be realized, and this is why it is compatible with diverse concrete configurations.

On account of this, the third moment of the Oedipus complex can be gone through, which is the stage of identification at which, for the boy, it's a question of identifying with the father as possessor of the penis and, for the girl, of recognizing the man as the one who possesses it.

We will continue this next time.

THE THREE MOMENTS OF THE OEDIPUS COMPLEX (II)

Male homosexuality in the clinical field

I've been talking about the paternal metaphor. I hope you have noticed that I am talking about the castration complex. It's not because I am talking about the paternal metaphor that I am talking about the Oedipus complex. If my remarks were centred on the Oedipus complex, that would introduce an enormous number of questions, and I can't say everything at once.

The schema I brought you last time brings together what I have tried to get you to understand under the heading of the three moments of the Oedipus complex. What is at stake, I stress this for you at every moment, is a structure that is formed somewhere else than in the subject's own experiences and into which he has to insert himself. Other people may take an interest in this on a number of counts. Let the psychologists who project individual relations in the interhuman, interpsychological or social field into the tensions within groups attempt to inscribe that on this schema, if they can. Likewise, sociologists will have to take into account the structural relations that make up our common measure, for the simple reason that it is the ultimate basis and that the very existence of the Oedipus complex cannot be justified socially – I mean, cannot be founded on any social teleology. As for us, we find ourselves in the position of having to see how a subject is introduced into the relation that is the Oedipus complex.

It wasn't I who discovered that he is not introduced into it without a leading role being played by the male sexual organ. The latter is the centre, the pivot and the object of everything that refers to this order of events – quite confused and very poorly discerned events, it has to be said – that one calls the castration complex. Everyone continues to refer to it just as much, in terms that, surprisingly, don't produce greater dissatisfaction amongst the public.

198 As for me, in this sort of psychoanalytic diatribe that I am engaged in here, I am trying to give you a letter that will not cloud over. I mean that I am trying to use concepts to differentiate the various levels that are involved in the castration complex.

It has come into play both at the level of a perversion that I would describe as primary, on the imaginary plane, and at that of a perversion that we will perhaps talk a bit more about today, and which is intimately bound up with the end of the Oedipus complex, namely, homosexuality.

To try to show this clearly, I will return, since it's fairly new, to the way I formulated the Oedipus complex for you last time, focusing on the phenomenon linked to the particular function as object that the male sexual organ plays therein. Once I have gone back over this ground and clarified it, I will show you, as I told you, that this throws light on the familiar but poorly situated phenomena of homosexuality.

On the schemas I've been giving you, which are extracted from the heart of our experience, I am trying to create a number of moments. They are not necessarily chronological moments, but that doesn't matter, since logical moments also can only unfold in a particular sequence.

You have therefore, in a first moment, as I have told you, the child's relation, not, as people say, with the mother, but with the mother's desire. It's a desire for a desire. I have become aware that this is not such a common formulation, and that some of you have been having a bit of trouble getting used to the notion that desiring something is different from desiring a subject's desire. What needs to be understood is that this desiring a desire implies that one is dealing with the primordial object, which is the mother, and that she has been constituted in such a way that her desire can be desired by another desire, namely, the child's.

Where do we put the dialectic of this first stage? The child is particularly isolated and bereft of everything but the desire for this Other whom he has already constituted as the Other capable of being present or absent. Let's try to get a good grip on what the child's relation is with what is at issue, namely the object of the mother's desire. What has to be traversed is this D, namely the mother's desire, the desire that is desired by the child, D (D). The question is knowing how he is going to be able to reach this object when the latter is constituted in an infinitely more elaborate way at 199 the level of the mother who is a bit more advanced in existence than the child.

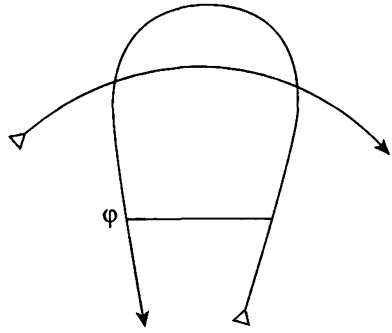
I have suggested that this object is the phallus as the pivot of the entire subjective dialectic. It is the phallus insofar as it is desired by the mother. From the point of view of structure, there are several different states in the mother's relationship to the phallus. It plays a primordial role in the subjective structuring of the mother and it can be in different states as an object – it is even what makes what comes next so complicated. But for the moment, we will limit ourselves to taking it as it is, because we think we are only able to introduce order and a correct perspective on everything that is an analytic phenomenon by starting out from the structure and circulation of signifiers. If our reference points are always stable and certain, it's because they are structural and because they are linked to the pathways of signifying constructions. This is what we use to guide ourselves, and it's why we don't otherwise have to be particularly worried here about what the phallus is for an actual mother in a specific case. No doubt there are distinctions to be made here. We'll come back to this.

If we simply place our trust in our customary little schema, the phallus is located here, and it is a metonymic object.



We can settle for situating it amongst signifiers here – it is a metonymic object. Because of the existence of the signifying chain, it will in any case circulate, like the ferret, everywhere amongst the signifieds – being, amongst the signifieds, what results from the existence of signifiers. Our experience shows us that this signified plays a major role for the subject – that of universal object.

That's the surprising thing. It's what creates a scandal for those who would like the situation concerning the sexual object to be symmetrical for both sexes. Just as the man has to discover the use of his implement and then adapt to a series of experiences, it should be 200 the same for the woman, namely that the cunnus be at the centre of her entire dialectic. This is not at all the case, and it's precisely what analysis has discovered. This is the best ratification of the fact that there is a field that is the field of analysis, which isn't that of a more or less vigorous instinctual development that on the whole is superimposed on anatomy, that is, on the real existence of individuals.

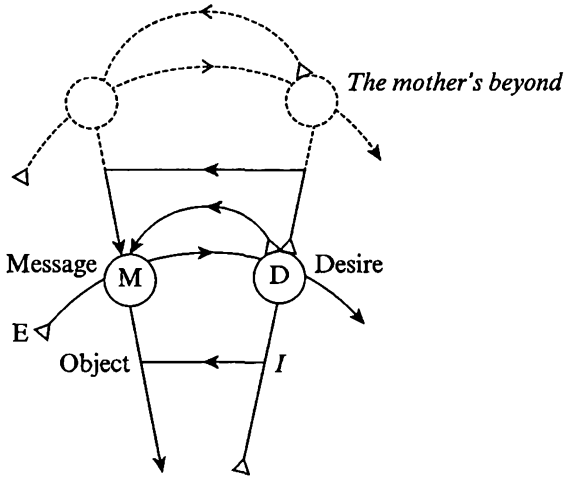
How are we to understand the fact that the child who has the desire to be the object of the mother's desire arrives at satisfaction? He has no other means, of course, than to come to the place of the object of her desire.



What does this mean? Here, the child is at E. We have already had to represent him many times through the relationship between his demand and the existence of articulation of signifiers as such, which is not only in him but also encountered by him.

At the place marked I, there is not yet anything, at least not in principle. The subject's constitution as the I of discourse is not at all necessarily differentiated yet, even though it is already implied from the first modulation of signifiers. The I doesn't need to be designated as such in discourse for it to be its support. In an interjection, in a command, 'Come here!', or in an appeal, 'You!', there is an I, but it is latent. We could express this by putting a dotted line between D and I. Similarly, the metonymic object, opposite, hasn't yet been constituted for the child.

The expected desire of the mother comes here at D. What results when the child's appeal encounters the mother's existence as Other, 201 namely, a message, is placed opposite. What does it take for the child to successfully become the object of the mother's desire, which we can characterize, already at this level, as what is immediately within its grasp?

Let me begin by drawing what lies beyond the mother as a dotted line – but for a different reason, because this one is completely inaccessible to him.

It is necessary and sufficient that the I that is latent in the child's discourse comes to be constituted here, at D, at the level of this Other that is the mother, that the I of the mother becomes the child's Other, and that what circulates at the level of the mother at D, insofar as she herself expresses the object of her desire, arrives at M where it fulfils its function as a message for the child – which ultimately implies that the latter momentarily renounces absolutely everything that is his in his own speech. But this isn't difficult for him to do, because at that time his own speech is still being formed. The child therefore receives, at M, the completely raw message about the mother's desire, whereas underneath, at the metonymic level in relation to what the mother says, his identification with her object occurs.

This is highly theoretical, but if you don't grasp it at the outset, it's impossible to conceptualize what has to happen next, which is the entry of the mother's beyond constituted by its relationship to another discourse, that of the father.

Therefore, it is insofar as the child first adopts the mother's desire – and he only adopts it in such a way that the reality of this discourse has something raw about it – that he is open to being in the place of the metonymy of the mother, that is, to becoming what the other day I called her 'subject-to'.

You have seen on what displacement primitive identification, as we will call it in this case, is founded. It consists in an exchange that brings the I of the subject to the place of the mother qua Other, except that the I of the mother becomes his own Other. That's what is expressed by this new rung on the little ladder of our schema, which has just been introduced at this second moment.

This second moment revolves around the moment when the father makes his presence felt as the prohibitor. He appears as mediated in the mother's discourse. Earlier, at the first stage of the Oedipus complex, the mother's discourse was grasped in its raw state. Saying now that the father's discourse is mediated doesn't mean we are bringing what the mother makes of the father's words back into play, but that the father's words effectively intervene in the mother's discourse. It therefore now appears less veiled than it did at the first 202 stage, but it isn't completely revealed. That is what this use of the term 'mediated' corresponds to on this occasion.

At this stage, the father intervenes by way of a message for the mother. He speaks at M, and what he declares is a prohibition, a 'not', transmitted at the level at which the child receives the expected message from the mother. This 'not' is a message about a message. It's a particular form of a message about a message – which, to my great surprise, linguists do not differentiate as such, and one thereby sees the importance of working with them – namely, the message of prohibition.

This message isn't simply the 'You will not sleep with your mother' already addressed to the child at this period. It is a 'You will not reintegrate your own product' addressed to the mother. Thus, all well-known forms of what is called the maternal instinct encounter an obstacle here. In fact, the primitive form of the maternal instinct, as everyone knows, manifests itself – in certain animals perhaps even more than in humans – by the oral reintegration, as we elegantly say, of what has come out the other end.

This prohibition arrives as such at A, where the father appears as the Other. As a result, the child is profoundly called into question and disturbed in his position as the subject-to – a potentiality or virtuality that is ultimately salutary. In other words, it is insofar as the object of the mother's desire is affected by the paternal prohibition that the circle doesn't completely close up on the child and that he doesn't purely and simply become the object of the mother's 203 desire. The process could have stopped at the first stage, given that the child's relationship to the mother implicitly comprises three elements, since it isn't her that he desires, but her desire. This is already a symbolic relationship, one that, for the subject, facilitates an initial closure of the desire for a desire and an initial success – the discovery of the object of the mother's desire. Nevertheless, everything is called back into question by the paternal prohibition, which leaves the child at a loss as to locating the desire for the mother's desire.

This second stage is a little less loaded with potentialities than the first. It is palpable or perceptible, but essentially instantaneous, as it were, or at least transitory. It is no less crucial, for it is ultimately this one that is the kernel of what can be called the privative moment of the Oedipus complex. It is insofar as the child is driven out, and for his greatest good, of this ideal position that he and the mother could be happy with, and in which he fulfils the function of being her metonymic object, that the third relation is able to be established, the following stage, which is a fruitful one. Indeed, he becomes something else there, for it includes this identification with the father that I was telling you about last time as well as the virtual title to having what the father has.

If last time I gave a quick outline of the three moments of the Oedipus complex, it was so I wouldn't have to go through it all again today, or, more exactly, it was so as to have time today to go back over it point by point.

Let's pause here for a moment to make place for what is almost a parenthesis, important nevertheless, concerning psychosis.

It is extremely important to consider the manner in which the father intervenes at this moment in the dialectic of the Oedipus complex. You will see this more clearly in the article that I have given for the next issue of the review La Psychanalyse, which presents an overview of what I said the year in which we spoke about the Freudian structures of psychosis. The level of publication that this represents did not allow me to give the foregoing schema, which would have required far too much explication, but when you've read this article, before too long I hope, you will be able to return in your notes to what I am now going to tell you.

In psychosis, the Name-of-the-Father, the father as symbolic function, the father at the level of what happens here between message and code, and code and message, is verworfen. As a result, 204 what I have represented by the dotted lines, namely, that by means of which the father intervenes as law, is not there. There is the raw intervention of the message 'not' upon the mother's message to the child. This message, insofar as it is completely raw, is also the source of the code that lies beyond the mother. This is perfectly clear on this schema of the conduction of signifiers.

Referring to the case of President Schreber, because he has been called upon, at an essential vital detour, to bring the Name-of-the-Father to respond from its place, which is where it is incapable of responding from because it has never come to that place, he sees this structure appear in its place. This structure is brought about by the massive, real intervention of the father beyond the mother, insofar as she is absolutely not backed up by him as protector of the law. As a result, at the major, fertile point of his psychosis, what does President Schreber hear? Very precisely, two fundamental types of hallucination that are never identified as such in the classic manuals.

To understand something about hallucinations, it is better to read the exceptional work of a psychotic like President Schreber than to read the best psychiatric authors who have explored the problem of hallucination with the famous 'scholar's ladder' they learnt in their philosophy classes at school all ready in their pocket – sensation, perception, perception without an object and other rubbish.

President Schreber himself differentiates two orders of things very well.

First, there are the voices that speak in the fundamental language, a characteristic of which is to teach its code to the subject via this very speech. The messages that he receives in the fundamental language, which are composed of words which, whether neologisms or not, are always neologisms in their own way, consist in teaching the subject what they are in a new code, one that literally repeats a new world to him, a signifying universe. In other words, the first series of hallucinations consists of messages on a neo-code which presents itself as coming from the Other. It is what is the most terrifyingly hallucinatory.

On the other hand, there is another form of message, the interrupted message. You remember these little bits of sentences – 'He must namely . . .', 'Now I want . . .' and so on. They are the beginnings of orders and, in certain cases, even of veritable principles – 'Finish what you have started', and so on. In short, these messages present themselves as pure messages, as orders, or as interrupted orders, as pure forces of induction in the subject, and they are perfectly localizable on the two sides, message and code, insofar as they are dissociated.

205 That's what the intervention of the father's discourse resolves into, when what makes discourse coherent – namely, the self-ratification by which the father, at the completion of his discourse, goes back over it and ratifies it as law – is abolished from the start and has never been integrated into the life of the subject.

Let's now move on to the following stage of the Oedipus complex, which, under normal conditions, assumes that the father enters into play, as we said last time, insofar as he has it. He intervenes at this level to give what is involved in phallic privation – a central term in the evolution of the Oedipus complex and its three moments. He effectively appears in the act of giving. It is no longer in the comings and goings of the mother that he is present and therefore still half-veiled, but he appears in his own discourse. In some ways, the father's message becomes the mother's message insofar as he now permits and authorizes. My schema from last time means nothing other than this, that the father's message, insofar as it is incarnated as such, is capable of producing this new rung on the schema – so much so that the subject is able to receive from the father's message what he had attempted to receive from the mother's message. Through the intervention of the gift or the permission accorded to the mother, he is finally given permission to have a penis for later. There you have what is effectively brought about by the phase of the decline of the Oedipus complex – he really does have, as I was saying last time, the title in his pocket.

To evoke a historical and amusing citation – a woman whose husband wanted to be sure that she was faithful to him had certified to him in writing that she was faithful to him, following which she went about the world declaring, 'Ah! What a beautiful letter La Châtre has!' Well then, this La Châtre and our little castrated one are of the same order. They both have, at the end of the Oedipus complex, this beautiful letter that is not nothing, since they can rely upon the fact that in the best of cases they can calmly assume that they will have a penis – in other words, that he is someone identical to his father.

But this is a stage in which you can clearly see that the two sides are always liable to switch. There is something abstract and yet dialectical in the relationship between the two moments I have just been speaking about, the one where the father intervenes as prohibiting and depriving, and the one where he intervenes as permissive and gift-giving – gift-giving at the level of the mother. Other things may happen, and to see this, we must now place ourselves at the level of the mother and once again pose the question of the paradox represented by the central character of the phallic object as imaginary.

The mother is a woman who, we suppose, has arrived at the fullness of her capacities of feminine voracity, and the objection that is 206 made to the imaginary function of the phallus is completely valid. If this is what the mother is, then the phallus isn't purely and simply that, this beautiful imaginary object, for she gobbled that up some time ago. In other words, the phallus at the level of the mother isn't uniquely an imaginary object. It is also perfectly well something that fulfils its function at the instinctual level, as a normal implement of the instinct. It is the 'inject', if I can put it like that – a word which doesn't simply mean that she introduces it into herself, but that one introduces it into her. This 'in' equally signals its instinctual function.

It is because man has to traverse an entire forest of signifiers if he is to reunite with his instinctively valuable and primitive objects that we are dealing with the entire dialectic of the Oedipus complex. This doesn't prevent him from succeeding at it from time to time, nevertheless, thank goodness, otherwise things would have become extinct a long time ago through lack of combatants, given the excessive difficulty of attaining the real object.

That is one of the possibilities on the mother's side. There are others, and we would need to try to find out what her relationship to the phallus means for her, insofar as it is dear to her heart, as it is for every human subject. We can for example differentiate, along with the function of the inject, that of the 'adject'. This term designates the imaginary appurtenance of something which, at the imaginary level, is either given to her or not given to her, which she has permission to desire as such, and which she lacks. The phallus intervenes, then, as lack, as the object of which she has been deprived, like the object of this Penisneid, this privation that is always felt and whose incidence we are familiar with in female psychology. But it can also intervene as an object which has been given to her nevertheless, but from where it is it enters into consideration in a very symbolic manner. This is a different function, that of the adject, even though it can be confused with that of the primitive inject.

In short, while she has all the difficulties entailed by the fact of having to introduce herself into the dialectic of symbols if she is to succeed in integrating herself into the human family, a woman also has every kind of access to something primitive and instinctual that puts her in a direct relationship with the object, no longer of her desire, but of her need.

People talk about homosexuals. We treat homosexuals. We don't cure homosexuals. And what is most incredible is that we do not cure them despite the fact that they are absolutely curable.

If there is anything that emerges in the clearest of fashions from observations, it's that masculine homosexuality – the other one is too, but we are going to limit ourselves today to the male for reasons of clarity – is an inversion concerning the object, which is structured at the level of a full and completed Oedipus complex. More exactly, even as a homosexual realizes this third stage that we have just been talking about, he modifies it appreciably. You will say to me, 'We know this already, they realize the Oedipus complex in an inverted form.' If that is sufficient for you, you can stay with that, I am not forcing you to follow me. But I consider that we have the right to be more demanding than to say, 'Why is the moon made of blue cheese? Well, it's because of an inverted Oedipus complex.'

What we have to seek in the very structure of what is shown by clinical experience regarding homosexuals is whether we are able to understand any better at what precise point the completion of the Oedipus complex is located. One has to consider, in the first instance, his position with all its characteristics and, second, his extreme adherence to the said position. The homosexual, effectively, should you so much as offer him the ways and means, adheres to his homosexual position strongly, and his relationships with feminine objects, far from being abolished, are on the contrary profoundly structured.

I think that only this way of schematizing the problem enables us to point out where the difficulty of shaking his position stems from, and, much more, why once this position has been flushed out, analysis generally fails. This isn't because of any impossibility internal to this position, but is due to the fact that all sorts of conditions are required, and that it is necessary to wend our way through the detours by which his position has become precious and primordial to him.

There are a number of traits that we can note in the homosexual – and, first, a profound and perpetual relationship to the mother. The mother is presented to us, according to the average case, as having a directive and eminent function in the parental couple, and as being more occupied with the child than with the father. It is also said, and this is already another matter, that she has been occupied with the child in a very castrating manner, and that in raising him she has taken great care, been very meticulous and lingered to excess. No one seems to doubt whether all this leads us in the same direction. We have to add some little supplementary links to get to the point of thinking that the effect of such a castrating intervention would have 208 an effect of overvaluation of the object for the child, in the general form in which it presents itself in homosexuals, such that no partner capable of interesting him can be deprived of it.

I don't want to keep you waiting, nor do I want to give the impression of creating new riddles. I believe that the key to the problem concerning homosexuals is this – if homosexuals, in all their nuances, grant a prevailing value to the blessed object to the point of making it an absolute requirement of the sexual partner, it's insofar as, in one form or another, the mother lays down the law to the father, in the sense in which I have taught you to describe him.

I told you that the father intervenes in the Oedipal dialectic of desire insofar as he lays down the law to the mother. Here, what is at stake, and which can don diverse forms, always comes down to this – it's the mother who turns out to have laid down the law to the father at a decisive moment. This means very precisely that, at the time at which the prohibiting intervention of the father should have introduced the subject to the phase of the dissolution of his relationship to the object of the mother's desire, and cut off at the root all possibility for him to identify himself with the phallus, the subject discovers, on the contrary, in the structure of the mother, the support and the reinforcement which prevents this crisis from taking place. At the ideal moment, at the dialectical time at which the mother should be grasped as deprived of the adject in such a way that the subject is literally at his wit's end over her, he finds therein, on the contrary, his security. That holds up perfectly well by virtue of the fact that he feels it is the mother who holds the key to the situation and that she won't let herself be either deprived or dispossessed of it. In other words, the father can say whatever he wants, they are completely indifferent to it.

This doesn't mean, then, that the father has not come into play. Freud said a long time ago – I ask you to refer to the Three Essays on Sexuality – that it isn't rare – and he isn't expressing himself idly, he isn't saying 'it isn't rare' out of vagueness, it's because he has seen it frequently – for an inversion to be determined by the Wegfall, the failure, of an excessively prohibitive father. There are two moments in this – namely, prohibition, but also that this prohibition has failed. In other words, in the end it is the mother who lays down the law.

This also explains to you why, in quite different cases, if the mark of the prohibitive father is broken, the result is exactly the same. In particular, in cases in which the father loves the mother too much, where, through his love, he appears too dependent on the mother, the result is exactly the same.

I am not in the process of telling you that the result is always the same, but that it is the same in certain cases. The fact that the father loves the mother too much may have another outcome 209 than homosexuality. I am not at all taking refuge in constitution, I am only pointing out in passing that there are differences to be acknowledged and that it is possible to observe for example an obsessional neurosis type of effect, as we will see on another occasion. For the moment, I am simply emphasizing that different causes can have a common effect, namely that in cases in which the father is too much in love with the mother, he finds himself in fact in the same position as one to whom the mother lays down the law.

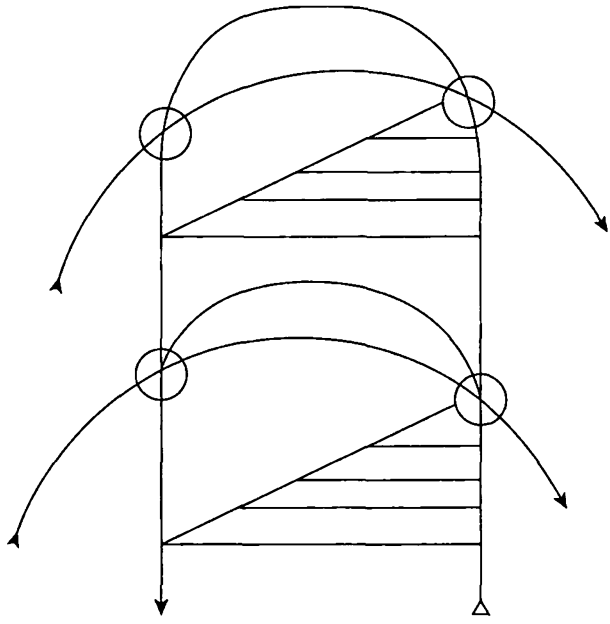
There are still other cases – the interest of this perspective is that it brings together different cases – in which the father, as the subject will testify to you, has always remained a person very much at a distance, his messages only arriving via the intermediary of the mother. But analysis shows that in reality he is far from being absent. In particular, behind the tense relationship with the mother – very often marked by all sorts of accusations, complaints and manifestations of aggressiveness, as they say – which constitutes the text of the analysis of a homosexual, the presence is revealed of the father as a rival, not at all in the sense of the inverted Oedipus complex, but in the sense of the normal Oedipus complex, and revealed in the clearest of fashions. In this case, one makes do with the remark that the aggressiveness against the father has been transferred onto the mother, which isn't very clear but at least it has the advantage of sticking to the facts. What one needs to know is why this is how it is.

This is how it is because the child has found his solution in the critical position in which the father was effectively a threat to him – a solution that consists in the identification represented by the homology of these two triangles.



210 The child has considered that the best way to cope is to identify with the mother, because the mother has not let herself be shaken. It is therefore in the position of the mother, thus defined, that he finds himself.

On the one hand, when he gets involved with a partner who is a substitute for the paternal figure, it is a matter for him, as it frequently appears in the fantasies and dreams of homosexuals, of disarming him, even checkmating him, in a manner that is completely clear in certain cases, and rendering the person who is the substitute for the father incapable of being valued by a woman or women.

On the other hand, the homosexual's requirement of encountering the penile organ in his partner corresponds precisely to this, which is that in the primitive position, the one that the mother who lays down the law to the father occupies, what is called into question – not resolved but called into question – is whether, truly, the father has one or doesn't have one. And this is very exactly what is demanded by the homosexual well before anything else, and in a way that prevails over everything else. Afterwards, we will see what one does with it, but it is a question above all of showing that he has one.

I would go even further, to the point of indicating to you here what the value of the dependence that is represented by the father's excessive love for the mother consists in. You remember, I hope, the formula that I chose for you, namely, that to love is always to give what one doesn't have, and not to give what one has. I shall not come back to the reasons why I gave it to you, but be convinced by it and take it like a key formula, like a little ramp which, with the touch of a hand, will take you to the right floor even if you don't understand anything about it, and it's much better if you don't understand anything about it. To love is to give to someone who has or doesn't have what is in question, but it is certainly to give what one doesn't have. To give, on the other hand, is also to give, but it is to give what one has. There's a world of difference.

In any case, insofar as the father truly shows himself to be in love where the mother is concerned, he is suspected of not having it, and this is the angle from which the mechanism comes into play. I point out to you in this respect that these truths are never completely obscure, nor are they unknown – when they are not articulated, one has an intuition about them at the very least. I don't know if you have observed that this burning issue is never explored by analysts, even though it is at least as interesting to know whether the father loves the mother as it is to know whether the mother loves the father. One always raises the question in that direction – the child had a castrating phallic mother and whatever else you can think of,

she had an authoritarian attitude towards the father, a lack of love, of respect for him, and so on – but it is very curious to see that we never emphasize the father's relationship to the mother. We don't 211 very well know how to think about it, and it doesn't seem to us possible, all things considered, to say anything very normative about it. Thus, we carefully leave this aspect of the problem to one side, at least till today, and I will very probably have to return to this.

Another consequence. There is also something that comes up very frequently, and it is not the least of the paradoxes of the analysis of homosexuals. At first sight, it seems very paradoxical in relation to the demand for a penis in the partner that they are terrified of seeing the organ of a woman, because, or so we are told, that suggests the idea of castration to them. It's perhaps true, but not in the way you think, because what it is about the organ of a woman that stops them is precisely that, in many cases, it is presumed to have ingested the phallus of the father, and that what is dreaded in penetration is precisely an encounter with this phallus.

Dreams – I will quote some for you – well recorded in the literature, and which also occur in my practice, make it apparent in the clearest of manners that what sometimes emerges in a possible encounter with a woman's vagina is a phallus that develops as such and represents something insurmountable, before which not only is the subject brought to a stop but he is invaded by all sorts of fears. This gives a completely different meaning to the danger of the vagina from the one that one thought necessary to put under the heading of vagina dentata, which also exists. It is the feared vagina insofar as it contains the hostile phallus, the paternal phallus, the phallus that is both fantasmatic and absorbed by the mother, and whose real power she holds in the feminine organ.

This is an adequate formulation of all the complexity of the homosexual's relationships. It's a stable situation, and not at all a dual one, a fully secure situation, a situation with three legs. It's precisely because it is only ever envisaged from the aspect of a dual relation, and because one never enters into the labyrinth of the homosexual's positions, that, through the fault of the analyst, the situation never comes to be completely clarified.

Even though the situation has the closest of relations with the mother, it only has its importance in relation to the father. What ought to be the message of the law is quite the contrary, and, whether ingested or not, it ends up in the mother's hands. The mother holds the key, but in a manner that is much more complex than the one implied by the global and massive notion that she is the mother equipped with a phallus. If a homosexual turns out to have identified with her, it isn't at all insofar as she has or doesn't have the adject, purely and simply, but insofar as she holds the key to the 212 particular situation that prevails at the exit of the Oedipus complex, where judgement is passed as to which of the two ultimately holds the power. Not just any power, but very precisely the power of love, and insofar as the complex bonds of the construction of the Oedipus complex, as they have been presented to you here, allow you to understand how the relationship to the power of the law metaphorically reverberates through the relationship to the phallus as fantasmatic object, insofar as it is the object with which the subject must identify at a particular moment.

I will continue next time with a little side commentary on what have been called states of phallic passivity – the term is Löwenstein's – to account for certain disturbances to sexual potency. It fits in here too naturally for me not to do it. Then I will show you how, across the different avatars of this same object, from its origins – namely its function as the mother's imaginary object – through to the moment where it is taken on by the subject, we can outline the general and definitive classification of the different forms in which it intervenes. That's what we will do next week.

The time after that, after which I will leave you for three weeks, we will conclude on the subject's relationship to the phallus in a way that may perhaps interest you less directly, but which I hold to dearly.

Effectively, last trimester I concluded with what I brought for you concerning comedy. When I said that the essence of comedy was when the subject takes the whole dialectical matter in hand and says, 'After all, this entire dramatic affair, tragedy, the conflicts between father and mother – none of that has the same value as love, and now let's amuse ourselves, let's begin the orgy, let's bring all these conflicts to a close, all of that is made for man', it wasn't very well taken. I was quite astonished to have surprised, even scandalized, some people. I am going to let you in on a secret – it's in Hegel.

By contrast, I will bring something new to this topic, something that seems much more demonstrative to me than anything it has ever been possible to formulate on the various phenomena of the mind. The fact is that by taking this path one rediscovers a surprising confirmation of what I am claiming, namely, the crucial character for the subject, and for his development, of imaginary identification with the phallus.

I therefore invite you to come back for the last day of this period so that I can show you the extent to which this applies, the extent to which it is demonstrable and how sensational it is – so as to give a key to, a unique term for, and a univocal explanation of, the function of comedy.

The girl who wants to be whipped

The world is preoccupied with symbolization. An article appeared in the International Journal in May–June 1956 under the title 'Symbolism and Its Relationship to the Primary and Secondary Processes', in which Mr Charles Rycroft tries to give symbolism a meaning in the current state of analysis. Those of you who read English would do well to familiarize yourselves with this article, where you will see the difficulties that have always been present concerning the meaning to give in analysis, not only to the word 'symbolism', but to the idea one has of the process of symbolization.

Since 1911 when Mr Jones carried out the first important comprehensive study, the question has gone through various phases, and it has encountered, and still encounters, huge difficulties in what currently constitutes the most developed position on this subject, that is, the one arising from the considerations by Mrs Melanie Klein on the role of symbols in the ego's formation.

The matter at hand has the closest of relationships with what I am currently explaining to you, and I would like you to sense how useful the point of view I am trying to communicate to you is for introducing a little bit of clarity into some obscure directions.

I don't know from what angle I am going to approach it today, for I don't have a plan for how I am going to present things to you. Since this is our third-last session, and since I told you that next time the Seminar would be centred on the phallus and comedy, today I would like simply to pause here and show you several directions 214 in which what I have expounded for you regarding the castration complex makes it possible to raise a number of questions.

I will start by taking theses as they come. It's not always possible to impose a strict order on this subject, above all when, as is the case today, we're at a crossroads.

You have just seen the terms 'primary' and 'secondary' process in the title of Rycroft's article, which I have never spoken to you about, to the point where some of you were astonished to come across them some time ago in the context of a vocabulary definition.

The opposition between primary process and secondary process dates from the time of the Traumdeutung, and, without being completely identical with this, it covers the contrasting notions of pleasure principle and reality principle. I have alluded to these two terms more than once here, and always in order to get you to observe that the use made of them is incomplete unless one considers them in relation to one another and senses their link and their opposition as being constitutive of the position of each.

I will come straight to the heart of the matter.

When one isolates the notion of pleasure principle as the primary process principle, one ends up where Rycroft does – he thinks that he has to define the primary process, set aside all its structural characteristics and place in the background condensation, displacement and so on, everything that Freud began to enquire into when defining the unconscious so that he can characterize it in terms of what the final formulation of Freudian theory in the Traumdeutung contributes. Specifically, he turns it into an originary, original mechanism – whether you understand this as a historical stage or as the underlying ground – on the basis of which something else would develop. It would be a kind of base or psychical depth, or, taking it in the logical sense, an obligatory point of departure for reflection. In response to impulses from the drives, there is, supposedly, always a tendency in the human subject – it obviously cannot be anything else, but the point isn't very clearly defined – towards the hallucinatory satisfaction of desire. This would be a virtual possibility – constitutive, as it were – of the subject's position with respect to the world.

I doubt this will come as a surprise to you, for you find that this reference to a primitive experience on the model of the reflex arc is 215 abundantly expressed by all authors. Even before need corresponds to an impulse internal to the subject, triggering the instinctual cycle, the movement, however uncoordinated, of appetite, then the searching and the locating in reality, it is satisfied via the pathway of the memory traces of what previously satisfied the desire. This, quite simply, is how satisfaction tends to be reproduced on the hallucinatory plane.

Doesn't this notion which has become almost consubstantial with our analytic conceptions, and which we make use of in an almost implicit manner when we speak about the pleasure principle, seem so excessive as to warrant clarification? Because, in the end, if it's in the nature of the cycle of psychical processes to create their own satisfaction, why don't people satisfy themselves?

Of course, it's because a need continues to insist. Fantasmatic satisfaction is unable to fulfil every need – though we are only too well aware that in the sexual order, in every case without any doubt, it's highly likely to confront a need when it's the need of a drive that is at stake. For hunger, it's a different matter. What is appearing on the horizon is that it's ultimately a question of the quite possibly illusory nature of the sexual object.

This conception of the relationship between a need and its satisfaction does exist and it may effectively be sustainable, at least at one level – that of sexual satisfaction. It has so profoundly impregnated the whole of analytic thought that what has come to the foreground are the primitive or primordial gratifications or satisfactions, and frustrations as well, that are produced at the beginning of the subject's life – that is, in the subject's relations with its mother. Psychoanalysis has thus, on the whole, entered more deeply into a dialectic of need and its satisfaction the more it has become interested in the early phases of the subject's development. Down this path, one has come to formulations whose character – no less necessary than significant – I would like to point out to you.

From the Kleinian perspective, which is the one I am referring to at the moment, the subject's entire learning, as it were, about reality is primordially prepared and underpinned by the essentially hallucinatory and fantasmatic constitution of its first objects, which are classified into good and bad objects, insofar as they establish an initial primordial relation which, in the subsequent life of the subject, will give the subject the principal types of the relations he will have with reality. We thus arrive at the notion that the subject's world is made up of a fundamentally unreal relationship that the subject has with objects that are merely the reflection of his fundamental drives.

For example, this world of 'phantasy'*, in the way this concept is used in the Kleinian school, is organized, in a series of projections of the subject's needs, around the subject's fundamental aggressiveness. A series of more or less favourable experiences, and 216 it's desirable that they be favourable, intervenes on the surface of this world. In this way, little by little, the world of experience makes possible a certain rational locating of what in these objects is, as one says, objectively definable as corresponding to a certain reality, where the background of unreality remains absolutely fundamental.

Here, we have what one can truly call a psychotic construction of the subject. From this perspective, a normal subject is, in short, a psychosis that has turned out well, a psychosis in harmony with experience. What I am saying to you isn't a reconstruction. The author I am going to speak about now, Mr Winnicott, expresses it exactly so in a text he wrote on the use of regression in analytic therapy. It absolutely affirms, as such, the fundamental homogeneity of psychosis with a normal relationship to the world.

There are huge problems with this approach, even just in managing to formulate it. As phantasy [fantaisie] is only the fabric underlying the world of reality, what can the function of phantasy, when it is recognized as such, be in a subject at an adult and completed state and who has successfully constituted his world? This is also the problem that presents itself to any self-respecting Kleinian – that is, to any self-declared Kleinian – and also, one can currently say, to virtually every analyst, insofar as the register in which he inscribes the subject's relationship to the world becomes more and more exclusively one of a process of learning about the world carried out on the basis of a series of more or less successful experiences of frustration.

I invite you to refer to Mr Winnicott's text, which can be found in volume 26 of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis under the title 'Primitive Emotional Development'. The author makes an effort to explain the emergence of this world of phantasy insofar as it's consciously lived by the subject and stabilizes his reality, as we necessarily observe in the very text of experience. For those interested, I refer them to a remark by the author the need for which one clearly senses, given how it leads to a very curious paradox.

The emergence of the principle of reality – in other words, the recognition of reality – on the basis of the child's primordial relations with the maternal object, the object of its satisfaction and also of its dissatisfaction, doesn't at all show how the world of phantasy in its adult form can emerge from there – unless it's by way of an artifice 217 that Mr Winnicott becomes aware of, and which no doubt makes possible a coherent enough development in the theory, but at the price of a paradox that I want to get you to see.

There is a fundamental discordance between the hallucinatory satisfaction of need and what the mother gives the child. It's within this very discordance that a gap opens up to make it possible for the child to attain its first recognition of the object. This presupposes that, despite appearances, the object turns out to be disappointing. Now, in order to explain how the thing that sums up everything for modern psychoanalysis concerning the world of fantasy and imagination, namely what in English is called wishful thinking,* can arise, he makes the following observation.

Let's suppose that the maternal object turns up at the appointed hour to fulfil a need. As soon as the child begins to act so as to get the breast, the mother gives it to him. Winnicott quite rightly pauses here and raises the following problem – what enables the child, under these conditions, to distinguish between the hallucinatory satisfac tion of his desire and reality? In other words, with this point of departure we necessarily come to the following equation – in the beginning, it's absolutely impossible to distinguish a hallucination from a fulfilled desire. The paradox of this confusion is unavoidably striking.

From the perspective that rigorously characterizes primary process as naturally having to be satisfied in a hallucinatory manner, we arrive at this, which is that the more satisfying reality is, the less it constitutes a test of reality – omnipotent thought in the child is henceforth originally founded on everything that has succeeded in reality.

This conception may be coherent in some way, but do recognize that in itself it presents a paradoxical aspect. The very need to have to resort to such a paradox to explain a pivotal point in the subject's development gives one pause for thought and even makes one question it.

As paradoxical, and blatantly paradoxical, as this conception already is, it inevitably has several consequences, which I already pointed out to you last year when I alluded to this same article by Mr Winnicott. That is, in the rest of his anthropology, it has no other effect than to lead him to classify almost everything that might be called free speculation as part of the same register as the fantasmatic aspects of thought. He completely assimilates everything of the order of speculation, however highly developed it is, namely everything that can be called a conviction – pretty much whatever it might be – whether political, religious or other, to fantasmatic life. That is a point of view that fits in well with British humour, 218 and with a certain attitude of mutual respect, tolerance and also reserve. There is a series of things that one only ever speaks about in inverted commas, or that one doesn't speak about at all, amongst well-brought up people. They are, however, things that do count just a bit, since they form part of the internal discourse that one is far from being able to reduce to wishful thinking*.

But let's not go into the finer details of the matter. I simply want to show you what, in contrast, a different conception can suggest.

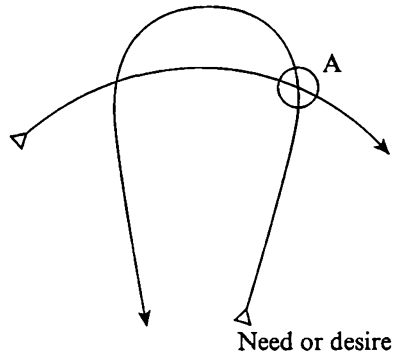
First, is it so clear that one can purely and simply call satisfaction what is produced at the hallucinatory level, and in the different registers in which we can embody the fundamental thesis of the hallucinatory satisfaction of primordial need at the level of the primary process?

I have already introduced the problem several times. We are told, 'Take a look at dreams,' and one always refers to children's dreams. Freud himself shows us the way on this. From the perspective that he was exploring, which was the fundamental nature of desire in dreams, he was effectively led to give us the example of the dream of a child as typical of hallucinatory satisfaction.

From that point on, the door was open. Psychiatrists rushed in – they had for a long time been looking for an idea about their subjects' disturbed relationship to reality in their delusions – by referring them, for example, to structures analogous to those of dreams. The approach I have presented you with here doesn't introduce any essential modifications on this point.

From where we are now, where we can see the difficulties and impasses of a conception in which a purely imaginary relation of the subject to the world is at the origin of the development of his relationship to so-called external reality, it's important to return to the little schema that I never tire of using.

I will return to its simplest form and remind you, even if I should seem to be drumming it in a little, what it's about.



Here one finds something that could be called need, but which I am already calling desire because there is no original or pure state of need. From the outset, need is motivated at the level of desire, that is, at the level of something that is destined in man to have a particular relationship to signifiers. Here, we have this desiring intention crossing what is laid down for the subject as the signifying 219 chain – either the requirements of the signifying chain have already been imposed on his subjectivity, or, from the start, he only ever encounters it in the following form, which is that it's always and already constituted in the mother and that it imposes its requirements and its barrier on him, in the mother. The subject, as you know, initially encounters the signifying chain in the form of the Other, and it arrives at this barrier in the form of a message – whose projection you can see on this schema.

Where is the pleasure principle located on this schema? One may consider it possible, from some angles, to find a primitive manifestation of it in the form of dreams. Take the most primitive of dreams, the most confused, a dog's dream. You can occasionally see a dog's legs moving when he is asleep. He must be dreaming, therefore, and perhaps his desire, too, has a hallucinatory form of satisfaction. Can we conceptualize this? How do we situate it in humans? Here's what I suggest to you so that it exists at least in terms of a possibility in your minds and so that you are aware that in this case it applies in a more satisfying way.

A hallucinatory response to need isn't the emergence of a fantasmatic reality at the conclusion of a circuit initiated by the insistence of a need. At the conclusion of this insistence that started to awaken in the subject, this movement towards something that, effectively, must begin to take shape for him, what appears does not, of course, bear no relationship to the subject's need, does not bear no relationship to an object, but bears a relationship to the object of such a kind that it deserves to be called a signifier. It's effectively something that has a fundamental relationship to the object's absence and already possesses the characteristics of a discrete element, a sign.

If you consult Letter 52 to Fliess, which I have already cited, you 220 will see that when he sets about articulating the birth of unconscious structures, when he begins to formulate a model of the psychical apparatus that makes it possible to explain the primary process, all Freud can do is grant from the outset that the mnesic inscription that hallucinatorially corresponds to the manifestation of need is nothing but a sign, Zeichen.

A sign isn't characterized merely by its relationship to an image in the theory of instincts. It's not the sort of lure that is sufficient to awaken need but not fulfil it. It's located in a particular relationship with other signifiers, with for example the signifier that is its direct opposite and signifies its absence. It has a place in a set of already organized signifiers, already structured in a symbolic relationship, insofar as it appears at the intersection of a play of presence and absence, of absence and presence – a game that is itself ordinarily linked to a spoken articulation in which discrete elements that are signifiers are already present.

In fact, the experience we have of the simplest of children's dreams isn't one of simple satisfaction, as when it's a matter of the need of hunger. It's already something that presents itself with the character of excess, as exorbitant. What the little Anna Freud dreams of is precisely what the child has been forbidden, 'cherries, strawberries, raspberries, pudding', everything that has already adopted a properly signifying character through being prohibited. She doesn't dream simply of what corresponds to a need, but of what is present in the mode of a feast, going beyond the limits of the natural object that satisfies a need.

This feature is crucial. You will find it at absolutely every level. It's there, at whatever level you consider what appears to be hallucinatory satisfaction.

Conversely, approaching things from the other end, from the angle of delusions, for a while, before Freud, you might be tempted, for want of anything better, to endeavour to make it too correspond to a kind of desire on the part of the subject. You get there via a number of insights, some oblique flashes like this one, where something may effectively seem to represent the satisfaction of desire. But isn't it obvious that the major phenomenon, the most striking, the most massive and the most invasive of all the phenomena of delusions isn't at all the phenomenon that refers to a reverie of satisfaction of desire, but something as frozen as verbal hallucinations?

People have wondered about the level at which this verbal hallucination is produced, whether there is in the subject something like an internal reflection in the form of a psychomotor hallucination which it's extremely important to observe, or whether there is projection, or something else, and so on. But doesn't it seem from the outset that what dominates in the structuration of this hallucination, and which should serve as the first element of classification, is that it has the structure of signifiers? Hallucinations are phenomena structured at the level of signifiers. One cannot, not even for an instant, think about the organization of these hallucinations without seeing that the first thing to be emphasized in the phenomenon is that it's a phenomenon of signifiers.

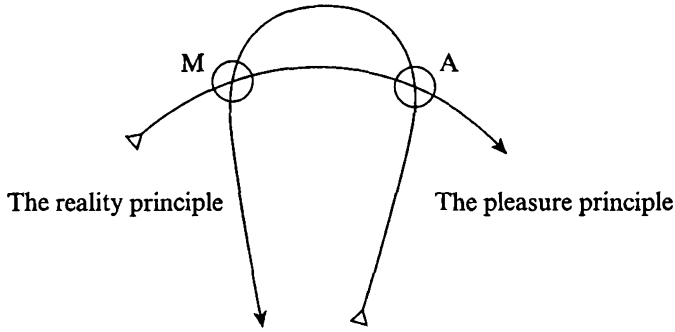
Here, then, is something that must always remind us that, while it's true that one can explore the pleasure principle from the angle of the fundamentally unreal satisfaction of desire, what characterizes the hallucinatory satisfaction of desire is that it's formed in the domain of signifiers and that, as such, it implies a locus of the



Other. This is, moreover, not necessarily an Other. It's a locus of the Other, insofar as it's necessary for the position of the instance of signifiers.

You will notice that on this little schema we see need come into play in that part of the circuit that is external in some way, formed by the part on the [lower] right. Need manifests itself in the form of a sort of tail of the signifying chain, as something that only exists at the limit, and where, however, you will always recognize the feature of pleasure as being attached to it. This is the case every time something reaches this level of the schema.

For a witticism to result in pleasure, it's necessary that what takes place at the level of the Other only comes to an end virtually by tending towards what lies beyond sense, which in itself carries a kind of satisfaction.

If the pleasure principle gets schematized in the external part of the circuit, the reality principle is, likewise, situated in the opposite part. As for the human subject insofar as we have dealings with him 222 in our experience, there is no other possible apprehension or definition of the reality principle, inasmuch as he enters it at the level of the secondary process. How can we neglect, concerning reality, that signifiers effectively enter into play in the human real as an original reality? There is language, it speaks in the world, and by virtue of this fact there is an entire series of things, objects that are signified and that would absolutely not be objects if there were no signifiers in the world.

Introducing the subject into any kind of reality is absolutely unthinkable on the basis of any kind of pure and simple experience, frustration, discordance, shock, burn or whatever else you might think of. There is no bit-by-bit spelling out of an Umwelt, explored in an immediate and tentative manner. For animals, instinct comes to the rescue, thank goodness for that. If animals needed to reconstruct the world, life would not be long enough. And so, why wish that man, who has very poorly adapted instincts, somehow fashion an experience of the world with his own hands? The fact that there are signifiers is absolutely essential to it, and the principal means of expression of his experience of reality – it's almost banal, foolish to say this – is surely the voice. The teaching he receives comes to him essentially from the speech of adults.

But the significant margin that Freud achieves over this element of experience is the following – even before language acquisition is elaborated at the motor level, at the auditory level and at the level at which he understands what one tells him, there is already symbolization – from the outset, from the first relations with the object, from the child's first relationship to the maternal object as the primordial, primitive object on whom its subsistence in the world depends. This object has effectively already been introduced as such into the process of symbolization and it plays the role of introducing the signifier's existence into the world – and at a very early stage.

Take note of this – as soon as the child merely starts to be capable of opposing two phonemes to one another, there are already two vocables. And with two, the one who pronounces them and the one to whom they are addressed, that is the object, his mother, you already have four elements, which is enough to contain potentially, within itself, the entire combinatory from which the organization of signifiers will emerge.

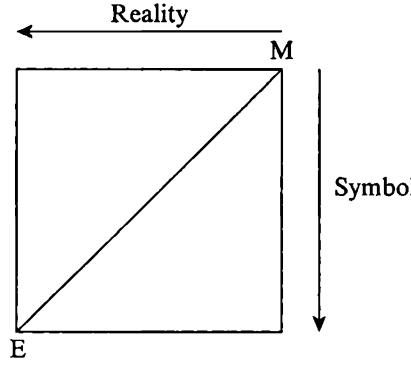
I am now going to move to a new and different little schema – one that, moreover, I have already started here, and which will show you what the consequences are of what I have been telling you as well as recalling for you what I was trying to get you to see at our last session.



I said that, primordially, we have the child's relationship with the mother. If it's along the E–M axis that one wants the initial relationship with reality to be established, and if one makes the constitution of reality depend uniquely on the relationship of the child's desire with the object insofar as it satisfies him or doesn't satisfy him, then this reality cannot be deduced and can only be reconstructed in experience with the aid of continual sleights of hand.

If it's possible, in very extreme cases, to find something that corresponds to this in a number of cases of childhood psychosis, it's always, ultimately, the so-called depressive phase of the child's development that one is referring to whenever one brings this dialectic into play. But insofar as this dialectic comprises an infinitely more complex development, it's in fact a question of something quite different – the child doesn't simply have a relationship with an object that satisfies him or that doesn't satisfy him, but, owing to this minimum thickness of unreality that the initial symbolization gives, there is already a triangular mapping of the child, namely, a relationship, not with what brings satisfaction to his need, but a relationship with the desire of the maternal subject there with him.

If the child does manage to locate his position, it's solely insofar as the dimension of symbols has already been inaugurated. This 224 dimension is represented here as the axis called the axis of ordinates in mathematical analysis. It's what enables us to conceptualize how the child is to locate himself with reference to two poles. It is, moreover, what Mrs Melanie Klein is searching around for without being able to find the formula for it. It's effectively around a double pole of the mother – which she calls the good mother and the bad mother – that the child begins to take up its position. It's not the object that he situates, it's initially himself that he situates. He is then going to situate himself at all sorts of points along this axis, trying to reach the object of the mother's desire, trying to respond to her desire. That is the essential element, and it might take quite some time.

In truth, no species of dialectic is possible if we only consider the child's relationship with the mother – first because it's impossible to deduce anything from this, but also because it's equally impossible, on the basis of experience, to conceive how the child is in this ambiguous world that Kleinian analysts present us with, in which the only reality is that of the mother. According to them, the child's primitive world is both suspended from this object and entirely autoerotic, in that the child is so closely tied to the maternal object that he literally forms a closed circle with her.

In fact, we all know this, and you only have to see a small, living child – he isn't at all autoerotic. He is interested normally, just like any young animal, and, as he is, when all is said and done, a young animal who is more particularly intelligent than the others, he takes an interest in all sorts of other things there in reality. Obviously, they are not random things. There is one to which we attach a certain importance and which appears at the limit of this reality, on the axis of the abscissa, which here is the axis of reality. This isn't a fantasy, it's a perception.

For Mrs Melanie Klein all is forgiven, for she is a woman of genius, but for her followers, and in particular those trained in matters of psychology, like Susan Isaacs who was a psychologist, it is unforgivable – in the wake of Mrs Melanie Klein, she manages to articulate a theory of perception on which there is no way of distinguishing a perception from an introjection in the analytic sense of the term.

I cannot, in passing, go through all the impasses of the Kleinian system. I am only trying to give you a model that will enable you to articulate what happens more clearly.

What happens at the level of the mirror phase? The mirror phase is a subject's encounter with what is and isn't a reality, strictly 225 speaking, namely a virtual image, which plays a decisive role in a particular crystallization of the subject which I call his Urbild. I put it in parallel with the relationship that arises between the child and the mother. This is basically what it's about. The child acquires this point of support for the thing at the limit of reality that appears for him in a perceptual form, but which one can also call an image, in the sense in which an image has the property of being a captivating signal that is singled out in reality and attracts and captures some of the subject's libido, some of its instinct, owing to which a number of reference points, of psychoanalytic points in the world, make it possible for the living being more or less to organize his behaviour.

For the human being, it ultimately seems that this is the sole point that subsists. It plays a role there, as deceptive and illusory. This is where it comes to the aid of an activity which the subject already only engages in insofar as he has to satisfy the Other's desire and, therefore, with the aim of creating an illusion for this desire. That's the whole point of the child's jubilatory activity in front of the mirror. His image of the body is acquired as something that both exists and doesn't exist at the same time, and he positions his own movements as well as the image of those who are there with him in front of the mirror in relation to it. What's special about this experience is that it presents the subject with a reality that is virtual, unrealized, grasped as such, and is to be acquired. Every possible construction of human reality literally passes through here.

For sure, the phallus, as this imaginary object that the child has to identify with in order to satisfy the mother's desire, cannot yet be put in place. But the possibility for this is greatly enriched by the ego's crystallization in this positioning, which opens up all sorts of possibilities for the imaginary.

What are we observing? A double movement. On the one hand, the experience of reality introduces, in the form of the image of the body, an illusory and deceptive element as the essential foundation for mapping the subject in relation to reality. On the other hand, the margin that this experience opens up for the child gives him the possibility of entering into another field and acquiring, in the opposite direction, his first ego identifications.

The field of experience of reality is represented here by the triangle, M-i-m, which sits on the axis of the previously defined abscissa, whereas the more enigmatic, homologous and inverse triangle, M-m-E, creates the subject's field for him, insofar as he has to identify himself, define himself, learn about himself and subjectify himself.

What is this triangle, M-m-E? What is this field? And how is this trajectory which starts with the specular Urbild of the ego, in m, going to enable the child to master himself, to identify himself, to progress? How can we define it? How is it constituted?

Answer. The ego's Urbild is this initial self-conquest or self-mastery that the child acquires in his experience once he has split the real pole in relation to which he has to situate himself. This brings him into the trapezium m-i-M-E, insofar as he identifies multiple elements of signifiers in reality. Through his successive identifications along the segment m-E, he himself takes on the role of a series of signifiers, understand by that a series of hieroglyphs, types, forms and presentations that punctuate his reality with a number of reference points, thus making it a reality riddled with signifiers.

What constitutes the limit of the series is this formation in E that we call the ego-ideal. This is what the subject identifies with when he goes in the direction of the symbolic. He sets out from imaginary reference points – which are, in some ways, instinctually preformed in his relationship with his own body – and engages in a series of signifying identifications whose direction is defined as the opposite of the imaginary and which use it as a signifier. The reason the ego-ideal identification occurs at the paternal level is that at this level there is greater detachment in relation to the imaginary relationship than at the level of the relation with the mother.

This little construction of schemas one on top of the other, these little dancers standing on one another, the legs of one on the shoulders of the other – that's what this is about.

The third of these little constructions is the father insofar as he intervenes to prohibit. As a result, he brings the object of the moth-227 er's desire to the properly symbolic rank, in such a way that it's no longer a purely imaginary object – it's also destroyed, prohibited. It's insofar as the father intervenes as a real person, as I, in order to fulfil this function that the I will become an eminently signifying element and constitute the nucleus of the final identification, the ultimate outcome of the Oedipus complex. This is why the formation called the ego-ideal relates to the father.

The ego-ideal's oppositions to the object of the mother's desire are expressed on this schema. The subject's virtual and ideal identification with the phallus, insofar as it's the object of the mother's desire, is located at the vertex of the first triangle of the relationship with the mother [φ-M-E]. It's situated there virtually, at one and the same time always possible and always under threat – so much under threat that it will effectively be destroyed by the intervention of the purely symbolic principle represented by the Name-of-the-Father.

The latter is there in the form of a veiled presence. His presence isn't unveiled progressively but by an initially decisive intervention, insofar as he is the prohibiting element.

What does he intervene in? In this kind of groping about on the part of the subject who, without this intervention, would end up in, and in certain cases does end up in, an exclusive relationship with the mother. This exclusive relationship isn't one of pure and simple dependence but manifests itself in all sorts of perversions through a particular essential relationship with the phallus because either the subject assumes it in a number of forms, or turns it into a fetish, or because we are at the level of what can be called the original root of the perverse relationship with the mother.

In general terms, the subject may, at a particular phase, effectively attempt to identify his ego with the phallus. It's inasmuch as he is transported in the other direction that he constitutes and structures a certain relationship, marked by the endpoints i-M which lie along the axis of reality, with the image of his own body, that is, the imaginary pure and simple, namely the mother.

Also, his ego, as a real term, is apt not merely to recognize itself, but, having recognized itself, to become a signifying element and no longer simply an imaginary element in its relationship with the mother. This is how these successive identifications that Freud spells out for us in the strongest of terms, and which form the theme of his theory of the ego, can occur along m-E. This theory effectively shows us that the ego is made of a series of identifications with an object that lies beyond the immediate object, the father beyond the mother.

It's essential to retain this schema. It shows you that, in order for it to turn out correctly, completely and in the right direction, there 228 has to be a particular relationship between the subject's direction, his rectitude and his accidents, and the always growing development of the father's presence in the dialectic of the child's relationship with the mother.

This schema comprises a double seesawing movement. On the one hand, reality is mastered by human subjects inasmuch as it reaches one of its limits in the virtual form of the image of the body. Correspondingly, it's insofar as the subject introduces the unreal elements of signifiers into his field of experience that he manages to enlarge the field of this experience to the scale it has for a human subject.

This schema is made for constant use. If you don't refer to it, you will find that you are forever sliding into a series of confusions and literally taking the smoke for the fire – an idealization for an identification, an illusion for an image, all sorts of things that are far from being equivalent and that we shall have to come back to later with reference to this schema.

It's quite clear, for example, that it is easy to show our conception of the phenomenon of delusion through the structure set out on this schema. Delusion is a phenomenon that, surely, deserves to be called regressive, but not because it reproduces an earlier state, which would be completely incorrect. The idea that the child lives in a world of delusion, which seems to be implied by the Kleinian conception, is one of the most difficult things to agree to, for the good reason that while this psychotic phase is required by the premises of the Kleinian articulation, we have no kind of experience of anything at all in the child that represents a transitory psychotic state.

On the other hand, we can very well conceptualize it at the level of a structural, and not a genetic, regression, which the schema makes possible to illustrate by means of a movement in the direction opposite the one indicated here by the two arrows. The invasion of the world of objects by the image of the body is manifest in delusions of a Schreberian type, whereas, inversely, signifier phenomena are gathered around the ego to the point where the only thing supporting the subject is a continuous thread of verbal hallucinations which constitutes a withdrawal to an initial position of the genesis of his world or of reality.

Let's see what our aim has been today. Our aim is to definitively locate the meaning of the question we raise concerning the object.

The question of the object is fundamental for us analysts. We experience it constantly, all we ever do is concern ourselves with it. The question is essentially this – what is the source and the genesis of the illusory object? The question is whether we can form an adequate conception of this object as illusory by referring simply to the categories of the imaginary.

My reply to you is, 'No, that's impossible.' The illusory object has been known about for such a long time, for as long as there have been people who think, philosophers who attempt to express what forms part of everyone's experience. The illusory object has been spoken about for ages. It's the veil of Maya. It's well known that sexual need manifestly produces aims that go beyond the subject. We did not have to wait for Freud for that. Mr Schopenhauer, and many others before him, had already seen a ruse of nature in the fact that a subject thinks about kissing such and such a woman, and that he is purely and simply subject to the requirements of the species.

The fundamentally imaginary character of the object, most especially the object of sexual need, was recognized long ago. The fact that the subject is only sensitive to the image of the female of his species, very roughly speaking, has the character of a lure that, supposedly, seems to be realized in nature – but that doesn't help us one little bit in understanding what is nevertheless essential, which is that one small woman's shoe may very precisely be what provokes in a man the emergence of this energy that is said to be intended for the reproduction of the species. The whole problem is there.

It can only be solved on condition that one realizes that the illusory object doesn't fulfil its function in the human subject as an image – however deceptive, however naturally well organized as a lure you suppose it to be. It fulfils it as a signifying element, taken up into a signifying chain.

We have come to the end of a session today that is perhaps particularly abstract. I apologize, but if we don't set these terms down we will never get to understand what's here and what's there, what I'm saying and what I'm not saying, what I am saying so as to contradict others, and what others say in all innocence, without being 230 aware of their contradictions. We really do have to take this route via the function played by this or that object, fetish or not, and even simply via all the instruments of a perversion.

I really have no idea what one would have had to be thinking about to be satisfied with, for example, terms like 'masochism' or 'sadism', which provide all sorts of admirable considerations on stages and instincts and on the fact that there is some sort of aggressive motor need in order to be able just to accomplish the aim of genital coupling. But, then, why does the fact of being beaten – there are other ways of practising sadism and masochism – very specifically with a switch, or anything else analogous, play an essential role in sadism and masochism? Why does one minimize the importance to human sexuality of this implement commonly known as the whip, in a more or less elided, symbolic or generalized manner? There really is something here that deserves to be taken into consideration.

Mr Aldous Huxley depicts a future world in which everything will be so well organized concerning the reproductive instinct that little foetuses will simply be placed in bottles when those chosen for providing the best embryos have been selected. It all goes very well, and the world becomes particularly satisfactory. Because of his personal preferences, Mr Huxley declares it boring. I'm not taking sides, but what is interesting is that by engaging in these sorts of predictions, to which I personally attach no kind of importance, he remakes the world that he is familiar with, just as we are, through the intermediary of a person who isn't just anybody – a girl who expresses her need to be whipped. There seems to him to be no doubt that there is something here that is closely bound up with the character of humanity in the world.

I am simply pointing this out to you. What is accessible to a novelist, who no doubt has some experience concerning sexual life, should give us analysts pause for thought, all the same.

See the turning point in the history of perversion in analysis. To get away from the idea that perversion was purely and simply the drive coming to the surface – that is to say, the contrary of neurosis – we waited for a sign from the conductor, which came when Freud wrote 'Ein Kind wird geschlagen' ['A Child is Being Beaten'], a text that is totally sublime, where everything that has been said about it since is merely small beer. It's through the analysis of this whipping fantasy that Freud really brought perversion into his real analytic dialectic. It doesn't appear as the pure and simple manifestation of 231 a drive, but proves to be attached to a dialectical context that is as subtle, composite, rich in compromise and ambiguous as a neurosis.

Perversion is therefore not to be classified as a category of the instinct or of our tendencies, but is to be articulated precisely in all its detail, in its instruments and, let's say the word, in its signifiers. Whenever you deal with a perversion, moreover, it's a misrecognition not to see to what extent it is fundamentally attached to a scenario that is always liable to be transformed, modified, elaborated and enriched. In certain cases, experience makes it clear that perversion is chemically linked in the closest of ways to the appearance, disappearance and entire compensatory movement of a phobia, which obviously exhibits both a front and a back, but in quite a different sense, in the sense in which two articulated systems are mutually composed, offset one another and alternate with one another. This encourages us to talk about the drive in quite another domain than that of tendencies pure and simple.

I am particularly drawing your attention to the traces of a signifier that the components and the instruments of perversion itself correspond to, since we are interested in the object for the moment.

What does all this mean? We have an object, a primordial object, one that, without any doubt, remains dominant for the rest of the subject's life. We have certain imaginary elements that play a crystallizing role, in particular all the material of the body's parts, its members, the subject's reference to their domination, the image of a whole. But the fact of the matter is that the object is caught in the function of signifiers.

A relationship is formed here between two series – a series of S, S′, S″, which symbolizes the existence of a signifying chain, and a series of significations underneath. While the upper chain moves in one direction, this something that is in the significations moves in the opposite direction. This is a signification that is always sliding, flying and fleeing, which means that ultimately, by virtue of the existence of signifiers, man's basic relationship with all signification is a special type of object. I call this object a metonymic object.

What is the nature of this object insofar as the subject has a relationship with it? The subject imaginarily identifies with it in a totally radical manner, not with this or that of its object functions that supposedly correspond to this or that partial tendency, as they say. Something requires that somewhere at this level there be a pole that represents in the imaginary what is always evasive, what is induced by a certain tendency of the object to take flight into the imaginary, because of the existence of signifiers. This pole is an object. It's 232 pivotal, central in the entire dialectic of perversions, neuroses and even, purely and simply, in subjective development. It has a name. It's called the phallus.

This is what I will be illustrating for you next time.

FANTASY, BEYOND THE PLEASURE PRINCIPLE

Reading 'A Child is Being Beaten'
The hieroglyphics of the whip, the law of the rod
The negative therapeutic reaction
The pain of being
So-called feminine masochism

By way of bibliographical information, I draw your attention to the following three articles that I will have occasion to refer to. The first is by Ernest Jones, 'The Phallic Phase', published in the International Journal, volume 14, 1933, and reprinted in his collection, Papers on Psychoanalysis, where it's the last one. The second is in German. It's by Hanns Sachs, 'Genese der Perversion' ['The Genesis of Perversion'], and you will find it in the ninth volume of the Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse, 1923. Finally, I give you the English reference for the third, 'Perversion and Neurosis', by Otto Rank, in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis of the same year.

I will add to these Freud's initial article from 1919, 'Ein Kind wird geschlagen' ['A Child is Being Beaten'], which was the signal he gave of a turnaround or a step forward in his own thought and, thereby, for the entire theoretical development of subsequent analytic thought concerning the neuroses and the perversions.

On close examination, the best formula one can give of what occurred at that moment is a formula that the register I am trying to elaborate here by showing you the essential role of signifiers in the formation of symptoms enables me to give – it's effectively a question, in Freud, of the intervention of the notion of a signifier.

Once Freud had shown this, it became clear that the instinct, the drive, has no right to be promoted as any more naked, as it were, in perversion than in neurosis. Hanns Sachs's entire article on the genesis of perversions is there to demonstrate that there is exactly the same structure of compromise, evasion, and dialectic of the repressed and return of the repressed as in neurosis. That is the essence of this article that is so remarkable, and he gives absolutely 234 convincing examples for it. There is always something in perversion that the subject does not wish to recognize, with what this 'veut', 'wish', conveys in our language – what the subject does not wish to recognize can only be conceived as being articulated therein and, nevertheless, not only misrecognized by him, but also repressed for essential reasons of articulation.

This is the mainspring of the analytic mechanism of repression. If the subject were to recognize the repressed, he would be forced to recognize a series of other things, which are strictly intolerable to him, and this is the source of the repressed. Repression can be conceptualized only insofar as it's linked to an articulated signifying chain. Whenever you have repression in neurosis, it's insofar as the subject does not wish to recognize something that it would be necessary to recognize – and this term 'necessary' always carries an element of signifying articulation that cannot be otherwise conceived than as internal to the coherence of a discourse. Well then, for perversion, it's exactly the same thing. There you have it. In 1923, following Freud's article, Sachs and all psychoanalysts recognized that if you look closely, perversion carries exactly the same mechanisms of elision of the fundamental – that is, Oedipal – terms as we find in the analysis of neuroses.

If there is, all the same, a difference, it deserves to be studied very closely. In no case can one rest content with an opposition as summary as that which consists in saying that in neurosis the drive is avoided, whereas in perversion it declares itself nakedly. The drive does appear here, but it only ever appears here partially. It appears in something which, in comparison with the instinct, is a detached element, strictly speaking a sign and, one can even say, a signifier of the instinct. This is why last time, as I was finishing up, I emphasized the role of instruments that is present in an entire series of so-called perverse fantasies – limiting ourselves to just these for the moment.

Effectively, it's preferable to begin from the concrete and not from some general idea that we might have of what is called the instinctual economy of a tension, aggressive or not, and its reflections, turnings around and refractions. At least, isn't this what will explain the prevalence, insistence and predominance of these elements the nature of which is not only emergent but also isolated in the form that perversions take as a species of fantasy, that is, as that by which they provide imaginary satisfaction?

Why do these elements occupy this special place? The other day I spoke about the shoe and also the whip – we can't link them to a 235 pure and simple biological economy of the instinct. They are instrumental elements isolated in a form that is too obviously symbolic for it to be possible to misunderstand this for a moment, once one has explored the lived reality of perversion. The constancy of such elements across the transformations that the evolution of a subject's perversion is capable of showing over the course of his life – a point on which Sachs also insists – is very likely to emphasize the need to view it, not just as a primordial, ultimate and irreducible element whose place we have to see in a subject's economy, but also as a signifying element of perversion.

Freud starts with a fantasy that he has detected in a group of eight patients, six girls and two boys, presenting fairly nuanced pathological forms, of which quite a large portion are neurotic, but not all are.

This is a systematic and very careful study pursued, step by step, with a scrupulousness that distinguishes the investigations carried out by Freud himself from all others. Beginning with these subjects, as diverse as they are, he sets out to follow the transformations in the economy of the fantasy, 'a child is being beaten', through the stages of the Oedipus complex. He begins to articulate what will subsequently develop in his thought into the period where he investigates perversions, and which will, I insist on this point, show us the importance of the play of signifiers in this economy even more.

I can only point out in passing that one of Freud's last articles, 'Constructions in Analysis' – I don't know if you have noticed this – shows the central importance of the notion of the subject's relationship to signifiers for thinking about the mechanism of remembering in analysis. It's clearly shown in this article that this mechanism, as such, is linked to the signifying chain. Similarly, the last work that Freud wrote for us, the last article by him that we have, from 1938, the one that in the Collected Papers was translated with the title 'Splitting of the Ego in the Process of Defence', which I translate as 'The Division or Splitting of the Ego in the Mechanism of Analytic Symptoms', and whose German title is 'Die Ichspaltung im Abwehrvorgang', the one that Freud stopped writing – the article is unfinished – closely links the economy of the ego with the dialectics of perverse recognition, as it were, of a particular theme that confronts the subject. An unbreakable knot ties the ego's* function to the imaginary relationship in the subject's relations with reality, and it does so insofar as this imaginary relationship is utilized as integrated into the mechanism of signifiers.

Let's now turn to the fantasy, 'a child is being beaten'.

Freud pauses at what is signified by this fantasy, into which at least a significant part, if not all, of the libidinal satisfactions of the subject seem to be absorbed. He insists on the fact that the great majority of cases he has encountered it in are female subjects, less often male subjects. We're not dealing with just any sadistic or perverse fantasy, we're dealing with a fantasy that culminates in and stabilizes into a form the theme of which the subject discloses with great reticence. It seems that a great deal of guilt is bound up with even communicating this theme which, once revealed, cannot be put into any other words than 'a child is being beaten'.

Being beaten. Ein Kind wird geschlagen. This means that it isn't the subject who beats, he is there as a spectator. Freud begins by analysing the thing as it occurs in the imagination of female subjects who were the ones who revealed it to him. Taken in its totality, the person who is speaking comes from the line of those who are in authority. It isn't the father, it's on occasion a schoolteacher, an all-powerful man, the King or a tyrant – it's occasionally a very romanticized figure. One recognizes, not the father, but someone who, for us, is equivalent to him. We will have to situate him in the full form of the fantasy, and we shall very clearly see that there is no reason for us to be content with a homology with the father. Far from being assimilated to the father, he should be placed beyond the father, in that category of the Name-of-the-Father that we carefully distinguish from the effects of the real father.

There are several children involved in these fantasies, a kind of group or crowd, and they are always boys. This raises problems, and enough of them for it not to be possible for me to think of covering them all today – I ask you simply to refer to Freud's article. The fact that it's always boys that are beaten, that is, subjects of the opposite sex to that of the subject of the fantasy, is something on which one can speculate indefinitely – try for example relating it initially to themes such as that of the rivalry between the sexes. This is where Freud ends his article, showing the profound incompatibility with the clinical facts of theories such as Adler's and their inability to explain a finding like this one. Freud's argumentation is largely sufficient, and this isn't what creates our essential interest.

What creates our interest is the way Freud goes about examining the problem. He gives us the findings of his analyses. He begins by 237 speaking about what happens in the girl's case, which he does for the requirements of his exposition, so as not to have to be constantly beginning again twice over – this for the girl, that for the boy. Then he takes what happens in the boy's case, where, moreover, he has less material. In short, what does he tell us? He observes some constants, and he tells us about them. What seems essential to him are the avatars of this fantasy – its transformations, its antecedents, its history and what underlies it – which analytic investigation has given him access to. The fantasy effectively undergoes a number of successive states over the course of which it's possible to observe that something changes and something remains constant. For us it's a matter of learning from the result of this painstaking investigation, which carries the mark that gives almost everything that Freud wrote its originality – precision, insistence, working on the material to the point where the articulations that seem irreducible to him have been properly detached. This is how, in the five major psychoanalyses, and in particular in the admirable 'Wolf Man', we see him constantly returning to rigorously examine the part that we can call the symbolic origin and the part that is the real origin, in the primitive chain of the subject's history. Here, similarly, he discerns three moments.

The first stage, he tells us, that in this instance one always finds in the case of girls is the following. At a certain moment of the analysis, the child who is being beaten, and who discloses his real face, is a sibling, a little brother or a little sister, whom the father is beating. What does this fantasy signify?

We are unable to say whether it's sexual or sadistic, is the surprising affirmation that comes from Freud's pen, supported by a literary reference to the witch's response to Banquo in Macbeth – it's made from the stuff from which the two, the sexual and the sadistic, will come. Here we find what Freud will emphasize in an article in 1924, 'The Economic Problem of Masochism', and which is necessitated by Beyond the Pleasure Principle, namely this first stage at which, we have to think, there is originally, at least in considerable part, Bindung, binding or fusion of the libidinal instincts, or life instincts, with the death instincts, whereas the evolution of the instincts comprises a more or less premature defusion, Entbildung, of these instincts. Certain types of prevalence or certain arrests in a subject's evolution can be attributed to the premature isolation of the death instinct.

Although this fantasy is primitive, in that one doesn't find any 238 more archaic stage, Freud also emphasizes that its signification is located at the level of the father. The father refuses his love to or withholds his love from the beaten child, the little brother or the little sister. Inasmuch as there is the denunciation of any relationship of love and humiliation, this subject is targeted in his existence as a subject. He is the object of abuse, and this abuse consists in denying him as subject, reducing his existence as desiring to nothing and reducing him to a state that aims to abolish him as a subject. 'My father does not love him' is the meaning of the primitive fantasy and it's what gives the subject pleasure – the other isn't loved, that is, isn't established in a properly symbolic relationship. This is the perspective from which the father's intervention acquires its primary value for the subject, on which everything that follows depends.

This archaic fantasy is thus initially born into a triangular relationship, one that isn't established between the subject, the mother and the child, but between the subject, the little brother or little sister and the father. We are prior to the Oedipus complex, and yet the father is there.

Whereas this first moment of the fantasy, the most archaic, is recovered by the subject in analysis, the second, on the other hand, never is and has to be reconstructed. This is unbelievable. If I stress the daring of Freud's deduction, it isn't so that we can pause for a moment and ask whether it's legitimate or not. It's so that we do not allow ourselves to be led along blindfolded, it's so that we are aware of what Freud is doing, owing to which his construction can be continued. The analytic material therefore converges on this state of the fantasy which has to be reconstructed since it never appears, according to Freud, in memory.

This second moment is tied to the Oedipus complex as such. It has the meaning of a privileged relationship between the little girl and her father – it's she who is being beaten. Freud thus acknowledges that this reconstructed fantasy may testify to the return of Oedipal desire in the little girl, the desire to be the object of the father's desire, with the guilt that that comprises, requiring that she have herself beaten. Freud speaks in this respect of regression. What should we understand by that? Given that the message in question is repressed and can't be recovered in the subject's memory, a correlated mechanism, which Freud here calls regression, causes the subject to have recourse to the figuration of the previous stage in order to express, in a fantasy that is never brought to light, the frankly libidinal relationship, already structured in the Oedipal mode, that the subject then has with the father.

At a third moment, after emerging from the Oedipus complex, there remains nothing more of the fantasy than a general schema. A new transformation has been introduced, and it's a double one. The figure of the father, now outmoded, is transposed and referred to the general form of an omnipotent and despotic person in a position to beat, whereas the subject himself is presented in the form of these 239 multiple children, not all of whom are even of a determinate sex, but form a kind of neutral series. This final form of the fantasy, in which something is thus maintained and fixed, one might say memorized, remains invested for the subject with the property of forming the privileged image in which whatever genital satisfaction he will be able to experience will find its support.

This deserves our attention, and it deserves to arouse a reflection using the terms whose primary use I am trying to teach you here.

I return to my imaginary triangle and my symbolic triangle. The first dialectic of the symbolization of the child's relationship with the mother is essentially made for what is signifiable, which is what is of interest to us. There are no doubt other things beyond. There is the object that the mother as bearer of the breast can present, and there are the immediate satisfactions that she can bring to the child, but if that were all there is, there wouldn't be any kind of dialectic, no opening in the edifice. Later, the relationship with the mother does not consist merely of satisfactions and frustrations, it consists in the discovery of what the object of her desire is. The subject, this little child who has to constitute himself in his human adventure and enter the world of the signified, effectively has to make the discovery of what signifies her desire for her. Now, what has always posed a problem in analytic history, for theory as for practice, has been to know why the privileged function of the phallus appears at this point.

When you read Jones's article, 'The Phallic Phase', you will see the unfathomable difficulties that he has with Freud's remark that for the two sexes there is an original stage in their sexual development where the theme of the other as desiring other is linked to the possession of the phallus. This is literally incomprehensible by nearly everybody around Freud, even though they contort themselves in order to get it to fit into their own elaborations, notwithstanding, because the facts impose it on them. What they do not understand is that Freud is positing there a pivot-signifier around which the entire dialectic of what the subject must conquer in himself, in his own being, revolves.

that still don't explain why it's this privileged element that is taken up as the central, pivotal point of the defence. Jones, in particular, gives belief in the phallus a function in the boy's development which, if you read him, you will notice is taken from the case of a homosexual, which is far from being the general case. Whereas, with the phallus, it's a question of the most general of functions.

Allow me a dense formulation that will strike you as quite bold, but we won't have to come back to it if you will be kind enough to agree to accept it momentarily for its operational use. Just as I have told you that within the signifying system the Name-of-the-Father has the function of signifying the entire system of signifiers, authorizing its existence, making it law, I will tell you that we frequently have to consider that the phallus enters into play in the signifying system when the subject has to symbolize, in contrast with the signifier, the signified as such – I mean signification.

What matters to the subject – what he desires, desire as desired – the subject's desired, when it comes to the neurotic or pervert symbolizing it, is literally carried out, ultimately, with the help of the phallus. The phallus is the signifier of the signified in general.

This is essential. If you start there, you will understand many things. If you do not start there, you will understand far fewer and you will be obliged to take some sizeable detours in order to understand some exceedingly simple things.

The phallus enters into play immediately the subject addresses the mother's desire. This phallus is veiled and will remain veiled to the end of time for one simple reason, which is that it's an ultimate signifier in the signifier's relationship with the signified. There is, effectively, little chance that it ever unveils itself in any other way than in its nature as a signifier, little chance, that is, that it truly reveals what it signifies as a signifier.

Nevertheless, consider what happens – a case that we have not envisaged till now – if in this place something intervenes that is much less easy to articulate or symbolize than anything that is imaginary, namely a real subject. This is just what is in question at this first phase that Freud designates.

The mother's desire here isn't simply the object of an enigmatic search that has to lead the subject, over the course of his development, to trace out this sign, the phallus, therein so that the latter will subsequently enter into the dance of the symbolic, become the exact object of castration and be finally rendered to him in a different form, so that it does and is what it's meant to do and be. It is that and it does do that, but here we are right at the origin, where the subject comes face-to-face with the imaginary place in which the mother's desire is located. And this place is occupied. 241

We can't speak about everything at once, and anyway it was quite fortunate that we didn't immediately think of the role of younger siblings even when we all know that this is of decisive importance in the triggering of neuroses. A minimum of analytic experience is sufficient for one to know how much the appearance of a little brother or little sister acts as a crossroads in the evolution of every neurosis. It's just that if we had thought about this immediately, it would have had exactly the same effect on our thought as we observe it having on the neurotic subject – dwelling on the reality of this relationship makes one miss its function completely. The relation to the little brother or little sister, to any rival, does not acquire its decisive value at the level of reality, but insofar as it's inscribed in a completely different development, the development of symbolization. This complicates it and requires a completely different solution, a fantasmatic solution. What is that? Freud spelt out the nature of this for us – the subject is abolished on the symbolic plane insofar as he is a nonentity who is denied any consideration as a subject. In this particular case, the child discovers the so-called masochistic fantasy of beating that constitutes a successful solution to the problem at this level.

We don't have to limit ourselves to this case, but initially we need to understand what is happening. And what's happening is a symbolic act. Freud stresses it strongly – this child who thinks he is someone in the family, well, a single slap is often enough for him to plummet from the pinnacle of his omnipotence. Well then, we're dealing with a symbolic act, and the very form that comes into play in fantasy – a whip or a switch – carries within itself the character of, has the nature of, some sort of thing which expresses itself on the symbolic plane as an erasure. Before it becomes something else, Einfühlung, empathy of some kind, that can be attributed to a physical relationship between the subject and the one who is suffering, what intervenes before anything else is something that strikes out the subject, crosses him out, or abolishes him – this something is the signifier.

This is so true that when later – all of this is in Freud's article, I'm following him line by line – the child effectively encounters the act of beating, namely, when at school he sees a child being beaten before his eyes, he doesn't find it at all amusing, says Freud, trusting 242 to the text of the experience of subjects from whom he has obtained the history of this fantasy. The scene inspires something in the order of an Ablehnung – I am correcting the translation – an aversion, a turning away of the head. The subject is obliged to endure it, but he has no involvement and keeps himself at a distance. The subject is by no means taking part in what really takes place when he is confronted by an actual scene of a thrashing. And also, as Freud precisely indicates, the very pleasure of this fantasy is manifestly tied to its non-serious, inoperative character. The thrashing has no other effect upon the subject's real and physical integrity. It really is its symbolic character that is eroticized as such, and eroticized from the outset.

At the second moment – and this is important for the validation of the schema I introduced you to last time – the fantasy is going to acquire a completely different value and change its meaning. It's here that the whole enigma of the essence of masochism resides.

Where the subject is concerned, there is no way of getting out of this impasse. I am not telling you that this is easy to grasp, explain or unpack. We must first of all hold on to the fact, which is that that is how it is, and, afterwards, we will try to understand how it can be like that.

The radical introduction of signifiers comprises two distinct elements. There is the message and its signification – the subject receives the news that the little rival is a child who is beaten, that is, a nonentity, someone one can sit on. There is also a signifier that has to be picked out as such, namely, what one wields, the instrument.

The fundamental character of the masochistic fantasy as it actually exists in a subject – and not in some kind of model or ideal reconstruction of the evolution of the instincts – is the existence of the whip. It's what, in itself, merits being emphasized by us. We are dealing with a signifier that merits having a special place in the series of our hieroglyphs, and initially for a simple reason, which is that the hieroglyph of the one holding the whip has always designated the director, the governor and the master. We mustn't lose sight of the fact that that exists and that it's what we are dealing with.

The same duality occurs again at the second moment. However, the message in question, 'My father is beating me', doesn't reach the subject – this is how what Freud says is to be understood. The message which had first meant, 'The rival does not exist, he's a nonentity', now means, 'You exist, and you are loved, even.' That is what serves as a message at the second moment, whether it's in a regressive or repressed form doesn't matter. And it's a message that does not arrive.

year later, in Beyond the Pleasure Principle, and looks for the radical value of this masochism that he encounters in analysis in the form of an opposition or radical enemy, he will be obliged to present it in various terms. Hence the interest we have in thinking about this enigmatic moment of the fantasy, which, he says, is the entire essence of masochism.

Let's take it step by step. We have to start off by seeing the paradox, and seeing where it lies.

There is, then, the message, the one that does not arrive at the place of the subject. On the other hand, the one thing that remains is the material of the signifier, this object, the whip, which remains as a sign right to the end, to the point of becoming the pivot and, I would almost say, the model of the relationship to the other's desire.

Effectively, the final fantasy's character of generality, the one that remains, is reasonably well indicated by the indefinite reduction in the number of subjects. This highlights the relationship with the other, the others, the little others, the little a as libidinal, and it means that human beings, as such, are all under the stick. To enter into the world of desire is for the human being to undergo, right at the outset, the law imposed by this something that exists beyond – that we were calling it the father is no longer of any importance, it doesn't matter – the law of the rod. This is how, for a determinate subject entering the matter by particular pathways, a certain line of evolution is defined. The function of the final fantasy is to reveal an essential relationship between the subject and the signifier.

Now let's move on a little bit, and remind ourselves what Freud introduces that is new regarding masochism in Beyond the Pleasure Principle. It's essentially this – if we consider a subject's mode of resistance or inertia to a certain normative or normalizing form of treatment intervention, we are led to articulate the pleasure principle as the tendency of life to return to the inanimate. The last resort of libidinal evolution is to return to the stillness of a stone. This is the great scandal that Freud contributes for everyone who till then had made the notion of libido the law of their thought.

If this contribution is paradoxically new, even scandalous when expressed as I just have, it's in other respects merely an extension of the pleasure principle, which Freud characterized as a return to zero tension. There is, in effect, no more radical a return to zero 244 than death. However, at the same time, you can see that we're still obliged, in order to distinguish them, to locate this formulation of the pleasure principle beyond the pleasure principle.

I should say some words here about one of the most unusual problems in the life and person of Freud – his relationship to his wife, to which we will perhaps have occasion to return one day. His existence was very deprived of, or denied itself, women. He is scarcely known to have had any more than two women, his own and this sister-in-law who lived in the couple's shadow. We really have no trace of anything else that was a properly romantic relationship. On the other hand, he had a fairly deplorable tendency to take suggestions readily from the constellation of women that formed around him, and whose members wished to be the upholders or assistants of his thought. It was thus sufficient for him that a person like Barbara Low should suggest a term to him that was so mediocrely suited, if I may say so, as 'the Nirvana principle' for him to endorse it. The relationship that perhaps exists between Nirvana and the notion of the return of nature to the inanimate is just a little bit approximate – but since Freud was happy with it, let's be happy with it too.

If the Nirvana principle is the rule and the law of the evolution of living things, there must be a trick somewhere so that, at least occasionally, it isn't the decrease in pleasure that gives pleasure but, on the contrary, its increase – except that, as Freud is aware, we are completely incapable of saying why. There must be something in the genre of a temporal rhythm, a concordance of terms, pulsations. He allows that on the horizon there may possibly be recourse to explanations which, were they able to be given, aren't vague, but they remain very much out of reach – they go in the direction of music, of harmony of the spheres.

In any case, as soon as one allows that the principle of pleasure is a return to death, actual pleasure, the pleasure we concretely deal with, requires a different order of explication. We really need some trick of life that makes subjects believe, as it were, that it actually is for their pleasure that they are here. One thus returns to the greatest philosophical banalities, namely that it's the veil of Maya that sustains us in life by deceiving us. Beyond, the possibility of obtaining either pleasure or pleasures by taking all sorts of detours, would [then] be based on the reality principle. This is what would be beyond the pleasure principle.

moment, nevertheless, because, well, this negative therapeutic reaction isn't some kind of stoic reaction by the subject. It manifests itself in all sorts of extraordinarily annoying things as much for him as for us and for his entourage. They are even so troublesome that, all things considered, 'not having been born' can seem like a better fate for everything that has come into being. This remark that Oedipus ends up making, his μὴ φύναι (me phunai), as the final word that gives the meaning in which the adventure of tragedy culminates, does not abolish the latter, far from it. On the contrary, it eternalizes it, for the simple reason that, if Oedipus was unable to succeed in stating it, he would not be the supreme hero that he is. It's precisely insofar as he does say it – that is, makes himself eternal – that he is this hero.

What Freud discovers for us as beyond the pleasure principle is that there is perhaps, effectively, an ultimate aspiration for rest and eternal death, but, in our experience, and this was the entire meaning of the second year of my Seminar, we encounter the specific character of the negative therapeutic reaction in the form of this irresistible inclination towards suicide that becomes recognizable in the last resistances we encounter in these subjects who are more or less characterized by the fact of having been unwanted children. As what must bring them closer to their history as a subject becomes better articulated, they increasingly refuse to play the game. They literally wish to quit it. They do not accept being what they are. They want nothing of this signifying chain into which their mother has only regretfully admitted them.

What appears to us analysts in these cases is exactly what can be found in others, namely the presence of a desire that is articulated, and articulated not only as a desire for recognition, but as the recognition of a desire. The signifier is the essential dimension here. The more the subject, with the aid of signifiers, asserts himself as wishing to exit the signifying chain, and the more he enters it and integrates himself into it, the more he himself becomes a sign in this chain. Should he do away with himself, he is a sign more than ever. The reason for this is simple – it's precisely when the subject is dead that he becomes an eternal sign for others, and those who have committed suicide even more than others. This is indeed why suicide has a horrific beauty which makes it so terribly condemned by people, and also a contagious beauty which gives rise to these suicide epidemics that are as real as it gets in experience.

246 desire for recognition as such, as forming the basis of what constitutes our relation to the subject. And, after all, in what Freud calls beyond the pleasure principle, is there anything else besides the subject's fundamental relation to the signifying chain?

If you think about it, resorting to some supposed inertia in human nature for the model of what life aspires to is an idea that must make us smile slightly, given where we have come to. In fact nothing is less assured than a return to nothing. Moreover, Freud himself – in a tiny parenthesis that I would ask you to go back to in the article 'The Economic Problem of Masochism', where he mentions his Beyond the Pleasure Principle – points out to us that if the return to inanimate nature is actually conceivable as the return to the lowest level of tension, to the state of rest, nothing assures us that, in reducing to nothing everything that has risen and is life, nothing stirs therein either, as it were, and that, at bottom, there is no pain of being. I am not springing this pain on you, I'm not extrapolating it. As pointed out by Freud, it's what we have to regard as the final residue of the bond between Thanatos and Eros. No doubt Thanatos comes to be released through the subject's motor aggressiveness in relation to what is in his surroundings, but some part of it remains internal to the subject in the form of this pain of being that, for Freud, seems to be linked to the very existence of living beings. Now, there's no reason to think that this pain stops at living beings – according to everything we now know about a nature that is much more animated, rotting, fermenting, bubbling and even explosive, than we have been able to imagine up till now.

On the other hand, what we do not have to imagine, what is there at the tip of our fingers, is that in his relationship to signifiers a subject may occasionally, insofar as he is asked to constitute himself in signifiers, choose not to do so. He can say, 'No, I will not be an element in the chain.' That really is what lies at the bottom of the matter. But the bottom, the back, is exactly the same thing as the front. What does the subject do, in effect, when he chooses, in some way, not to pay a debt that he has not contracted? He does nothing but perpetuate it. His successive refusals have the effect of making the chain rebound, and he always finds himself tied to this same chain even more. The Absagüngzwang, this eternal necessity to repeat the same refusal, is, as Freud shows us, the ultimate mainspring of everything that in the unconscious appears in the form of symptomatic reproduction.

Nothing less than this is necessary in order to understand in what respect signifiers, once they have been introduced, have a fundamentally double value. How does the subject feel affected, as desire, by signifiers, inasmuch as it's he who is abolished, not the other with 247 the imaginary and, of course, signifying whip. As desire, he feels he is running up against what, as such, sanctions and valorizes him even as it profanes him. In masochistic fantasies, there is always a degrading and profanatory aspect, one that indicates both the dimension of recognition and the subject's prohibited mode of relation with the paternal subject. This is what constitutes the depths of the misrecognized part of the fantasy.

The subject's access to the radically double-meaning nature of a signifier is facilitated by something I have not yet brought into play on the schema, so as to spare your tiny minds, because last time there were frightful complications as soon as I introduced the parallel line i-m – namely, the relationship between the image of the body and the ego of the subject.

We cannot misrecognize the fact that the rival does not purely and simply intervene in the triangular relation, but that he is already present at the imaginary level as a radical obstacle. This is what provokes what Saint Augustine describes for us in his Confessions – the deathly pallor of the suckling watching its brother at the mother's breast. There is, in effect, something radical there, truly deadly for the subject, which is well expressed in this passage. But the rivalry with the other isn't all, since there is also an identification with the other. In other words, the relationship that binds the subject to every image of the other has a fundamentally ambiguous character, and it gives the subject a completely natural introduction to the back-and-forth which, in fantasy, takes him to his rival's place, where the same message will henceforth reach him with a completely opposite meaning.

We can, then, see this, which makes us better understand what the issue is – it's inasmuch as part of the relation develops a connection with the subject's ego that successive fantasies are organized and structured. It's not for nothing that it's in this dimension between the primitive maternal object and the subject's image – a dimension in which the entire range of the intermediaries where reality is constituted is laid out – that all these others who are the support of the significant object, namely the whip, come to be located. From this moment on, in its signification the fantasy – I mean the fantasy in which the subject appears as the child who is being beaten – becomes the relation with the Other by whom it's a question of being loved, insofar as he himself is not recognized as such. This fantasy is, then, situated somewhere in the symbolic dimension between the father and the mother, between whom, moreover, he effectively oscillates.

248 Today I have taken you down a path that was no less difficult than the one I took you down last time. Let's wait and test its value and its validity, which I will be able to tell you about at a later stage. To terminate on a brief suggestive note, I will make the following remark, which will show you how our terms are applied.

It's commonly said in analysis that a woman's relation to the man comprises a certain masochism on her part. It's one of these errors of perspective to which some kind of sliding of our experience into confusion and into a rut leads us all the time. It's not because masochists display certain signs or fantasies of a typically feminine position in their relations with their partner that, inversely, a woman's relation to the man is a masochistic relation. The idea that, in the relations between a man and a woman, the woman is someone who receives the blows may well be a masculine subject's perspective as someone who is interested in the feminine position. But, in order for a constitutively feminine position to effectively be there, it isn't enough that the masculine subject perceive, from certain perspectives – whether his own or those of his clinical experience – a certain connection between adopting a feminine position and such-and-such a signifier of the subject's position that is supposed to have more or less of a relationship with masochism.

It's extremely important to make this correction, which I am doing for you in passing, to the term 'feminine masochism' introduced by Freud in his article on the economic problem.

I have had no time at all to start what I was going to tell you about the relations between the phallus and comedy. I regret it, and I'll defer it till next time.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE PHALLUS

DESIRE AND JOUISSANCE

The masks of a woman
André Gide's perversion
The Balcony by Jean Genet
Comedy and the phallus

Dear friends, to pick up the thread after a three-week break, I will begin with what we were rightly recalling last night, which was that our discourse has to be a scientific discourse. That said, it seems that the paths to achieving this aim are not so easy as far as our object is concerned.

Last night I simply pointed out the originality of this moment in the examination of the phenomena of man that bringing this privileged element called desire to the foreground, by way of the entire Freudian discipline, constitutes.

I pointed out to you that prior to Freud this element had, in itself, always been reduced and in some respects prematurely elided. It's this that makes it possible to say that until Freud every study of human economy more or less started from a concern with morals, with ethics in the sense in which it's less about studying desire than already reducing it and training it. Now, it's the effects of desire in a very large sense – desire is no side-effect – that we have to deal with in psychoanalysis.

What manifests itself in the phenomenon of human desire is its fundamental subduction, not to say subversion, by signifiers. That is the meaning of everything I am striving here to make you aware of – desire's relationship to signifiers.

I am not going to develop this for you again today, even though we should go back and recommence from there, but I am going to show you what, from the rigorous perspective that maintains the originality of the conditions of man's desire, is signified by a notion that is always more or less implicated in your handling of the notion of desire, and which deserves to be distinguished from it – I 252 would go further – which can only begin to be articulated once we are sufficiently inculcated with the complex conditions under which this desire is formed. This notion I am speaking about will be the other pole of my discourse today. It's called jouissance.

We will briefly return to what forms, as such, desire's deviation or alienation in signifiers, and we will ask what it means, from this perspective, that the human subject is able to take possession of what in his world are the very conditions imposed upon him as if these conditions were made for him and succeed in satisfying him.

I point out to you that this brings us to a theme – and I hope to get there today – that I announced to you at the start of the year when we were approaching things from the perspective of witticisms, namely the nature of comedy.

Remember for a start that desire is established in relation to the signifying chain, that it first poses and proposes itself as a demand in the evolution of the human subject, and that frustration in Freud is Versagung, which is refusal or, even more precisely, retraction.

If, along with the Kleinians, we go further back into the origins, which is an exploration that surely constitutes progress for analysis, in the majority of problems in the evolution of the neurotic subject we are led back to so-called oral-sadistic satisfaction. Simply observe that this satisfaction takes place in fantasy, and does so immediately, as retaliation for fantasized satisfaction.

We are told that everything starts with the sometimes aggressive need to bite in the small child, in relation to the mother's body. Don't forget, though, that none of this ever consists of actual biting, that they are fantasies and that this reasoning can only move forward by showing that the fear of being bitten in return is the essential thread in what is being demonstrated.

Moreover, one of you with whom I was chatting last night, and who, after Susan Isaacs, is trying to retrieve some valid definitions of fantasy, was quite correctly telling me about his total confusion as to pursuing any reasoning whatsoever that was founded purely and simply on the imaginary relation between subjects. It's absolutely impossible to distinguish, in any valid way, unconscious fantasies from this formal creation that is the play of imagination, 253 if we do not see that unconscious fantasy is already dominated and structured by the state of the signifiers.

Good and bad primordial objects, and primitive objects on the basis of which all analytic reasoning is carried out, constitute a range of objects in which several series of substitutive terms destined to be equivalent appear. Milk, the breast, subsequently become – what? – sperm – what? – the penis. These objects are already, as it were, 'signifierized'.

What the relation with the most primordial object, the maternal object, initially produces operates on signs, on what we might call, to give an image of what I mean, the currency of the Other's desire. Still, the close study – close so as to see it clearly – we undertook last time of this work that Freud considers decisive –and I stressed to you that it was effectively groundbreaking in the real analytic understanding of the problem of perversion – was intended to get you to see that these signs can be divided in two. Effectively, they are not all reducible to what, as I have already pointed out to you, are property titles, fiduciary values, representative values or money for exchange, as I just said – signs constituted as such. Some of these signs are constitutive – I mean whereby the creation of value is assured, whereby this something real, which is locked into this economy at every moment, is struck by the bullet that turns it into a sign.

We saw one such bullet last time, formed by the sign of the stick, the switch or whatever else is used for hitting. This is an element whereby even a disagreeable effect can create a subjective distinction and can establish the very relation in which demand can be recognized as such. What was initially a means to annul all rivalrous reality with the brother secondarily becomes that by which the subject finds himself differentiated, recognized or picked out as something that can be either recognized or rejected into nothingness. Henceforth, the subject presents himself as a surface on which everything that can be given subsequently can be recorded, or even, as it were, as a blank cheque where all gifts are possible. And since all gifts are possible, the fact is that what can be given or not given is not what's at issue, because what's at issue is a relation of love, which, as I have said, consists in the fact that the subject essentially gives what he doesn't have. Everything possible about the introduction to the order of love presupposes this fundamental sign for the subject, who may be either annulled or recognized as such by it.

I asked you to read a number of things over the break. I hope 254 you have done so and that you occupied yourselves at least a little bit with Mister Jones's phallic phase and the early development of feminine sexuality.

Since I have to move on today, I will punctuate with a completely local example that I rediscovered when rereading the issue of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis commemorating Jones's fiftieth anniversary, at the time when this phallic phase was in the foreground of the interest of English psychoanalysts. In this issue, volume 10, I reread once again, with great interest, Joan Riviere's article, 'Womanliness as a Masquerade'.

The article is about the analysis of a specific case, and not about the function of femininity in general, which Joan Riviere situates in relation to various branches that offer a number of possible pathways to femininity.

The subject in question presented as endowed with a femininity that was all the more remarkable for apparently being completely embraced, and for the fact that her entire life appeared – in her day much more than in ours – to indicate that she assumed all the masculine functions. In other words, she was someone who had a perfectly independent, developed and free professional life, which, I repeat, stood out much more in those days than in our own, and which nevertheless manifested itself in her correlative assumption to the maximum, to the highest degree, of her role as a woman – both in the public form of her functions as housewife and in her relations with her spouse, everywhere displaying the superiority of qualities which, in our social state just as in all social states, come under what is necessarily the woman's responsibility, and, in another register, quite specially at the sexual level, her relations with her man proved to be entirely satisfying with respect to her jouissance.

Now, beneath the apparently total satisfaction of her feminine position, this analysis highlighted something very hidden and which nonetheless formed its basis. This is without any doubt something that one doesn't find without the instigation of some tiny, infinitely tiny discord appearing on the surface of a state that was in principle completely satisfying.

You are aware of the emphasis our experience can place on Penisneid, the claim for a penis, in many developmental disorders of female sexuality. Here, what is hidden is quite the contrary. I cannot repeat the history of this woman, this is not my aim today, but the source of the satisfaction that supports what apparently flourishes in this favourable libido is the hidden sat-255 isfaction of superiority over the parental characters. This is the term that Mrs Joan Riviere uses, and which she considers to be the very source of the problems in this case – which, as I have said, has a character of freedom and fullness that is not so secure in the evolution of female sexuality for it not to be remarked upon. Detecting this hidden mainspring of her personality produced the effect, if only a transitory one, of profoundly disturbing what had been presented as a complete, mature and happy relationship to the point of producing for a time the disappearance of a satisfying outcome to the sexual act – which, according to the author, proves her case.

With this woman, we therefore find ourselves in the presence, as Mrs Joan Riviere emphasizes, of the need to avoid reprisals from men motivated by the surreptitious theft that she carries out on the source and very symbol of their power. As the analysis progresses, the meaning of her relations with persons of one or the other sex appears more and more obviously to be given, guided and dominated by her concern to avoid punishment and reprisals from the men whom she has in her sights here.

This very fine scansion, which appears as the analysis progresses, as I say, was, however, already discernible in small, anomalous traits. Whenever she had displayed her phallic power, she would rush into a sequence of steps that were either a seduction or even a sacrificial procedure – 'Do everything for others', thereby in appearance adopting the highest form of feminine devotion, as if she was saying, 'But look, I do not have this phallus, I am a woman and purely a woman.' She would adopt a mask, particularly in her professional activities in relation to men – although she was highly qualified, she would suddenly adopt, with a kind of self-effacement, an excessively modest even anxious attitude to the quality of what she had done, thus in reality playing a game of coquettishness, as Mrs Joan Riviere puts it, which would function not so much to reassure as to deceive those who might take offence at what, in her, was presenting fundamentally as aggression and the need for, and jouissance of, supremacy as such, and which was structured on a history of rivalry, first with the mother and then with the father.

In short, with respect to an example like this, as paradoxical as it may seem, we can clearly see that what is at stake in an analysis and in the understanding of a subjective structure is always something that shows us the subject engaged in the process of recognition as such – but recognition of what? Let's clarify this.

The subject is unconscious of the need for recognition, and indeed this is why it's necessary, completely necessary, for us to locate 256 it in an alterity with qualities that were unknown before Freud. This alterity stems purely and simply from the place of signifiers, whereby being is separated off from its own existence.

The fate of a human subject is essentially tied to his relationship with his sign of being, which is the object of all kinds of passions and presentifies death in the process. In his link to this sign, the subject is in effect sufficiently detached from himself to be able to have this apparently unique relationship to his own existence in creation – and this constitutes the ultimate form of what, in analysis, we call masochism, namely that by which the subject apprehends the pain of existing.

The subject, qua existence, finds himself constituted as divided from the outset. Why? Because his being has to become represented elsewhere, in signs, and signs themselves are in a third location. This is what structures the subject in this splitting of himself, and without it it's impossible for us, in any valid way, to found what we call the unconscious.

Take the slightest dream and you will see, provided you analyse it correctly and refer to the Traumdeutung, that it isn't in the articulated signifiers, even after you have carried out the initial decoding, that the unconscious is embodied. Freud is constantly stressing and returning to this – there are, he says, hypocritical dreams, and they are nonetheless the representation of a desire, even if only the desire to deceive the analyst. Recall what I emphasized in a fully explicit passage from the analysis of the young homosexual woman. The unconscious discourse is not the last word of the unconscious, it's supported by what truly is the ultimate mainspring of the unconscious and which cannot be expressed in any other way than as the subject's desire to be recognized. And this is so, even where it's through a lie already articulated at the level of mechanisms that escape consciousness – a desire for recognition that is here underlying the lie itself, and which from a false perspective may seem like a lie by the unconscious.

This gives you the meaning of and the key to the necessity we find ourselves under to place this schema, around which I am trying to advance the authentic course of the experience of formations of the unconscious, at the foundation of any analysis of the full subjective phenomenon as it's given in analytic experience. This is the one I recommended to you recently in a form that today I can present more simply. Of course, it's always the simplest forms that have to be introduced last.

What do we have in this triangle with the three poles, E, P and M, which forms the position of the subject?

We see the subject in a relation to a triad of terms that form the signifying foundations of his entire progress. Namely, M, the mother, insofar as she is the first symbolized object and insofar as her absence or presence will become, for the subject, the sign of the desire onto which his own desire will hook, and which will make him or not make him, not simply a satisfied child or not, but a desired or undesired child.

This is not an arbitrary construction. Be aware that our experience has taught us to discover, step by step, what I am putting in place here. Experience has taught us what the flow-on consequences are, what almost infinite structuration for a subject, before his birth, flows from the fact of having been a child that is not desired. This term is essential. It's more essential than having been, at this or that moment, a more or less satisfied child. The term 'desired child' corresponds to the establishing of the mother as the seat of desire and to the dialectic of the child's relationship with the mother's desire that I have been attempting to demonstrate to you, which is concentrated in the primordial fact of the symbol of the desired child.

Here, P, the term for the father insofar as he is, as a signifier, the signifier through which signifiers are founded as such. It's for this reason that the father is essentially a creator, I would even say an absolute creator, who creates out of nothing. Signifiers effectively have, within themselves, this original dimension of being able to 258 contain the signifier that defines itself as the emergence of signifiers.

In relation to this, something essentially confused, indeterminate, undetached from its existence and yet made for being detached from it – namely, the subject insofar as he must be signified – has to get its bearings.

If identifications are possible, if the subject in his lived experience succeeds in giving this meaning or that meaning to what has been given to him by his particular human physiology, it's always structured in this triadic relationship formed at the level of signifiers.

I don't need to go back over the homology of terms at the level of signifieds, the side where the subject is, in relation to these three symbolic terms. I have partly demonstrated it, and in the end that's all I'm doing here. I ask you to take my word on this, at least till you are better informed, till we get a fuller demonstration.

In the subject's relationship to his own image, he rediscovers the duality of maternal desire in relationship to himself as a desired child, which is only symbolic. He feels it, experiences it in this relationship with this image of himself on which many things can end up being superimposed.

I'm immediately going to give you an example that illustrates this, since I made an allusion last night to the fact that I had been looking quite closely at the history of Gide's childhood, as Jean Delay sets it out for us in a truly exhaustive manner in the pathography that he has given us of this case, under the title La Jeunesse d'André Gide.

We know that Gide, this graceless child – as the author says somewhere on seeing a photograph the sight of which made the person tremble – would indulge in the most deformed images in his erotics, his primitive autoerotism, since, as he says, he could achieve an orgasm by identifying with situations of catastrophes. For example, he was able to achieve an orgasm very early on by reading Madame de Ségur, whose books are fundamental with all the ambiguity of primordial sadism, but where this sadism is perhaps not fully developed. Equally, one finds other examples – a child who has been beaten, a servant who drops something with a great 'Crash!', destroying what she was holding in her hands, or again identification with this character of Gribouille in a tale by Hans Christian Anderson, who is carried off by the current and ends up on a far-off bank, transformed into a branch. These are amongst the least humanly constituted forms of the pain of existence.

We can't do anything but grasp something abyssal here that was formed in the subject's first relationship with his mother who, as we 259 know, had both very high and remarkable qualities and something completely elided in her sexuality, in her life as a woman, which, in her presence, clearly left the child in his early years in a completely unsituated position.

The turning point at which the life of the young Gide regains, as it were, meaning and human constitution is to be located in a crucial moment of entification that we are given, as clearly as is possible, in his memory, and which without the slightest doubt marks his entire existence. This is his identification with his young female cousin.

Identification, for sure, but it's not enough to use the term in this vague form. He recounts the precise moment, and nobody pays enough attention to its unusual nature. It's the moment when he discovers his cousin in tears on the second floor of this house he has rushed to, attracted not so much by her as by her taste for, her love of, the clandestine that festers in that household. It's after he passes the first floor, where his cousin's mother is – his aunt, whom he sees more or less in the arms of a lover – that he encounters his cousin in tears – and then, the height of euphoria, exaltation, love, distress and devotion. From that point on, he dedicates himself to the protection of this child, as he will later tell us. Let's not forget that she was older than he – at the time, Gide was thirteen years old and Madeleine fifteen.

We can absolutely not understand the meaning of what happened at this moment unless we place it in a threefold relation. The young André doesn't find himself only in the presence of his cousin, but also with a woman who is at the height of her passion on the floor below, namely, the said cousin's mother, who, as he presents it to us in La Porte Étroite, had previously made an attempt at seducing him.

What happened at that moment? At the time of the seduction, he became the desired child, and, moreover, he fled in horror effectively because nothing had ever contributed the elements of an approach and a mediation that would have made this anything other than a trauma. Still, he had found himself in the position of a desired child for the first time. This new situation, which in some respects was to be his salvation, would nevertheless fixate him on a profoundly divided position, by reason of the atypical, late and – I repeat this – unmediated way this encounter took place.

What did he acquire from this for the constitution of the symbolic term that had been missing till then? He acquired nothing less than the place of the desired child, which he would eventually be able to occupy by the intermediary of his cousin. In that place where there had been a hole, there is now a place, but nothing more, for in that place he denies himself at the same time, insofar as he is unable to occupy it because he is unable to accept the desire of which he is the object. On the other hand, his ego, undeniably, doesn't stop identifying – and forever, and without knowing it – with the subject of the 260 desire upon which he is now dependent. He falls in love forever, for the rest of his existence – this little boy that for an instant had been in the arms of his aunt, this aunt who stroked his neck, his shoulders and his chest. His entire life is there.

We can report the fact, since he admitted as much, that during his honeymoon – everyone is astounded and scandalized by this – and virtually in front of his wife, he would think about the 'excruciating delights', as he expresses it, of being stroked on the arm and shoulder by young boys he had met in the train. This page has become famous, it's part of literature, one in which Gide displays what, for him, will remain the privileged point of the entire fixation of his desire.

In other words, what has been subtracted at the level of what becomes his ego-ideal, namely the desire of which he is the object and which he is unable to bear, he adopts for himself, he falls in love forever and for all eternity with this same caressed little boy he had no wish to be.

The term 'desired child', this signifier which primordially constitutes the subject in his being, is pivotal here. Something must be created here, and the ego must combine with it in one way or another at this point x where he is, which is designated by E. This is where the ego-ideal, which marks the entire psychological development of a subject, is formed.

First, the ego-ideal is marked with the sign of the signifier. Second, the question is – where does it start? It can be formed gradually with the ego as its point of departure, or, alternatively, without the ego being able to do anything but undergo what is produced, unbeknownst to the subject, solely by a succession of accidents subject to the fortunes of the signifier, and which allow him to subsist in the signifying position of a child who is desired to a greater or lesser extent.

The schema thus shows us that it's in the same place – depending on whether it is produced via the conscious pathway or via the unconscious pathway – that what, in one case, we call the ego-ideal and, in the other, perversion is produced.

Andre Gide's perversion doesn't consist so much in the fact that he can only desire little boys, only the [image of] the little boy that he had been, i. Andre Gide's perversion consists in the fact that, there, at E, he is able to constitute himself only by perpetually relating himself, only by submitting himself to this correspondence that for him is the heart of his work, only by being the one who makes himself valued in the place occupied by his cousin, the one whose thoughts are all turned towards her, the one who literally gives her, at every moment, everything that he doesn't have, but nothing but that, and who constitutes himself as a personality in her, through her, and in relation to her.

261 This is what places him, in relation to her, in a deadly dependency, which makes him exclaim somewhere, 'You cannot know what the love of a Uranist is. It's something like an embalmed love.'

This entire projection of his own essence into this relationship is the basis of his existence, the heart and root of his existence as a man of letters, as a man totally in signifiers, and totally in what he communicates to this woman. This is how he exists objectively in his interhuman relations. This woman that he does not desire can effectively be the object of a supreme love for him, and when this object with which he has filled the hole of love without desire disappears, he utters this miserable cry whose similarity to the comical cry par excellence, that of the miser, 'My money box! My precious money box!' I pointed out to you last night.

All passions, insofar as they are the alienation of desire in an object, are on the same footing. Of course the miser's money box makes us laugh more easily – at least, if we have in us a touch of humanity, which is not universally the case – than the disappearance of Gide's correspondence with his wife. Obviously, that was of value to all of us. It doesn't make it any less true that, fundamentally, it's the same thing, and that Gide's cry at the moment his correspondence disappeared is the same cry as that of Harpagon.

What is this comedy I'm referring to?

Comedy comes to us in a thousand varied remarks. Comedy is not the comical.

If we want to give a correct theory of comedy, we have to begin with the fact that, at least for a time, comedy was produced for the community, insofar as the latter represents a group of men, that is, insofar as, above itself, it constitutes the existence of a Man as such. Comedy was what it seems to have been at a time when the representation of the relationship between man and woman was the object of a spectacle with a ceremonial value. I am not the first to compare the theatre and Mass, since everybody who has examined the question of theatre has noted that, surely, our day is the only one in which the drama of the Mass represents what the full development of the functions of theatre could represent at a certain moment in history.

At the time of the great period of Greek theatre, tragedy represented man's relationship to speech, insofar as this relationship 262 seizes him in his fatality – a fatality in conflict, insofar as the chain that binds man to the law of signifiers is not the same at the level of the family as at the level of the community. That is the essence of tragedy.

Comedy represents something else, which is not without a link to tragedy, since, as you know, a comedy always completes the tragic trilogy, and we cannot consider it independently. I will show you that we even find both the trace and the shadow of this comedy in the marginal commentary on the Christian drama itself. Of course, this is not to be found in our epoch of constipated

Christianity, where, certainly, no one would dare accompany the ceremonies with these robust farces formed by what used to be called the risus paschalis. But let's leave that to one side.

Comedy arises at the point at which the subject and man attempt to adopt a different relationship to speech from that in tragedy. It's no longer a matter of committing to or adopting contrary necessities, nor is it a question of it being only one's own affair. It's a matter of that in which he has to express himself as a person whose destiny it is to absorb the substance and matter of this communion, profit from it, enjoy it and consume it. Comedy, one might say, is something like the representation of the end of the communion meal on the basis of which tragedy has been evoked. It's ultimately man who consumes all his substance and common flesh that has been presented there, and it's a matter of finding out what the outcome is.

To see this, I believe there is no other way than to refer to classical comedy, of which all subsequent comedies are merely a degradation in which the traits of their origin are, however, still recognizable. I refer you to the comedies of Aristophanes, The Assembly of Women, Lysistrata, Women at the Thesmophoria, to see where it leads. I started showing this to you – comedy manifests, by a kind of internal necessity, the subject's relationship to his own signifieds, as the result or fruit of the relationship between signifiers. The signifieds must arrive fully developed on the scene of comedy. Comedy embraces, gathers and takes enjoyment from the relationship with an effect that has a fundamental relation to the signifying order, namely the appearance of this signified called the phallus.

It just so happens that, having given you this term, in the days following the brief sketch I gave of Molière's The School for Wives as representing the essential comical relationship, I only had to open this text, which I think I can regard as a very unusual and extraor-263 dinary resurgence of the master works of comedy, if what I think I read in Aristophanes is right. It's nothing other than Jean Genet's The Balcony.

What is The Balcony?

You know that there was some fairly lively opposition to its being performed. We shouldn't be astonished by this, in a state of the theatre whose substance and interest can be said to consist primarily in the actors' self-promotion on the stage in various capacities, which delights and titillates those who are there to identify with what we can call by its name – a display. If the theatre is anything else, I certainly believe that this play is well made to get us to appreciate it. It's uncertain whether the public is in a state to view it. It seems to me difficult, though, not to find it dramatically interesting.

Genet speaks of something that means more or less what I am going to try to expound for you. I am not saying that he knows what he is doing. Whether he knows or not is of no kind of importance. Corneille probably didn't know what he was writing as Corneille either, but this didn't prevent him from doing it with great rigour.

Human professions enter the stage of The Balcony insofar as they refer to the symbolic: the power that Christ confers on the posterity of Saint Peter and all episcopacies to bind and unbind the order of sin and transgression; the power of the person who condemns and punishes, namely the judge; the power of the person who assumes command in this great phenomenon, war, the power of the warlord, more typically the general. Each of these characters represents functions from which the subject finds himself alienated – they are functions of speech of which he finds himself the support but which go well beyond his singularity.

Now, as it happens these characters are all of a sudden going to be subject to the laws of comedy. That is, we begin to imagine what it is like to enjoy these functions. Disrespectful, no doubt, to pose the question in this way, but the disrespect of comedy is not something one should stop at without trying to discover what it leads to later.

That always starts to emerge in a period of crisis. It's at the highest point in the crisis of Athens – resulting from precisely the aberration of a series of bad choices and a submission to the law of the city that literally seem to lead to its downfall – that Aristophanes attempts this wake-up, which consists in saying that we are ruining ourselves in this war without end and that there is nothing to do but stay at home, keep warm and rediscover one's wife. This is not 264 something that is put forward as a moral, exactly. What is being suggested is that man resume his essential relationship with his state – moreover, without our knowing whether its consequences are all that salubrious.

Thus, we see the bishop, the judge and the general posited there before us on the basis of the question – what is it really like to enjoy the status of a bishop, a judge or a general? This explains the device by which this balcony is nothing other than what is known as a 'house of illusions', a brothel. What happens at the level of different forms of the ego-ideal is not, as is thought, the result of sublimation, in the sense in which this means the progressive neutralization of deeply rooted internal functions. On the contrary, it's a formation that is always more or less accompanied by an eroticization of the symbolic relationship. The person who, in his position and function as bishop, judge or general, enjoys his station can thus be assimilated to this person well known to the keeper of the brothel, such as the little old man who comes for his satisfaction in a strictly calculated fashion, which momentarily places him in a role – the strangest diversity is encountered at this level – adopted in relation to a partner-accomplice who is always willing to play the role of respondent.

Thus, we see a bank employee come and dress up in the garments of a priest and take confession from a prostitute. The confession is of course nothing but a sham, though it must approximate the truth to some extent. In other words, something in the intention of his accomplice needs to make it possible for him at least to believe that she is taking part in some guilty jouissance. Mounting the grotesque on an even grander scale by having the character in question wear buskins to heighten his caricatured position is not the least original aspect of the art and lyricism with which the poet Jean Genet is well able to mount the dialogue of this grotesque character for us. We thus see this clearly perverse subject basking in the pleasure of seeking his satisfaction in this image, insofar as it's the reflection of a function essentially of signifiers.

In other words, in three long scenes Genet presents us with what, at the level of perversion, gets its name from there, namely what, in explicit language, we can at times of great disorder refer to as the brothel in which we live. Effectively, society cannot be defined in any other way than as a more or less advanced state of degradation of culture. All the confusion that builds up in the relations, however 265 fundamental, of man to speech is there represented in its place. We know what he is getting at.

What is this about? It's about something that for us embodies the subject's relationship to the functions of faith in their diverse and most sacred forms, and presents them to us through a series of degradations. This leap made momentarily – namely that we see the bishop himself, the judge and the general here in the place of 'specialists', as they say in the language of perversion – challenges the subject's relationship to the function of speech.

And so, what happens? This is what happens. This relationship, however degraded, however adulterated it is – and it's a relationship where everyone has failed, in which nobody finds himself – continues nonetheless to be staged there before our eyes, sustains itself and subsists, purely and simply. Despite not being recognized as legitimate, it subsists, at the very least, as something linked to the existence of what one calls order.

Now, what does this order come down to when a society has ended up in the most extreme disorder? It comes down to what we call the police. This last resort, this final right, this final argument of order which is called maintaining order, symbolized by the establishment at the centre of the community of a house of ill repute, of what was presented originally as the three crossed pikes – this reduction of everything that is of the nature of order to the maintenance of order is embodied by the pivotal character in the drama, namely the Chief of Police.

Genet's hypothesis, and it's truly a very nice one, is that the image of the Chief of Police, the one who essentially knows that maintaining order depends on him and that he is the ultimate foundation and residue of all power, is not elevated to sufficient nobility for any of the little old men who come to the brothel to ask for his ornaments, attributes, role and function. Some know how to play at being a judge and in the presence of some little prostitute who confesses to being a thief, adopt the role themselves to obtain this confession, for 'How could I be a judge if you weren't a thief?' says the judge. I'll pass over what the general says to his mare. On the other hand, nobody asks to be the Chief of Police.

This is pure hypothesis. I do not have enough experience of brothels to know whether the Chief of Police was not elevated long ago to the dignity of characters whose role one might enjoy. But in the play, the Chief of Police, who is the good friend of the manageress of the whole brothel – I am not at all seeking here to do theory, any more than I am saying that it's about concrete things – comes and anxiously asks, 'Has anyone asked to be the Chief of Police?' And it never happens.

Similarly, there is no Chief of Police's uniform. We see a habit 266 displayed, a judge's wig, a general's hat, though without the latter's pants, but no one has ever assumed the role of a Chief of Police in order to make love. That is the nub of the drama.

Now, note that everything that takes place inside the brothel takes place while, outside, there is a revolution raging. Everything that unfolds – and I will pass over the detail, you will gain a lot of pleasure from studying this comedy – everything that unfolds inside – and it's far from being as schematic as I am telling you, there are cries, there are blows, in short they're having a good time – is accompanied, outside, by the rattle of machine guns. The city is in revolt, and all these women are expecting to perish in their beauty, massacred by the dark and virtuous workers who here are supposed to represent the whole man, the real man, the man who is in no doubt that his desire will ultimately prevail and triumph as such in a harmonious manner. Proletarian conscience has always believed that morality will prevail – whether it's right or wrong is irrelevant.

I need to speed up a bit. What is relevant is that Jean Genet takes us to the heart of the adventure in the fact that the Chief of Police is in no doubt, because this is his function, and it's for this reason that the play unfolds as it does, that after the revolution, just as before, it will still be a brothel. He knows that, in this sense, the revolution is a game.

There is one more very beautiful scene in which the blue-blood diplomat comes and enlightens this amiable group who find themselves in the heart of the brothel about what's happening in the Royal Palace. There, in her state of the most complete legitimacy, the Queen is embroidering and is not embroidering. The Queen is snoring and is not snoring. The Queen is embroidering a little handkerchief. There is a swan in the middle, and one doesn't know yet whether it will be on a sea, on a pond or on a cup of tea. I'll pass over what relates to the ultimate disappearance of this symbol.

The one who makes herself the voice and words of the revolution is one of the prostitutes. She has been abducted by a virtuous plumber, and consequently finds herself fulfilling the role of the woman in the Phrygian bonnet on the barricades, with this extra thing that she is a sort of Joan of Arc. Knowledgeable about the ins and outs of masculine dialectics, because she has been in places where one hears it being developed in all its phases, she knows how to speak to them and how to respond to them. The said Chantal disappears in the blink of an eye – she gets shot – and the power appears immediately incarnated in Irma, the manageress of the brothel. The latter adopts, and with such superiority, the functions of the Queen. Has she not also passed over to the pure state 267 of a symbol, since, as the author expresses it somewhere, with her nothing is real apart from her jewels?

We then come to the regimentation of the perverts we saw displaying themselves during the entire first act, and to their authentic and integral assumption of the reciprocal functions they embodied in their little, diversely amorous frolics.

A fairly forthright political dialogue takes place between them and the character of the Chief of Police, who needs them to represent the powers that will have to take the place of the previously overturned order. They don't do it without reluctance, understanding very well that it's one thing to enjoy where it's warm, in the shelter inside the walls of one of these houses about which one doesn't sufficiently reflect that it's the very place in which order is the most carefully preserved, but another thing to place oneself at the mercy of the elements, even quite simply of responsibilities that these really absurd functions include. Obviously, here, we are openly at the level of farce.

It's the conclusion of this farce in high taste that, in the end, I would like to emphasize.

In the middle of all this dialogue, the Chief of Police is still concerned. 'Has anyone come and asked to be the Chief of Police? Has there been anyone who has fully recognized his greatness?' Aware that he is looking for satisfaction difficult to obtain, discouraged by having to wait indefinitely for the event that for him would be the endorsement of his accession to the order of respected – because profane – functions, the Chief of Police maintains that he has succeeded in demonstrating that he alone is the order and hub of everything. This means that there is nothing other, in the end, than a firm hand, which doesn't lack meaning, insofar as Freud's discovery of the ego-ideal coincided more or less with the inauguration in Europe of this type of character who offers the political community a unique and easy identification, namely the dictator. The Chief of Police, then, consults the people around him on the subject of the appropriateness of a kind of uniform as well as a symbol that would be the symbol of his function, and does so not without timidity, just in case. In fact, he shocks the ears of his listeners just a little – he suggests a phallus.

Wouldn't the Church take objection? And he leans over to the bishop who, in effect, shakes his mitre for a moment, hesitates, but suggests that in the end, if one were to make it like the dove of the Holy Spirit, it would be more acceptable. Similarly, the general suggests that the said monogram be painted in the national colours. Some other suggestions of this kind tend to indicate that they will arrive fairly quickly at what in such circumstances is called a concordat.

girls, whose role in this play truly swarming with significations I have passed over, enters the scene, speechless because of the emotion of what she has just experienced. This is nothing less than the following. The friend, the saviour of the prostitute, who has risen to the state of revolutionary symbol – the character of the plumber, then – who is known in the house, came to see her and asked her for everything he needed in order to look like the person of the Chief of Police.

Total uproar. Tightening of the throat. Our worries are over. Everything was there, including the Chief of Police's toupee. The latter, startled, asks, 'How did you know?' Someone answers him, 'You are the only person who thinks that nobody knows you wear a toupee.' Once the character – who is actually the heroic figure in the drama – has been clothed in all the trappings of the Chief of Police, the prostitute makes the gesture of throwing in his face, after he has cut it off himself, that with which, as she coyly puts it, he will never deflower anybody again. With this, the Chief of Police, who was very close to arriving at the zenith of his satisfaction, nevertheless makes the gesture of checking that he still has his. He still does have his, effectively, and his passage to the state of being a symbol in the form of the proposed phallic uniform is henceforth useless.

The conclusion is completely clear. This subject, the one who represents the simple desire of man to encounter and embrace his own existence and thought authentically, a value that is not separate from his flesh – this subject who is there, representing man, the one who has fought so that something that until now we have been calling the brothel can rediscover a basis, a norm, a state that can be accepted as fully human – this subject reintegrates himself into it, once he has passed the test, only on condition of being castrated. That is to say, only on condition of bringing it about that the phallus is again promoted to the status of signifier, as this something that can be given or withheld, conferred or not conferred by the one who at this time is confused, in the most explicit manner, with the image of the creator of the signifier, the 'Our Father', the 'Our Father who art in heaven'.

The comedy ends there. Is it blasphemous? Is it comical? We can place the accent wherever we like.

These terms, which I will come back to, will serve as reference points for the essential question of desire and jouissance, a taste of which I wanted to give you today.

THE GIRL AND THE PHALLUS

The aporias of the Kleinian approach
The phallus, signifier of desire
The theory of the phallic phase
Critique of Ernest Jones
A step forward

The first presupposition of our task is that you appreciate what we are trying to do here. It is, namely, always to bring you to the point where the difficulties, contradictions and impasses that form the fabric of your practice appear to you in their true significance, whereas you avoid them by referring to partial theories and even by dodging the issue and fudging the meaning by the very terms you use, which are also the locus of all one's excuses.

Last time, I spoke about desire and jouissance. I would like to move ahead today by showing you, in the text itself, Freud's contribution to a precise theoretical point by observing the difficulties that he provokes amongst his followers. In his attempt to be more precise about things, starting from certain preconceived requirements, moreover, something emerges that makes the difficulty even greater. As for us, perhaps we can take a third step.

This has to do with the phallic position in women, or, more precisely, with what Freud calls the phallic phase.

I remind you what it is that we have been emphasizing and where it is that we have come to. Over the last three or four sessions, I have begun to articulate this desire that, as such, is placed at the heart of analytic mediation. By condensing what I have said, I have formulated it here in a concentrated form as a 'signified demand'.

You have two terms here that work as one. 'I demand, I notify you 270 of my demand', as we say, 'I notify you of an order, I notify you of a judgement.' The demand therefore implies the other, the one of whom the demand is made, but also the one to whom this demand makes sense, an Other who has, amongst other dimensions, the dimension of being the locus in which this signifier acquires its significance. The second term, the term 'signified', in the sense in which 'I signify something to you, I signify my wish to you', is the important point that I particularly had in mind. The term implies the structuring action in the subject of signifiers that have been constituted, in relation to need, in an essential modification due to the entry of desire into demand.

Let me pause for a moment to make a parenthetical remark.

Up till now, for reasons of time and economy, I have left dreams to one side this year even though I have been discussing formations of the unconscious. You know Freud's statement concerning dreams – that a dream expresses a desire. But, in the end, we have not even started to wonder about what this desire in dreams we talk about actually is. There is more than one in a dream. There are the desires of the day which provide it with its occasion and its material, whereas, as everyone knows, what matters is the unconscious desire.

Why, in short, did Freud recognize this unconscious desire in dreams? In the name of what? How is it recognized? Apparently, there is nothing in a dream that corresponds to the way in which a desire is expressed grammatically. There is no text of a dream except for what has to be translated into an underlying articulation, but at the level of this articulation, which is masked and latent, what differentiates, what identifies what dreams articulate? Nothing, apparently.

Notice that ultimately what Freud recognizes as desire in dreams is clearly indicated by what I am telling you, namely, by the modification of need – which is fundamentally masked because it is articulated in a medium that transforms it. That goes through a number of modes and images which are there as signifiers, and this presupposes that an entire structure has come into play.

This structure is undoubtedly the structure of the subject inasmuch as a number of instances have to be brought into operation, but we only recognize it through the fact that whatever enters into a dream is subject to the modes and transformations of signifiers, to the structures of metaphor and metonymy, condensation and displacement. What gives the law for the expression of desire in dreams is, effectively, the law of signifiers. It is through an exegesis of what is articulated in a particular dream that we can discern something, which is what, ultimately? Something that we assume

which is inscribed therein, is articulated, and which we always relate to something that originally took place in childhood and has been repressed. This is ultimately what we give primacy of meaning to in what is articulated in dreams.

Something quite crucial with respect to structuring the subject's desire occurs there. Now we can say what it is – it is the primordial experiences that occurred during the desires of childhood, the essential desires, that is the desire for the Other's desire, or the desire to be desired. What has been inscribed in the subject over the course of these events remains there, permanently subjacent. It's what gives the final word on what interests us in a dream. An unconscious desire finds expression through the mask of what fortuitously provides a dream with its material. It is signified through the always specific conditions that the law of the signifier imposes upon desire.

I am trying to teach you to substitute the fundamental notion of the subject's primordial dependence upon the Other's desire for the mechanics or economy of gratifications, needs, fixations and aggressions – which remains more or less confused in the theory because it is always partial. What is structured in the subject always passes through the intermediary of this mechanism, which means that his desire is already shaped by the conditions of demand. That is what is inscribed in his structure, over the subject's history – these are the twists and turns, the avatars, of the constitution of desire, insofar as it is subject to the law of the Other's desire. This is what makes the most profound of the subject's desires the desire that remains suspended in the unconscious, the sum, the entirety I would say, of this capital D, the Other's desire.

Only this can make sense of the developments in analysis that you are familiar with, which have placed so much emphasis on the primordial relationship with the mother that all of the later dialectic, even the Oedipal dialectic, has ultimately eluded it, or seems to have.

This movement both heads in the right direction and formulates it in a way that misses the point. What is important, effectively, is not merely frustration as such, namely, more or less what in the real has been given or not given to the subject. It's in what way the subject has looked for and located this desire of the Other that is the mother's desire. And what matters is to get him to recognize, in relation to this x of desire in the mother, in what way he has been brought to become, or not brought to become, the one who corresponds to it, to become, or not, the desired being.

This is essential. In neglecting it even as she approaches it, in penetrating as deeply as possible into what happens in the child, Melanie Klein discovered many things. But by formulating it simply 272 as the child's encounter with the maternal person, she ends up with a specular, mirroring relation. Consequently, the body – and it is already very striking that the body is in the foreground – the maternal body, becomes the enclosure and habitat for everything in the child's drives that can be located in it through projection, and which themselves are motivated by aggression due to fundamental disappointment. Ultimately, nothing in this dialectic is able to get us out of a mechanism of illusory projection, a construction of the world based on a sort of autogenesis of primordial fantasies. The genesis of the outside as the locus of the bad remains purely artificial and subjects all subsequent access to reality to a pure dialectic of phantasy.

To complement the Kleinian dialectic, it is necessary to introduce this notion that for the subject the outside is already given, not as something that is projected out from the subject's inside, out of his drives, but as the place or the locus in which the Other's desire is located, and where the subject has to go to encounter it.

That is the only way in which we can discover the solution to the aporias engendered by the Kleinian approach, which has shown itself to be so fertile at many points, but ultimately causes the primordial dialectic of desire, as Freud discovered it, to disappear, misses it completely, or reconstructs it in some implicit manner, which she herself does not notice, but in a manner that is illicit because without grounds. This primordial dialectic includes a third relationship, which, beyond the mother, or even through her, brings into play the presence of the character, whether desired or a rival, but invariably a third party, of the father.

This is what justifies the schema I gave you when I told you it is necessary to initially put into place the fundamental symbolic triad, namely the mother, the child and the father.

The mother's absence or presence offers the child – placed here as a symbolic term, this is not the subject – the possibility of being or not being a wanted child and does so merely by virtue of the introduction of the symbolic dimension.

The third term is essential in that he is what permits or prohibits all that. He is placed beyond the mother's absence or presence, as a meaning or signifying presence, which does or doesn't enable him to appear. The subject has to situate himself in relation to this, once the signifying order has come into play.

The subject extends his concrete and real life to him, a life which already consists of desires in the imaginary sense, in the sense of capture, in the sense in which images fascinate him and in the sense in which, in relation to these images, he feels like an ego, a centre, or like a master, or as if dominated.

As you know, the image of oneself, of the body, plays a primordial role in the imaginary relationship in man and comes to dominate everything. The fascination of this image in man is closely bound up with the fact that he is open to this dialectic of signifiers we are talking about. Reducing captivating images to the central image of the image of the body is not unconnected to the fundamental relationship that the subject has with this signifying triad. This relationship to the signifying triad introduces the third term by which the subject, beyond his dual relationship, beyond his relationship of captivation with images, demands, as it were, to be signified. And it is for this reason that there are three poles on the imaginary plane. 273

In the minimal constitution of the symbolic field beyond the ego and its image, by virtue of the fact that I have to enter under the conditions of the signifier, something must mark the fact that my desire has to be signified, insofar as it necessarily passes through a demand that I must signify on the symbolic plane. In other words, a general symbol of this margin that always separates me off from my desire is required, a margin by virtue of which my desire is always marked by the alteration it undergoes through entering into the signifier. There is a general symbol of this margin, this fundamental lack necessary for my desire's admission into the signifier and for making it the desire that I have to deal with in the analytic dialectic. This symbol is what designates the signified insofar as it is always signified, distorted or even signified to the side.

We can observe this in the schema I gave you [see p. 241]. This triangle is in the subject at the level of the imaginary. Here, his image, i. Here, the point at which the ego, m, is constituted. Here, what I designate for you with the letter φ, namely the phallus.

The constitutive function of the phallus in the dialectic of the subject's introduction to his pure and simple existence and to his sexual position is impossible to deduce if we don't make it the fundamental signifier by which the subject's desire has to be recognized as such, whether in the case of a man or a woman.

The fact is that desire, whatever it may be, has this phallic reference in the subject. It's the subject's desire, of course, but, insofar as the subject himself has received its signification, he must draw his power as a subject from a sign, and he only obtains this sign through mutilating himself and losing something, by which everything comes to have value.

This is not a deduction. It is given in analytic experience. It's the essence of Freud's discovery.

It's what makes it the case that Freud, writing 'Über die weibliche Sexualität' ['Female Sexuality'] in 1931, lays down an affirmation 274 that, at first sight, is no doubt problematic, insufficient and in need of elaboration, and which provokes responses first from all the women analysts – Helene Deutsch, Karen Horney, Melanie Klein, Josine Müller along with many others – and then, summarizing all of that and expressing it in a manner that is more or less compatible with how Freud puts it, is Ernest Jones's intervention.

This is what we are going to examine today.

Let's take up the question at its most paradoxical point.

Initially, the paradox presents itself at the level of a sort of scientific observation. It's as a natural scientist that Freud says to us, 'What my experience shows me is that the phallus is also central for a woman, and not only for a man.'

Consistent with the general formula that I was trying to give you just now, he showed us that the subject cannot be introduced into the dialectic that enables him to take up place and rank in the transmission of human types and enables him to become a father in his turn, without what a moment ago I called this fundamental mutilation owing to which the phallus will become the signifier of power, the sceptre, and also owing to which virility can be assumed. Up to that point, we have understood Freud. But he goes further and shows us how this same phallus appears at the centre of the feminine dialectic. Here, something gaping seems to open up.

Until now, it was in terms of struggle or biological rivalry that, at a pinch, we were able to understand man's accession to the qualities of man via the castration complex. But in the woman's case this affirmation surely presents a paradox, and Freud introduces it initially as a pure and simple fact of observation, one that therefore presents itself – like everything observed – as a part of nature, as natural.

This does indeed seem to be how he effectively introduces things when he tells us – I'll say this as it's written – that the girl, like the boy, initially desires the mother. There is only one way to desire. The girl initially thinks she is equipped with a phallus, just as she also thinks that her mother is equipped with a phallus.

What that means is that the natural evolution of drives brings it about that, from one transfer to another across the instinctual phases, from the form of the breast and on through a number 275 of other forms, one arrives at this phallic fantasy by which it is ultimately in a masculine position that the girl presents herself in relation to the mother. It's consequently necessary that something more complex for her than for the boy intervenes for her to recognize her feminine position. In Freud's description, not only is there nothing to support recognition of the feminine position, but it is assumed to be lacking from the outset.

It is no minor paradox to make an affirmation that runs so counter to nature, which, on the contrary, might suggest a symmetry in relation to the position of the boy, by distinguishing the vagina, or even, as someone has said, the vaginal mouth, for the girl. We have observations which go, I would say, contrary to the Freudian data. There are primitive lived experiences the primordial trace of which we can find in young subjects, and which show that, contrary to the claims about a primitive misrecognition, something can stir within the subject, at least as a reaction it seems, at the time of the procedure of breastfeeding. The baby girl still at the breast shows some no doubt vague emotion, but it isn't completely unjustified to refer it to a profound bodily emotion, no doubt difficult to localize behind the memories, but which would, in short, make it possible to equate, through a series of transmissions, the mouth during feeding with the vaginal mouth, and moreover, in the developed state of femininity, with the function of an absorbing or even sucking organ.

There is something here that is locatable in experience, and it provides the continuity by which, if it were merely a question of the migration of the erogenous drive, we could see the royal road to the evolution of femininity traced out at the biological level. It's of this that Jones is effectively making himself the advocate and theoretician when he thinks it is impossible, for all sorts of in-principle reasons, to admit that the evolution of sexuality for a woman is destined for this detour and this artificialism.

Jones proffers, then, a theory that, point by point, opposes what Freud describes as a given of observation – the phallic phase of the little girl rests, according to him, on a drive whose natural supports he demonstrates in two elements. The first, accepted, is primordial biological bisexuality. But this is a point, as we must recognize, that is purely theoretical and a long way from what we can access, so we can be very much in agreement with him when he says it. But there is something else – the presence of the beginnings of a phallic organ. Effectively, the clitoral orgasm of her first pleasures linked to masturbation can give rise to the beginnings of the phallic fantasy 276 that plays the decisive role Freud describes. And this is what he emphasizes – the phallic phase is a clitoral phallic phase, the fantasmatic penis is an exaggeration of the small penis effectively present in female anatomy.

Freud sees the source of the little girl's entry into her feminine position in disappointment. The exit from her phallic phase is engendered by this disappointment, a detour that in his view is, however, founded on a natural mechanism. And it's at this moment, he tells us, that the Oedipus complex plays the normative role it has to play, but in the little girl it plays it inversely to the little boy. The Oedipus complex gives her access to this penis she lacks through perceiving the male's penis, whether she discovers it in a playmate, or places it or, equally, discovers it in the father.

It is through disappointment or disillusionment in relation to this fantasmatic phase of the phallic phase that the little girl is introduced to the Oedipus complex, as was theorized by one of the first analysts to follow Freud in this field, Mrs Lampl-de-Groot. As she quite correctly observed, the little girl enters the Oedipus complex through the inverted phase of the complex. The girl is initially present in the Oedipus complex via her relationship with the mother, and it is the failure of this relationship with the mother which opens up the relationship with the father for her, with what, subsequently, will be found to be normativized by an equivalence between this penis, which she will never possess, and the child that she will effectively be able to have and give in its place.

Note that a number of the reference points I have been teaching you can be found here. Penisneid here finds itself to be the essential point of articulation for a woman's entry into the Oedipal dialectic, just as castration finds itself at the heart of the dialectic in a man. No doubt the criticisms I am going to formulate for you, like those that Jones has contributed, will call into question this conception, which, of course, from the outside, when one begins to study analytic theory, looks like an artificial construction.

First, let's pause here for a moment to emphasize the ambiguity with which the term 'Penisneid' is used at different moments in the girl's Oedipal evolution – as Jones's discussion points out, moreover. Penisneid effectively presents itself in three distinct modes, from the entry into to the exit from the Oedipus complex, as Freud describes them concerning the phallic phase.

There is Penisneid in the sense of fantasy. It's this wish, this long-maintained wish, sometimes maintained one's whole life – that the 277 clitoris be a penis. Freud insists upon the irreducible character of this fantasy whenever it is kept in the foreground.

There is another meaning, when Penisneid intervenes at the moment at which what is desired is the father's penis. This is when the subject attaches herself to the reality of the penis, there where it is, and can see where to go to get it. She is as much deprived of it by Oedipal prohibition as by reason of physiological impossibility.

Finally, in the evolving series, the fantasy of having a child by the father emerges – that is, of having the penis in symbolic form.

Remember what I have taught you to distinguish with respect to the castration complex – castration, frustration and privation – and ask yourselves which of these three forms corresponds to each of these three terms.

Frustration is imaginary, but it bears upon an object that is very real. It's in this respect that the fact that the little girl does not receive the penis from the father is frustration.

Privation is completely real, even though it only bears upon a symbolic object. Effectively, when the little girl doesn't have a child by the father, it has ultimately never been any question of ever having one by him. She is incapable of having his child. The child, moreover, is there only as a symbol, and a symbol precisely of that of which she is really deprived. It is, therefore, in the name of privation that the child's desire for the father intervenes at a certain moment in the evolution.

There remains, then, what corresponds to castration, which symbolically amputates the subject of something imaginary. The fact that in this case this is a fantasy corresponds to it quite closely.

Whatever we make of Freud's conception, he's heading in the right direction when he details the little girl's position in relation to her clitoris – at some time she would have to renounce what she was keeping in store, at least as a hope, namely, that sooner or later it would become something as important as a penis. This is the level at which what corresponds structurally to castration is located, if you remember what I thought necessary to spell out when talking to you about castration at the elective point at which it manifests itself – that is, in the boy.

One can dispute whether everything in the girl effectively revolves around the clitoral drive. One can probe the detours of the Oedipal drama, as happens to have been done. You are now going to see this through Jones's critique. But first we cannot fail to notice the rigour, from the structural perspective, of the point that Freud designates as corresponding to castration. It is at the level of a fantasmatic 278 relation – insofar, of course, as it takes on a signifying value – that the symmetrical point was found.

It is now a matter of understanding how this comes about. It isn't because that point is used that it gives us the key to the matter. It apparently gives it to us in Freud insofar as he gives the impression of showing us here a story about an anomaly of the drive, and it is this that is going to make a number of subjects revolt and rebel, and do so precisely in the name of biological preconceptions. But you will see, in the very formulation of their objections, what they end up saying. They are, by the nature of things, forced to articulate a number of characteristics that will make taking the next step possible.

It is, effectively, a matter of going beyond the theory of natural drives and seeing that the phallus really does intervene in the way that I have been expounding to you in the premises of today's class. This is nothing other than what I have just been outlining in other ways, namely that the phallus intervenes here as a signifier.

But let's now turn to Jones's exposition, which comes in reply.

There are three important articles by Jones on the topic. One, written in 1935, is called 'Early Female Sexuality', and it is this one that we shall be talking about today. It was preceded by the article on 'The Phallic Phase', presented at the Congress of Wiesbaden three years earlier in September 1932, and, finally, by 'Early Development of Female Sexuality', communicated to the Innsbruck Congress in September 1927, which Freud alludes to in his 1931 article when, very contemptuously I must say, he refutes the positions taken by Jones in several lines, who replies in 'The Phallic Phase' by spelling out his position against Freud, in sum, even as he attempts to remain as close as possible to the letter of Freud.

The third article, which I will draw on today, is extremely significant for what we want to demonstrate. It is also the most developed point in Jones's position. It is located four years after Freud's article on female sexuality. It was presented at the request of Federn, who at the time was vice president of the Viennese Society. Jones was brought to Vienna in order to put before the Viennese circle what he straightforwardly formulated as being the London point of view, which was, as it turns out, already centred on the Kleinian experience.

279 In true London fashion, Jones draws some sharp distinctions, his intervention thereby gaining greater purity and clarity, and it's a good basis for discussion. It's very interesting to pause over a number of his remarks, referring as much as possible to the text.

Jones first observes that experience shows us how difficult it is, when one studies a child, to grasp the supposedly masculine position of the little girl in relation to her mother at the time of the phallic phase. The further one goes back towards the origin, the more we find ourselves confronted there with something that is critical. I apologize if by following this text we find ourselves looking at positions that are sometimes a little tangential in relation to the line that I am tracing out for you here, but they deserve our attention for what they reveal.

Jones's suppositions – I am going to tell you this straight off – are essentially directed at what he openly states at the end of the article. Is a woman a being who is born a woman, as such? Or is she a being who is made a woman? That is where he locates his question, and it's what makes him rebel against Freud's position. These are the alternatives towards which his thinking is heading. No doubt his work results from a sort of summary of facts arising from concrete experience with children and which enable one either to object or sometimes to confirm, but, in any case, to rectify Freud's conception – but what informs his entire demonstration is the fact that at the end he raises it as a question, 'Yes or no?' In fact, there is no possibility of a choice in his eyes, one of the two responses being absolutely unacceptable – from his perspective, it would not be possible to maintain a position which implies that half of humanity consists of beings that are made* in the defiles of the Oedipus complex.

He doesn't seem to observe in this respect that the Oedipal defile no less makes men, if this is what it's about. Nevertheless, the fact that women enter with luggage that is not their own seems to him to be sufficiently different from the boy for him to object.

In substance, this claim consists in saying this – it's true that in the little girl we observe, at a particular moment in her evolution, the foregrounding of the phallus and a demand, a desire, which manifests itself in the ambiguous form, so problematic for us, of Penisneid. But what is this? Everything that he explains to us consists in this – it's a defensive formation, a detour comparable to a phobia, and the exit from the phallic phase has to be thought of as the recovery from a phobia that is, in short, a very widespread phobia, a normal phobia, but of the same order and with the same mechanism as a phobia.

Since, in short, as you can see, I am choosing to jump right into 280 the heart of his demonstration, it does have to be said that there is something there that is, all the same, extraordinarily opportune for our own reflections, inasmuch as you may still remember the way I attempted to spell out the function of phobia for you. If it is indeed the case that the little girl's relation to the phallus has to be conceived as Jones says, then we are undoubtedly getting closer to the conception I am giving you when I say to you that the phallus intervenes in the little girl's Oedipal relations as a privileged signifying element.

Am I saying that we are about to rally to Jones's position here? Certainly not. If you recall the difference I have drawn between a phobia and a fetish, we can say that here the phallus is playing the role of a fetish rather than of a phobic object. We will come back to this later.

Coming back to the beginning of Jones's critical exposition, let's discuss how this phobia is formed. For him, this phobia is a defensive construction against the danger engendered by the child's primitive drives, both the little girl's and the little boy's. But here it is a question of the little girl, and he observes that her original relationship to the mother – this is where I paused just before when I told you that we were going to encounter some highly unusual things – is proof of a primitive feminine position. He says that she is a long way from behaving towards her mother like a man towards a woman. 'Her mother she regards not as a man regards a woman, as a creature whose wishes to receive something it is a pleasure to fulfil' [p. 265]. He would have us believe that a man considers a woman as a creature whose desires to receive something it is a pleasure to accede to, to fulfil.

We have to acknowledge that it is paradoxical at the very least to introduce a position that is as developed as the relationship between a man and a woman into the level we are at. It is quite certain that when Freud speaks of the masculine position of the little girl, in no way does he make mention of this most complete effect of civilization, if indeed it is ever truly attained, where man is there to fulfil all the desires of a woman. But coming from the pen of someone who enters into this domain with such naturalistic ambitions at the outset, we cannot fail to single out this characteristic as evidence, I would say, of one of the difficulties in this field, and which cannot be such a minor one for him to run up against at this point in his demonstration and, moreover, right at the start. At least he does not confuse, but instead contrasts, man's position with respect to the woman and that of the child with respect to the mother.

281 He then brings in, in the wake of Melanie Klein, the mother as milk jug, whom the child considers – I am translating Jones – as 'a person who had been successful in filling herself with just the things the child wants so badly' [p. 265]. This 'successful' carries a lot of weight because it implies, although Jones is not aware of this, that by basing things on the text of what one finds in the child, the maternal subject is indeed a desiring being. The person who has been successful is the mother, since she has been fortunate enough to succeed in filling herself with the things that the child desires so badly, namely with this pleasant material of both a solid and liquid kind.

One only has access to the child's original experience from a distance, but Melanie Klein has come as close to it as one possibly can by analysing three- to four-year-old children, and has given us the discovery of a relationship to the object that is structured in a form I have characterized as the empire of the maternal body. It's not possible to misrecognize that merely representing that to us is a distinguished contribution.

You will find this in her contributions concerning what she calls the very early Oedipus complex in the child. The latter's drawings show us that the maternal empire carries within it what I have called, with reference to Chinese history, the Warring States. The child is able to draw what she locates as signifiers – brothers, sisters, excrement – inside this field. All of that cohabits in the maternal body, everything is already inside her, since she also identifies what the dialectic of the treatment enables one to describe as the paternal phallus. The latter is supposedly already present as a particularly harmful and rivalrous element in relation to the child's demands concerning possession of the contents of the maternal body.

It is very difficult for us to fail to see that these data call into question and deepen the problematic character of relations that are presented to us as so-called natural, whereas we already see them as structured by what last time I called an entire battery of signifiers articulated in such a way that no natural biological relation could ever account for them.

It is, therefore, already at the level of this primitive experience that the phallus makes its entry onto the stage in the child's dialectic. Although this reference is presented to us by Melanie Klein as deduced from what the child offers, the fact remains no less stupefying. The introduction of the penis as a breast that is more accessible, more convenient and, in some way, more perfect is supposed to be accepted as a fact of experience.

Of course, if this is a given, then it's valid. Nevertheless, it 282 remains the case that it's not self-evident. What can possibly make the penis something more accessible, more convenient and more enjoyable than the primordial breast? It is a question of what this penis signifies and, therefore, of the child's early introduction into a signifying dialectic. Moreover, everything in Jones's demonstration subsequently does nothing but raise this question in an increasingly pressing manner.

As required by his premises, Jones is led to tell us that the phallus can only intervene as the means of and the pretext for a kind of defence. He therefore supposes that at the outset the little girl finds herself interested libidinally in a certain primitive apprehension of her own female organ, and from there he goes on to explain to us why it is necessary that she repress this apprehension of her vagina. The female child's relationship with her own genitals evokes greater anxiety than does the little boy's relationship with his genitals because, as he says, the organ is more internal, more diffuse, more profoundly specific to her first motions. Hence the role that the clitoris will therefore play.

If Jones does not resile here from relatively naive observations, it is, I am convinced, so as to highlight the necessities that they imply. The subject will use the clitoris, he says, insofar as it is external, to project her anxieties onto it, and it will more easily be a reassuring object on her part, because she will be capable of experiencing, through her own experimentations, even visually at a pinch, the fact that the organ is still there. Later in her evolution it will always be external objects, namely her appearance and her clothing, that a woman will make the focus of what he calls the need for reassurance, which thus enables her to temper anxiety by displacing it onto an object that is not its point of origin. The result of this is that precisely this origin turns out to be particularly misrecognized.

As you can see, here we find once again the implied requirement that the phallus come to the foreground as externalizable and representable, as the limiting term at which anxiety stops. That is Jones's dialectic. Let's see whether it is adequate.

This dialectic leads him to present the phallic phase as a phallic position which enables the child to keep anxiety at a distance by centring it on something accessible, whereas her own oral or sadistic desires directed at the interior of the maternal body immediately evoke the fear of reprisals and appear to her as a danger capable of 283 threatening her inside her own body. That is the genesis that Jones gives to the phallic position as a phobia.

It is certainly as a fantasized, but accessible, exteriorized organ that the phallus comes into play and will subsequently be capable of disappearing from the scene again. The fears linked to hostility will be capable of being dampened by being referred to other objects than the mother. The erogeneity and anxiety linked to the internal organs will be capable of being displaced through the process of a number of masturbatory practices. Ultimately, he says, the relation to the feminine object will become less partial and will be able to be displaced onto other objects, and the original unnameable anxiety, linked to the female organ, which corresponds in the girl-child to the castration anxieties in the boy, can subsequently vary and transform itself into this fear of being abandoned which, in the words of Jones, is characteristic of female psychology.

That, then, is the problem we find ourselves faced with, and you see how Freud intends to resolve it. His position is that of an observer, and therefore his elaboration presents itself as an empirical observation.

The link with the phallic phase is in the nature of a drive. The entry into femininity occurs on the basis of a libido which, by its nature, is, let's say, active – in order to put things exactly in their place, without following Jones in his critique, which is a bit of a caricature. One arrives at the feminine position to the extent that, through a series of transformations and equivalences, disappointment manages to give birth in the subject to a demand with respect to the paternal figure, that something that will fulfil her desire come to her.

Ultimately, Freud's presupposition, fully spelt out moreover, is that the primordial infantile demand is, as he says, ziellos, aimless. What she demands is everything, and it's by virtue of the disappointment of this demand, moreover impossible to satisfy, that little by little the child enters into a more normative position. That is, surely, a formulation which, as problematic as it may be, comprises an opening that will enable us to elaborate the problem with the terms 'desire' and 'demand', which are the ones I have been trying to emphasize.

Jones's response to this is that this is a natural history, a naturalist's observation – which is not as natural as all that – 'and I will make it more natural for you'. He says as much. The history of phallic phobia is only a detour along the path to a primordially determined position. A woman is born, born a woman, in a position that is already that of a mouth, of an absorbent mouth, a sucking mouth. Following the decline of her phobia, which is nothing but a simple detour, she will rediscover her primitive position. What 284 you call phallic drive is only the artificialism of a counter-described phobia provoked in the child by its hostility and aggression towards the mother. It is nothing but a pure detour in an essentially instinctual cycle, and the woman subsequently and rightfully enters her place, which is vaginal.

That, in summary, is Ernest Jones's conception.

In reply, what I will try to spell out for you is this.

The phallus is absolutely inconceivable in Kleinian dynamics or mechanics. It is only conceivable if it is already implied that it is the signifier of lack, the signifier of the distance between the subject's demand and his desire. To accede to this desire, something must always be deducted at the necessary entrance into the cycle of signifiers. If the woman has to go via this signifier, however paradoxical that is, it's insofar as it's not a question for her of fulfilling a primitively given female position, but of entering into a defined dialectic of exchange. Whereas the man, the male, is isolated by virtue of the signifying existence of all the prohibitions that constitute the Oedipal relation, she has to inscribe herself in the cycle of exchanges of alliance and kinship in the name of herself becoming an object of exchange.

What structures the Oedipal relation to begin with is, as every analysis effectively shows us, that the woman must propose or, more exactly, accept being an element in the cycle of exchanges. This fact is huge in itself, and infinitely more important from the natural point of view than all the anomalies in her instinctive evolution that up till now we have been able to observe. We must expect, effectively, that we will find a kind of representative of this at the imaginary level, at the level of desire, in the convoluted ways she has to take to enter it.

The fact that she must – like the man, moreover – inscribe herself in the world of signifiers, is for her punctuated by this desire which, qua signified, will always have to remain at a certain distance from, in the margin of, whatever can be put down to a natural need. Effectively, introduction into this dialectic requires that something in the natural relation has to be amputated, sacrificed – and to what end? Precisely so that it can become the very element that signifies the entry into demand.

285 You will observe a return, which I will not say is surprising, of the necessity – which I have just announced with all the brutality carried by this sociological remark founded on everything we know, most recently articulated by Lévi-Strauss in his Elementary Structures of Kinship – the necessity for one half of humanity to become a signifier of exchange, according to various laws, more simply structured in elementary structures, bearing much more sophisticated effects in the complex structures of kinship. What we observe, effectively, in the dialectic of the child's entry into the system of signifiers is in some ways the other side of the woman's passage as signifying object into what we can call the 'social dialectic', in quotation marks, for the entire accent has to be placed here on the dependence of the social with respect to the signifying and combinatory structure. Now, in order for the child to enter into this signifying social dialectic, what do we observe? Very precisely this, that there is no other desire on which it depends more closely and more directly than the woman's desire, and insofar as it is signified precisely by what she lacks, the phallus.

What I have shown you is that everything that we encounter as obstacle or accident in the child's evolution, and this includes the most radical of these obstacles and accidents, is linked to this, that the child doesn't find itself alone with the mother, but that along with the mother there is the signifier of her desire, namely the phallus. We find ourselves here faced with what will be the theme of my next class.

One of two things is true. Either the child enters into the dialectic, makes itself the object in the current of exchanges and, at a given moment, renounces his father and his mother – that is, the primitive objects of his desire. Or he keeps these objects. That is, he retains something in them that is much more than their value, for their value is precisely what can be exchanged. From the moment he reduces these objects to pure signifiers even as he clings to them as objects of his desire, the Oedipal attachment is invariably preserved – that is to say, the infantile relation with parental objects does not pass. And to the extent that it does not pass, and strictly to that extent, we see appear – let's say, in a very general form – these inversions or perversions of desire which show that within the imaginary relation with Oedipal objects, no normativization is possible.

Why not? Very precisely for this reason, which is that, even in the most primitive relation, that of the child to the mother, the phallus as object of the mother's desire is always there in a third place, and this raises an insurmountable obstacle to the satisfaction of the child's 286 desire, which is to be the exclusive object of the mother's desire. And this is what pushes him to a series of solutions, which will always be to reduce or to identify with this triad. If it is necessary for the mother to be phallic, or for the phallus to be put in the mother's place, then we have fetishism. If it is necessary that he bring about within himself, intimately, the conjunction of the phallus and the mother without which nothing in him can be satisfied, then we have transvestism. In short, it's inasmuch as the child – that is, that being who enters with natural needs into this dialectic – does not renounce his object that his desire does not succeed in being satisfied.

Desire only succeeds in being satisfied on the condition of a partial renunciation – which is essentially what I initially elaborated by saying that it has to become a demand, that is, a desire qua signified, signified through the existence and intervention of signifiers, that is, in part, alienated desire.

INSIGNIAS OF THE IDEAL

Karen Horney and Helene Deutsch Masculinity complex and homosexuality
The process of secondary identification
Mother and woman
The metaphor of the ego-ideal

I would like to start today by introducing the question of identifications. For those who were not here last time, as well as for those who were, I will recall the gist of what was said.

I attempted to draw attention to the difficulties that the notion of the phallic phase raises. One finds it quite difficult, in effect, to fit what Freud extracted from experience into any biological rationality, whereas things become clear immediately if we assume that the phallus is taken into a certain subjective function where it has to play the role of a signifier.

This phallus-signifier didn't just come out of the blue. At its origin, which is an imaginary origin, it must have had some property for it to fulfil its signifying function. This isn't just any function – it's one more especially adapted than others to hook the human subject into the entire mechanism of signifiers.

In some ways it's a crossroads-signifier. More or less whatever takes place over the course of the human subject's capture in the signifying system converges upon it inasmuch as one's desire has to pass through this system if it's to gain recognition and inasmuch as it's profoundly modified as a consequence. This is a fact of experience – we encounter the phallus at every turn in our experience of the Oedipal drama, at its entry and at its exits.

One may even say, in a certain problematic way, that it extends beyond this Oedipal drama, since, also, one cannot but be struck by the presence of the phallus, and specifically the paternal phallus, in the primitive Kleinian fantasies. It's precisely this presence that raises for us the question of the register into which these Kleinian fantasies are to be inserted. Should it be the register that Melanie 288

Klein herself proposed in accepting a very early Oedipus complex? Or, on the contrary, should we accept a primitive imaginary functioning classified as pre-Oedipal? The question can be left open for the moment.

To clarify the function of the phallus that is present here in a completely general manner, precisely because it presents itself as a signifier function, we have to see, before we push our formulas to the limit, in what signifying economy the phallus is involved. This means investigating the moment that Freud explored and formulated as the exit from the Oedipus complex, where, following the repression of Oedipal desire, the subject emerges new – and equipped with what? The answer is – with an ego-ideal.

In the normal Oedipus complex, the effect of the repression that results from the exit from the Oedipus complex is to constitute an identification in the subject that has an ambivalent relationship with the latter. It's best if we proceed step by step on this. One thing at least emerges unequivocally, I mean in just one way, from what Freud was the first to raise, and no author has neglected to raise it as a minimal formulation – this is an identification distinct from the ego's identification.

Whereas the ego's structure rests on the subject's relationship to the image of the semblable, the ego-ideal's structure raises a problem specific to it. Effectively, the ego-ideal is not put forward – it's almost stating the obvious to say this – as an ideal ego. I have often stressed that the two terms are distinct in Freud, and this is so in the very article, 'Zur Einführung des Narzissmus' ['On Narcissism'], but you need to look at it with a magnifying glass, for the difference is very difficult to detect in the text, to the point where some people confuse the two. First, this is not accurate, but if it were, by convention we should note that there is no synonymy between what is attributed to the ego-ideal's function in Freud's texts, inspired by clinical experience, and the meaning we may attribute to the ego's image – however much we glorify it by making it an ideal image with which the subject identifies, or a successful model, as it were, of himself, which he confuses himself with and thereby reassures himself of his wholeness.

For example, what is under threat when we make an allusion to fears of narcissistic attacks on the body, what we are referring 289 to when we speak of the necessity for narcissistic reassurance, can be placed in the register of the ideal ego. As for the ego-ideal, it intervenes in functions that are often depressive, even aggressive, with respect to the subject. Freud brings this into play in diverse forms of depression. At the end of Chapter 7 of Massenpsychologie [Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego], which is called 'Die Identifizierung' ['Identification'], where for the first time he introduces the notion of the ego-ideal decisively and in an articulated manner, he is inclined to place all forms of depression in the register, not of the ego-ideal, but of some vacillating relationship of conflict between the ego and the ego-ideal.

Let's grant that everything that takes place in the depressive register or, conversely, in that of elation, is to be considered from the angle of open hostility between the two instances, whichever of the instances the declaration of hostilities starts in, whether it be the ego that rebels, or the ego-ideal that becomes too severe, with the consequences and repercussions of the imbalance of this excessive relationship. The fact remains that the ego-ideal presents us with a problem.

We're told that the ego-ideal results from a late identification, that the latter is linked to the three-party relationship in the Oedipus complex, and that desire and rivalry, aggression and hostility mix with one another in a complex manner. Something is being worked out, a conflict, the outcome of which is in the balance. Even if the outcome of the conflict is uncertain, it's nevertheless suggested that it introduces a subjective transformation by virtue of the introduction – introjection, as they say – into a certain structure, which is called the ego-ideal, and which henceforth turns out to be a part of the subject himself – even as it retains, however, a relation to an external object. Both things are there, and we are here touching on the fact that, as analysis teaches us, intrasubjectivity and intersubjectivity cannot be separated. Whatever the modifications that intervene to affect the subject's entourage and milieu, what he acquires as ego-ideal is like the country of an exile which he carries stuck to the soles of his shoes – his ego-ideal does indeed belong to him, it's something acquired. It's not an object, it's something extra in the subject.

We are reminded, with a great deal of insistence, that intrasubjectivity and intersubjectivity must remain connected in the analytic process. In the current use of analysis, people speak of the relations between the ego and the ego-ideal as relations that can be either good or bad, in conflict or harmonious. One brackets, or doesn't succeed in formulating, what has to be formulated and which is imposed by the minimal requirements of our language, namely, that these relationships are always structured as intersubjective relationships.

The same mode of relations that exist between subjects is reproduced internally to the subject – and, as you well know, it can only be reproduced on the basis of a signifying organization. We are unable to think – even though we say it, and even though it may work when we do say it – that the superego is effectively something severe that spies on the ego and inflicts dreadful misery on it. It is not a person. It functions inside a subject in the way one subject acts towards another subject, and precisely in the sense that a relationship between subjects doesn't necessarily imply the existence of a person – conditions introduced by the existence and functioning of signifiers as such are sufficient for the establishment of intersubjective relationships. 290

It's this intersubjectivity inside the living person that we are dealing with in analysis. It's at the heart of this intersubjectivity that we have to form an idea of what the ego-ideal's function is. You will not find this function in a dictionary, you will not get an unequivocal response, you will only find the greatest confusion. This function is, for sure, not to be confused with that of the superego. They came along together almost, but, for this very reason, they were distinguished from one another. Let's say that they are conflated in part, but that the ego-ideal plays more of a classificatory function in the subject's desire. It does seem to be linked to the adoption of one's sexual type, insofar as the latter is implicated in an entire economy that is at times a social one. It's a matter of masculine and feminine functions, not simply insofar as they result in the act necessary for reproduction, but insofar as they comprise an entire world of relations between men and women.

Of what interest are the findings of analysis on this point? Analysis has made it possible for us to get inside a function that only shows itself at the surface and through its results. It has done this by taking cases where the outcome has been a failure, here following the well-known method, called psychopathological, which consists in breaking a function down and dismantling it by grasping it at the point where it turns out to be imperceptibly displaced or deviant, and where, as a result, what is usually inserted more or less normally into all its surroundings appears with its roots and branches laid bare.

I would like to refer here to our experience of the impact on a certain type of subject of the failure of identification, or that we assume to be partial or provisional failure, with what can be called their regular, satisfying type. We will need to choose a particular case. Let's therefore take that of those women where we can discern 291 what has been called the 'masculinity complex' that has been linked to the existence of the phallic phase. We can do this because I have already emphasized the problematic aspect of the existence of this phallic phase.

Is there something of the instinctual here? Could a sort of flaw in instinctual development for which the existence of the clitoris would be solely responsible be the cause of what translates at the other extreme into the masculinity complex? We are already ready to recognize that it can't be that simple. When you look at it closely in Freud, it's not that simple – he saw clearly that it isn't purely and simply a matter of a detour in feminine development required by a natural anomaly or the famous bisexuality. Anyway, the debate that followed shows us that it's not so simple, even if the debate itself was poorly conceived, beginning as it did with the question-begging assumption that it couldn't be so.

The issue is definitely more complex. However, we are not immediately able to formulate what this is, but we clearly see that the vicissitudes of what presents itself as the masculinity complex in women already indicate a connection with the phallic element, a game with or a use of this element – and this is worth hanging onto, since, also, the use to which an element can be put is, still, of a kind to clarify for us what this element is, fundamentally.

I won't mention everything they tell us today. I will quite especially refer to two of these analysts that are in the background of Jones's discussion of the problem, Helene Deutsch and Karen Horney. Those of you who read English will be able to go to the article by Helene Deutsch that is called 'The Significance of Masochism in the Mental Life of Women', January 1930, International Journal of Psychoanalysis, volume 11, on the one hand, and, on the other, to an article by Karen Horney, January 1924, volume 5, 'On the Genesis of the Castration Complex in Women'.

Whatever one might think of the positions Karen Horney comes to in both theory and technique, she has undeniably been an innovator on the clinical plane from the outset and through to the middle 292 of her career. Her discoveries are still completely valid, however strong or weak are the deductions she might have made from them concerning the anthropological situation of psychoanalysis. What she emphasizes in her article on the castration complex can be summarized as follows. She observes in women an analogy between everything that, clinically, is organized around the idea of castration, and the claims [revendications] subjects make concerning the organ as something they lack. In these claims we find the resonances and clinical traces of castration. Using a series of examples, she shows – you should consult this text – that there is no difference in kind between these cases of phallic demand and certain cases of homosexuality in women, namely those in which the subject, in a certain position with respect to her partner, identifies with the paternal image. There is a seamless continuity between the two. The moments are composed in the same manner. The fantasies, dreams, inhibitions and symptoms are the same. It isn't even possible to say, it seems, that the former constitute an attenuated form of the others, but simply that one has or has not gone beyond a particular threshold, which in itself remains vague.

The point that Karen Horney stresses in this respect is the following. What happens in these cases encourages us to focus our attention on a particular moment in the Oedipus complex that is placed very close to the end of the period, since it presumes that one has arrived at the moment at which not only is the relationship with the father formed, but it's so well formed that it manifests itself in the little girl subject in the form of an explicit desire for the father's penis, which – and for me this is quite correctly emphasized – therefore implies a recognition of the penis, not as fantasmatic, not in general, not in this ambiguous half-light that constantly makes us wonder what the phallus is, but well and truly a recognition of the reality of the penis. We are not at the level of the question, is it or is it not imaginary?

Of course, in its central function, the phallus implies this imaginary existence. At various phases in the development of this relation, the female subject may, in the face of all opposition, maintain that she has it, even as she knows full well that she doesn't have it. She has it simply as an image – she has either had it or has to have it, as is frequently the case. But here, we are told, something else is at stake. It's a question of a penis actualized as real and longed-for as such.

I could not put this forward if I had not already modulated the Oedipus complex in its three moments by pointing out to you that it turns up at each of these three moments in different ways. The father as possessing the real penis intervenes at the third moment. I described it especially for the boy, and here things are perfectly situated for the little girl. 293

What happens, according to what we are told? We are told that, in the cases in question, what results from the privation of what is longed-for is a phenomenon that was not invented by Karen Horney, and is constantly being implemented in Freud's own text – the shift, the mutation that transforms what had been love into identification.

Effectively, it is insofar as the father disappoints an expectation or a demand, with a particular orientation, by the subject that an identification forms. This assumes that the situation is already at an advanced stage. One could say that the subject has reached the peak of the Oedipal situation, were it not that its function consists in the fact that it has to be gone beyond, since it's by going beyond it that the subject will have to find a satisfactory identification with her own sex.

The identification with the father that occurs here is described as a problem, even a mystery. Freud himself stresses that the transformation of love into identification, the possibility of which is manifest here par excellence, is not self-evident. We accept it at this moment, however, and in the first place because we observe it. The thing is to describe how it works, that is, to give a formula that enables us to conceptualize this identification insofar as it is linked to a moment of privation.

I would like to try to give you several formulas for this, because I consider that they are useful for distinguishing what it is from what it is not. If I am introducing this essential element of an articulation in signifiers, it's not for the pleasure, as it were, or simply out of a taste for finding ourselves back amongst words. It's so that we don't use words and signifiers to commit errors of numbing grossness. Let's not take things that are inadequately articulated for things that are sufficiently enlightening. It's by formulating them properly that we will be able effectively to weigh up what's occurring and distinguish what occurs in one case from what occurs in another.

What happens when a female subject takes up a particular position of identifying with the father?

The situation, if you will, is as follows. There is the father, something has been expected at the level of the child, and the singular, paradoxical result is that, from a certain angle and in a certain way, the child becomes this father. She doesn't really become the father, 294 of course, she becomes the father as ego-ideal. A woman in this case can actually say in the most explicit manner, you just have to listen, 'I cough like my father.' This is indeed an identification. Let's try and follow the economy of the transformation step by step.

Still, this little girl is not transformed into a man. We find signs or stigmata of this identification, they are partly expressed and the subject can be aware of them and she may pride herself on them up to a point. What are they? There is no doubt that they are signifying elements.

If a woman says, 'I cough like my father,' or 'I stick my stomach, or my body, out like him,' they are signifying elements. More precisely, in order to get at what is in question, I will use a special term for them, because they are not signifiers brought into play in a signifying chain. I'll call them insignias of the father.

The psychological attitude shows this on the surface – to call things by their name, the subject appears behind the mask of the insignias of masculinity and she places them over what, in every subject as such, is partly undifferentiated.

It's perhaps appropriate here, with the slowness that must always keep us from error, to ask ourselves what becomes of desire in this approach. Where does it all begin? The desire, after all, was not a masculine desire. What becomes of it when the subject adopts the insignias of the father? In relation to whom will these insignias be put to use? In relation, experience shows us, to what takes the place that the mother had occupied in the primitive evolution of the Oedipus complex. From the moment the subject adorns herself with the insignias of that with which she has identified, and the desire that comes into play is transformed in the direction of a passage to the state of a signifier, to the state of an insignia, it is then no longer the same.

What desire are we talking about? At the point in the Oedipus complex we have arrived at and seen what was expected from the relationship with the father, we can suppose that it had been a passionate desire, a properly female appeal and extremely close to a passive genital position. It's quite clear that it's no longer the same desire that is there after the transformation.

Let's leave the question of knowing what has happened to this desire for the moment, and let's return to the term 'privation' that I mentioned earlier. One could also talk about frustration. Why privation rather than frustration? I will point out here that this was left up in the air.

Whatever the case may be, the subject who is here [Child] has also been there [Father] insofar as she has an ego-ideal. Something has 295 thus occurred within her, which is structured as in intersubjectivity. This subject will now deploy a particular desire – what is it?

The father's relations with the mother appear on this schema. Now, it's clear that when we analyse a subject like this what we find in her analysis is not the duplication or the reproduction of what takes place between the father and the mother, for all sorts of reasons – if only because the subject has only attained this point imperfectly. Experience shows, on the contrary, that what comes up is the entire past, the vicissitudes of the extremely complex relations that to this point have modulated the child's relations with its mother from the outset. That is to say the frustrations, the disappointments linked to the mishaps and fits and starts that necessarily exist, with the entire, extraordinarily complicated relationship that the latter entail, and that bring into play, with a very special emphasis, aggressive relations in their most original form, along with relations of rivalry, marked by the impact, for example, of the arrival of elements external to the trio, namely the brothers or sisters who might have come along more or less inconveniently in the subject's evolution and relations with her mother. That all has an impact, and one rediscovers its trace and its reflection tempering or reinforcing what will then appear as a claim upon the insignias of masculinity. That will all be projected into the young subject's relations with her object. These relations will henceforth be determined on the basis of this point of identification in which the subject adopts the insignias of what she has identified with and which, for her, play the role and function of ego-ideal.

Of course, what I am describing for you is a way of imagining the places in question, but this obviously presupposes, if you want to understand it, that one adds to it some sort of coming and going. The subject carries these insignias with her after this to-and-fro movement and finds herself formed in a new way and with a new desire.

296 What does the mechanism of this transformation entail? Three moments are to be distinguished.

First, there is the subject and one other term, one that has a libidinal value for her.

Next, there is a third term with which the subject has a distinct relationship, and this requires that the radically differentiating element – competition – has intervened in past relations with this term.

Finally, an exchange occurs – what was the object of the libidinal relation becomes something else and is transformed into a signifying function for the subject, and the latter's desire passes over onto another plane, the plane of desire established with the third term. In the process, this other desire comes to be substituted for the initial desire, which is repressed and re-emerges fundamentally transformed.

That is what constitutes the process of identification.

There first has to be a libidinal element that picks out a particular object qua object. This object becomes a signifier in the subject, occupying the place that will henceforth be called the ego-ideal. Desire, on the other hand, undergoes a substitution – another desire takes its place. This other desire doesn't come from nothing, it's not nothing. It existed before – it related to the third term – and it emerges transformed.

That's the schema I ask you to keep in mind, because it's the minimal schema for every process of identification in the true sense of the word, identification at the secondary level, insofar as it grounds the ego-ideal. It never lacks any of these three terms. This to-and-fro is the result of the transformation of an object into a signifier that takes place in the subject and forms the identification that we find at the base of what forms an ego-ideal. This is always accompanied, moreover, by what we can call a transference of desire – another desire comes from somewhere else, from the relationship with a third term that had nothing to do with the first libidinal relation, and this desire is substituted for the first one, but, in and through this substitution, it itself turns out to be transformed. This is absolutely essential. Again, we can explain it differently if we return to our schema in the form in which I am currently presenting it.

In her initial relationship with the primordial object – that's the general formula – the child finds herself adopting a position symmetrical to the father's. She becomes his rival and places herself in opposition to him in relation to the primitive relationship with the object, at a point x, marked with the sign φ. There, she becomes something capable of assuming the insignias of the one whose rival she has become, and it's for this reason that she will subsequently rediscover a place, there where she necessarily is, that is to say at 297
'Child' – opposite this point x where the events occurred – and where she comes to constitute herself in this new form that is called I, the ego-ideal, thus retaining something from this passage in the most general form.

No longer is it a matter, here, as you can clearly see, of the father or the mother, it's a matter of relations with the object. The mother is the primitive object, the object par excellence. What the subject retains from the comings-and-goings, which have made her the rival of a third term in relation to the object, is characterized by what can be called the common factor resulting from the existence of signifiers in the human psyche. Inasmuch as men have dealings with the world of signifiers, it's the signifiers that constitute the defile by which desire has to pass. Consequently, this toing-and-froing always implies the factor common to the impact of signifiers upon desire, common to what signifies it and to what necessarily makes it a signified desire – this common factor is precisely the phallus.

The phallus is always there. It's the lowest common denominator of this common factor. And this is why we always find it there in every case, whether it's a man or a woman. This is why we place the phallus, the small φ, here, at this point x.

The phallus is the third party in what is the subject's imaginary relationship with himself, m – i, always formed in a more-or-less fragile manner. This is the ego's primitive identification, which is always more-or-less ideal, with an always more-or-less disputed image. It has nothing to do with the fundamental relationship the subject maintains with that to which he has addressed his demands, that is, his object.

In these comings-and-goings, the ego-ideal, I, is always formed in opposition to the virtual point at which the rivalry, the competition, the contest* with the third term, this 'P' here, occurs and is in opposition to the common metonymic factor, the phallus, which is found everywhere. Of course, what happens at the level of the ego-ideal consists in having this common factor as a minimum. The ideal is composed in a way that prevents it from being seen, or that only lets it be seen as something that is always slipping between your fingers. It still remains there, circulating at the bottom of every kind of acquisition of signifiers.

Note the following – signifiers always eat into the signified. The ego-ideal is formed in the relationship with this third term, which is here, the father, and it always implies the phallus, and does so solely insofar as this phallus is the common, pivotal factor in the instance of the signifier.

Karen Horney has shown us the castration complex's continuity with female homosexuality. What does Helene Deutsch tell us?

She speaks of something else. She, too, tells us that the phallic phase does indeed play the role Freud says it does, except that what matters to her is to follow its subsequent vicissitude, where the girl adopts the masochistic position that is constitutive, she says, of the female position. Inasmuch as clitoral jouissance happens to be forbidden for the little girl, she will find her satisfaction in a position that will, then, no longer be purely passive, but in a position of jouissance that is assured in this very privation of clitoral jouissance that has been imposed on her.

There's a paradox here. But it's a paradox that Helene Deutsch underpins with observations from experience that go so far as to be guidelines for technique. I am reporting the experiential data of a woman analyst, which, without any doubt, are subject to the choice of material that she makes but are nevertheless worth making the effort to consider.

For Helene Deutsch, the question of feminine satisfaction presents itself in a way that is sufficiently complex for her to consider that a woman, in her nature as a woman, is able to find complete satisfaction – complete enough for nothing to appear that presents itself as neurotic or atypical in her behaviour, in her adaptation to her female functions – without, in any clearly marked way, genital satisfaction fully taking place for her.

I repeat, this is Mrs Deutsch's position. For her, satisfaction in the female position can be totally achieved in the maternal relation, in all the stages of the function of reproduction – namely, in the satisfactions specific to the state of pregnancy, breastfeeding and maintaining the maternal position. The maturation of the satisfaction attached to the genital act, orgasm itself, to call it by its name, is something else – it's linked to the dialectic of phallic privation.

In subjects more or less implicated in the phallic dialectic and presenting a certain degree of masculine identification, Helene Deutsch has thus encountered a personality necessarily in conflict, whose equilibrium is therefore precarious and which has been formed on this basis. Reducing this complex relationship too far, pursuing the analysis too far, would be liable to frustrate such a subject of what jouissance she has more or less managed to achieve on the genital plane up to this point. This type of case goes so far as to comprise, according to her, an indication to leave the subject her penis-identifications, which have been more or less successful but 299 are at least established. To decompose, analyse and reduce these identifications would risk placing the subject in a position of loss in comparison with what the treatment reveals to have been the basis of the jouissance she had established before her analysis. What she would acquire on the plane of genital jouissance would be linked to the subject's past as it relates to her identifications. If, effectively, her jouissance consists in the masochistic frustration that the acquired position comprises, by the same token it requires that the position from which this frustration is capable of being exercised be maintained. In other words, under certain conditions, reducing the properly masculine identifications has the capacity to threaten what the subject has achieved at the level of jouissance in the very dialectic of these identifications.

That's worth what it's worth. The issue for us here is simply that that has actually been asserted, and by a female analyst who is not at all lacking in experience and reveals herself to be, surely, if only through her reflections, someone who thinks about her trade and the consequences of what she is doing. It's on this basis – and this basis alone – that that deserves to be kept in consideration.

To summarize Mrs Deutsch's position on interhuman relations – I'm not saying that the genital act presents itself in the same way in robin redbreasts or in praying mantises – in the human species, the centre of gravity of the female's position and its element of major satisfaction is said to be located in what lies outside genital relations as such.

Everything that a woman can find in genital relations is said to be linked to a dialectic whose intervention here should be no surprise to us. What does that mean? It means, first, the extreme importance of what is called preliminary pleasure – which is also quite apparent in the man's position regarding the genital act, although it's perhaps simply more accentuated in the woman. These are the libidinal matters that are to be brought into question. But they are effectively only brought into play when they are captured in the subject's history, in a signifying dialectic that implies the intrusion of possible identification with a third object – the father, in the event. Phallic demands, as an identification with the father complicated by the woman's relationship with her object, are thus said to be only the signifying elaboration of this earlier pleasure from which, it turns out, the satisfactions produced in the genital act have been borrowed. As for the orgasm itself insofar as it's to be identified in the moment of the act, it effectively raises a problem in the woman that deserves to be raised, given what we know physiologically about the absence of an organization of nerves directly designed to produce pleasure in the vagina.

300 This leads us to attempt to formulate the relationship between the ego-ideal and a particular vicissitude of desire in the following manner. As much in the case of the boy as in the case of the girl, at a certain moment there is a relationship with a certain object already formed in its reality as an object, and this object becomes the ego-ideal through its insignias. Why has the desire in question in this relationship with the object been called privation in this case? Because, we are told, it's not typical for it to relate to a real object.

Of course, when the father intervenes in the girl's evolution – this is the first example I gave – it's necessary, effectively, that he be a being real enough in his physiological constitution for the phallus to pass to a stage of evolution that goes beyond the purely imaginary function, which it is capable of retaining for a long time, in Penisneid. This is certain, but what constitutes the privation of desire is not that it's directed at something real, but that it's directed at something that can be demanded. A dialectic of privation can only be instituted, properly speaking, with respect to something that the subject is able to symbolize. It's insofar as the father's penis can be symbolized and demanded that what happens at the level of the identification in question today can occur.

This is completely distinct from what intervenes at the level of the prohibition of phallic jouissance. Clitoral jouissance, to call it by its name, can be prohibited at a given moment in its evolution. What is prohibited rejects the subject, throwing her into a situation in which she can no longer find anything suited to signify herself. This is what gives it its painful character, and inasmuch as the ego finds itself in this position of reject on the part of the ego-ideal, for example, a melancholic state sets in. We shall come back to the nature of this rejection, but you can understand already that what I am alluding to here can be brought into relation with this German term that in our vocabulary I have linked to rejection, namely Verwerfung. It's inasmuch as, on behalf of the ego-ideal, the subject in her living reality can find herself in a position from which every possible signification is excluded that the depressive state as such sets in.

The process in question in the formation of the ego-ideal is completely the opposite. The object finds itself faced with what I called privation, inasmuch as it's a question of a negative desire, of an object that can be demanded, and insofar as it's on the level of demand that the subject sees his desire refused. The link between desire that is refused and the object is there at the start of the constitution of this object as a particular signifier that occupies a particular place, is substituted for the subject and becomes a metaphor of the subject.

This occurs in the identification with the object of desire in the 301 case where the girl identifies with her father. This father whom she has desired and who has refused the desire of her demand takes its place. The formation of the ego-ideal thus has a metaphorical character and, just as with a metaphor, what results is the modification of a desire that has nothing to do with the desire involved in constituting the object, a desire that is elsewhere, the one that had bound the little girl to her mother.

Let's call it small d in contrast to big D. All the little girl's prior experience with her mother occupies a place here in the question and undergoes the consequences of this metaphor to which desire comes to be bound. Here we rediscover the formula for metaphor that I gave you previously. The result is a change of signification in the relations that have been established to that point in the subject's history.

Since we are still at the first example of the little girl with her father, let's say that it's establishing this new function called the ego-ideal within her that modifies her history and will henceforth mould the subject's relations with her object.

THE FORMULAS OF DESIRE

Critique of the early Oedipus complex

$$d \longrightarrow \mathcal{S}(A) \lozenge a \rightleftharpoons i(a) \longleftarrow m$$

$$D \longrightarrow A \lozenge d \rightleftharpoons s(A) \longleftarrow I$$

$$\Delta \longrightarrow \mathcal{S}(A) \lozenge D \rightleftharpoons S(\not{A}) \longleftarrow \Phi$$

I have started by writing these three formulas on the blackboard so as to avoid writing them incorrectly or incompletely when I come to refer to them. I hope to be able to clarify them all before the end of today's discussion.

Picking things up from where I left off last time, I have learned, not without some satisfaction, that some of my propositions managed to provoke some emotion, namely because I seemed to be endorsing the opinions of a certain female psychoanalyst who felt obliged to put forward the view that some analyses of women did not necessarily benefit from being taken right to the end, for the reason that the very progress of the treatment might deprive the said subjects of the point that they had come to in their sexual relations and threaten the level of jouissance they had acquired and achieved. I was subsequently asked whether I endorsed this position and whether analysis should effectively stop at a certain point for reasons external to the laws of its very progress.

My answer to this would be that everything depends on what one considers the aim of analysis to be – not its external aim, but what it's regulated by, as it were, theoretically. There is, effectively, a perspective according to which the very notion of the development of analysis implies the idea of an adjustment to reality. It takes it as a 304 given that in the condition of man and in the condition of woman, a full explication of this condition must necessarily lead the subject to an adaptation that is in some way preformed and harmonious. It's a hypothesis. In actual fact, there's nothing in experience that would warrant it.

The question of a woman's development and her adaptation to a certain polyvalent register in the human order is clearly a sensitive point in analytic theory. To give you some signposts and to use terms that are the very ones that will return today, in a completely concrete sense this time, doesn't it immediately seem quite certain that it's right, concerning a woman, not to confuse what she desires – I give this term its full meaning – with what she demands? Not to confuse what she demands with what she wants either, in the sense in which one says, 'A woman always gets what she wants'?

These simple reminders, which, if not self-evident, then at least arise from our experience, are intended to show that the question one raises concerning what is to be achieved in analysis is no simple one.

What I spoke to you about last week came into the discussion at a tangent. What I wanted to lead you to, and will bring you back to today to create a general formula for it, will function in what follows as a reference point precisely for the critique of normative identifications for men and women.

Last time I gave you an initial glimpse into the identification that produces the ego-ideal, insofar as the latter is the exit point, pivotal point and endpoint of the crisis of the Oedipus complex which analytic experience began with and has not stopped revolving around since, even though it's adopting increasingly centrifugal positions. I insisted on the fact that every identification of the ego-ideal type stemmed from the fact that the subject is placed in a relationship with signifiers in the Other that I called insignias, and on the fact that this relationship grafts itself onto another desire than the desire that had brought the two terms together, the subject and the Other as bearer of these insignias.

That about summarizes it. Of course, it didn't satisfy everybody, even though, speaking to this or that person, that was the only reference I gave. For example, can't you see that it's insofar as a woman identifies with her father that she makes all the accusations against her husband that she had made against her mother? This is pointed out as a prominent feature by Freud, as it is by every 305 author.

There's no question of being fascinated by this example, for we can find the same formula in different forms, but it is a good illustration of what I have just been telling you – the fact that identification occurs when a subject assumes signifiers characteristic of his relations with another includes and implies that the relations of desire between this subject and a third party will rise to the fore. You will discover the subject S, the big A and the little a. Where is the big A, where is the little a? It doesn't matter – what's important is that there be the two of them.

Let's go back to a remark that pertains to the maxim of La Rochefoucauld's concerning the things that cannot be gazed at steadily, the sun and death. There are things in analysis like that. It's quite curious that it's precisely the central point in analysis that one looks at obliquely and, increasingly, from a distance. The castration complex is one of those things.

Notice what's happening and has been happening ever since Freud's initial understanding of it. There was an essential, pivotal point there in the subject's formation – a strange thing, it has to be said, one that had never been advanced or articulated till then. The step Freud takes is to make the subject's formation revolve around a threat that is precise, particularized, paradoxical, archaic and even horror-provoking in the strict sense of the term, and which arises at a decisive moment that is no doubt pathogenic, but also normative. This threat is not there alone and in isolation, but is coherent with the said Oedipal relationship between the subject, the father and the mother – the father here in the role of vehicle of the threat, and the mother being the intended object of a desire that is profoundly hidden.

You rediscover there, at the origin, precisely what needs to be elucidated – this third relationship in which the relationship to certain insignias will be entered into – insignias that are indicated in the castration complex, but in an enigmatic manner, since these insignias themselves have a singular relationship to the subject. They are under threat, we are told, and, by the same token, it's they that need to be gathered and received, and this in a relationship of desire with respect to a third term, which is the mother.

That's what we find at the start, and, having said that, we are faced with an enigma. We, those of us who are practitioners, have to grasp, coordinate and articulate this relationship, complex by definition and in its essence, which we encounter in the life of our subject. We find a thousand forms, a thousand reflections, a 306 dispersion of images and fundamental relationships, all of whose repercussions, effects and multiple psychological facets we have to grasp in the experience of the neurotic subject. And then what happens?

What happens is this phenomenon that I will call the phenomenon of psychologizing motivation. We start by looking for the origin and meaning of the fear of castration in the individual, and this leads us to a series of displacements and transpositions. I will summarize them for you.

First, the fear of castration is related to the father as object, to fear of the father.

Considering the impact of this fear leads us to appreciate its relationship to a tendency or a desire in the subject, that of his bodily integrity. Consequently, we find the notion of narcissistic fear promoted.

Then, still pursuing a line that is necessarily genetic – that is, one that goes back to origins – as soon as we look for the genesis of what subsequently takes place in the individual, we discover the fear of the female organ, there in the foreground and supported by clinical material, which is always there for us to grasp the ways in which a particular effect is embodied. And in an ambiguous manner – either this organ becomes the locus of the threat against the incriminated organ, or on the contrary it's the model for this organ's disappearance.

Finally, even further back, going back even further still, to the first moment – a striking and singular endpoint at which we have gradually arrived, and I won't go through the list of authors again today, but for this first moment, you know that it's Melanie Klein – what is there at the origins of the fear of castration is the phallus itself, hidden in the depths of the maternal organ. Right at the origins, the paternal phallus is perceived by the child as having its seat inside the maternal body, and this is what the subject dreads.

Is it not already quite striking to see the threatening organ appear as a mirror image before the threatened organ, and in a way that I would describe as more and more mythical the more distant its origins? For the final step to be taken, the father's organ inside the mother's vagina must be regarded as threatening, by virtue of the fact that the subject himself, at the roots of what is called his aggressive, sadistic and primordial tendencies, makes it his ideal weapon. At the first moment, everything thus comes down to a sort of pure reflection of the phallic organ considered as the support of a primitive tendency that is one of pure and simple aggression.

The castration complex is here reduced to the isolation of a partial, primordial, aggressive, and henceforth disconnected, drive.

As a result, all the efforts of authors then tend to reintegrate the 307 castration complex into its context as a complex, which is where it began, and where it was the profound motivation for being the central feature of subjective economy in the original exploration of the neuroses. Authors thus go to the greatest lengths to restore it, all the same, to this place, so much so that when we consider these things, what we see emerging is a set of concepts vainly circling one another. This is how it looks if we closely examine the economy of what Melanie Klein describes as taking place at the level of the early Oedipus complex. This expression is nothing but a contradiction in terms – it's like saying 'pre-Oedipal Oedipus complex'. It's the Oedipus complex before any of the characters in the Oedipus complex have emerged. The interpretative signifiers that she uses to name the drives she encounters, or thinks she encounters, in the child, her very own signifiers, imply the entire dialectic that was at issue in the first place.

And so, we have to go back over this dialectic, in its essence, from the start.

Castration is an essential feature, if we consider it in the way it has been promoted by analytic experience and analytic theory, and by Freud, and from the start. Let's now work out if we can see what it means. Prior to being fear, prior to being lived, prior to being psychologizable, what does castration mean?

Castration is not actual castration. It's linked to a desire, as I have said. It's even linked to the evolution, progress and maturation of desire in the human subject.

While it's castration, it's quite clear, furthermore, that it is difficult to centre the link with this organ on the notion of the castration complex. It has often been observed that castration is not directed at the genital organs in their totality, and indeed it's for that reason that in the woman it does not take on the aspect of a threat against the female genital organs as such, but the female genital organs insofar as they are something else – specifically, the phallus. Similarly, it has been possible to legitimately pose the question whether in the man it was necessary to single out the penis as such in the notion of the castration complex, or include in it the penis and the testicles. In truth, these discussions are a good indication that what is at stake is something other than this or that. It's something 308 that has a particular relationship with the organs, but a relationship whose signifying character is not in doubt from the outset. It is its signifying character that is predominant.

Let's just say that, at the very least, a minimum has to be retained to define what the castration complex is in its essence – it's the relationship of a desire to what for the moment I will call a mark.

In order for desire to successfully traverse phases and come to maturity, both Freudian experience and analytic theory teach us that something as problematic to situate as the phallus has to be marked by the fact that it's retained only insofar as it has experienced the threat of castration.

This must be maintained as the essential minimum beyond which we go off into synonyms, shifts in meaning, equivalences and, as a consequence, obscurity. We literally no longer know what we are saying if we do not retain these characteristics as essential. Isn't it better to look, first, in the direction of the relationship as such between these two poles, between desire and the mark, before heading off to look for it in the various ways in which it's embodied for a subject? As soon as we deviate from this starting point, the reason for this link can only become increasingly enigmatic, problematic and, before long, avoided.

I insist upon this feature of the mark. Moreover, outside analysis, in all its other interpretative or meaningful manifestations, and certainly in everything that embodies it ceremoniously, ritually or sociologically, the mark is the sign of what supports this castrating relation whose emergence in anthropology analysis has made it possible for us to appreciate. Let's not forget the religious incarnations in which we recognize the castration complex – circumcision, for example, to call it by its name, or again, in the rites of puberty, this or that form of inscription, marking or tattooing, linked to a particular phase which unambiguously presents itself as the accession to a certain stage of desire. All of that always present itself in the form of a mark and an impression.

You are going to tell me, 'Here we are, then, the mark – not something difficult to come across. Even where there are flocks, each shepherd has his little mark in order to distinguish his ewes from everybody else's.' This is not such a stupid remark, for indeed there is a relationship, even if it's only that the mark presents itself as a kind of transcendence in relation to the formation of a flock. Should that be sufficient for us? It's indeed true that, in a certain way, circumcision presents itself as constituting a particular flock, the flock of God's chosen ones. Are we not merely rediscovering
309 that? Certainly not. What analytic experience, and Freud, brought us at the beginning is that there is a close, even intimate relationship between desire and the mark. The mark is not simply there as a sign of recognition for the shepherd, whom we would have difficulty locating if required. Where man is concerned, the marked living being has a desire which does not fail to have a certain intimate relationship with the mark.

We mustn't go too quickly and say that this mark modifies desire. In this desire, there is perhaps, from the outset, a gap that makes it possible for this mark to have its special effect. What is certain is that there is a close relationship between what is characteristic of desire in man and the effect, role and function of the mark. Once again, we see here signifier and desire together, which is what the entire investigation we are developing here is about.

I would not like to stray too far, but here is one small parenthesis, all the same. Let's not forget that the question quite obviously leads to the function of signifiers in man, and you are not hearing it said here for the first time. If Freud wrote Totem and Taboo, if he had an essential need to do so and derived an essential satisfaction from it – read Jones's text and you will see the importance it had for him – it was not just under the heading of applied psychoanalysis. His satisfaction wasn't in rediscovering the little human animal that he found himself occupied with in his consulting rooms, magnified to the dimensions of the heavens. It was not the celestial dog in relation to the terrestrial dog, as in Spinoza. For him, it was an absolutely essential myth – so essential that, for him, it was not a myth. What is the meaning of Totem and Taboo?

The meaning of it is that, if we want to understand anything about Freud's specific enquiry concerning the experience of the Oedipus complex in his patients, we are necessarily led to the theme of the murder of the father.

This is not something that Freud wonders about. But, I ask you, what can it mean that in order to conceptualize the passage from nature to humanity one has to pass via the murder of the father?

According to his method, which is the method of an observer and a natural scientist, he groups facts together and amasses all the documents that his researches bring him concerning this crossroads. There's no doubt we see, occupying the foreground, the point at which his own experience and the ethnological material meet. It doesn't matter that the latter is more or less outdated. It's not important any more. What counts is the fact that the point at which he ends up, which he was happy with, and where he saw that the signs whose tracks he was following were converging, was the point 310 at which the function of a phobia meets the theme of the totem. And this is indistinguishable from a development that places the function of signifiers in the foreground.

A phobia is a symptom in which the signifier is isolated, and promoted as isolated, in the foreground. I spent last year explaining this to you by showing you how the signifier of a phobia can have thirty-six thousand significations for the subject. The key point is the missing signifier that would make it possible for the significations, at least for a time, to settle down a little. Without it, the subject is literally overwhelmed by them. A totem is the same thing – a signifier of all trades, a key signifier, the one owing to which everything falls into place, and first and foremost the subject, for the subject discovers what he is in this signifier, just as it's in the name of this totem that what is prohibited comes to be organized for him.

But what is this still veiling or hiding from us, in the end? What is being hidden by the father's murder, inasmuch as taking place around him is the revolution whereby the young males of the horde are seeing that what will become the primitive law – that is, the prohibition of incest – is emerging? To put it simply, it hides the close link that exists between death and the emergence of signifiers.

We all know that in the ordinary course of events life scarcely pauses over the corpses it creates. Big fish eat little fish – or even, once they have killed them, don't eat them. The movement of life reduces down to the same level whatever is there for life to abolish, and it's already a problem to know in what way a death is memorized, even if that memorization remains implicit in some ways, that is, even if, as seems to be the case, it's in the nature of this memorization for the fact to be forgotten by the individual, whether it concerns the murder of the father or the murder of Moses. It's in the nature of a mind to forget what remains absolutely necessary as the key or pivotal point around which it revolves. For a death to be memorized, a link needs to have been turned into a signifier in such a way that this death exists in the real in some other way, in life's abundance. There is no existence of death. There are the dead, and that's it. And when they're dead, nobody in life pays attention to them any longer.

In other words, what is it that accounts both for Freud's passion when he writes Totem and Taboo and for the dazzling impact of a book that is very generally rejected and reviled on its publication? And everyone says, 'What's this guy telling us? Where has this come from? What right does he have to be telling us this? We ethnographers have never seen anything like it before.' This doesn't prevent this book from being one of the major events of our century, one 311 that has profoundly transformed the entire inspiration for critical, ethnological, literary and anthropological work.

What does this mean, if not that Freud conjugates two things – desire and the signifier. He conjugates them in the sense in which one says one conjugates a verb. He brings the category of this conjugation into the heart of thinking about man that before him had remained, I should say, academicizing – designating thereby an ancient philosophical affiliation which, from Platonism up to the Stoic and Epicureans sects, and passing via Christianity, has had the profound tendency to forget the organic relationship between desire and signifiers, to exclude desire from signifiers, to reduce it, to account for it in a particular economy of pleasure, to include what is absolutely problematic, irreducible and, strictly speaking, perverse within it, and to avoid what is the essential, living characteristic of the manifestations of human desire, at the forefront of which we must place not only its unadapted and unadaptable, but its fundamentally marked and perverted, character.

It's the state of this link between desire and mark, desire and insignia, and desire and signifier that we are trying to work out here.

Let's now turn to the three little formulas I have written out for you.

Today, I merely want to introduce them and tell you what they mean, because we will not be able to progress any further than that. To my mind, these formulas are the ones that make it possible for us to articulate not only something of the problem that I have just put to you, but even all the meanderings, or even wanderings, of analytic thought concerning what still remains our fundamental problem, which is, let's not forget, the problem of desire.

Let's start by clarifying what is meant by the letters that are up there. The little d is desire. The $ is the subject. The little a is the little other, the other insofar as he is our semblable, insofar as his image grabs, captivates and supports us, and insofar as we constitute around him this first order of identifications which I have defined for you as narcissistic identification, which is the small e, the ego.

The first line places these letters in a certain relationship to one another where the arrows indicate that it cannot go from one side to the other, no matter which side it starts from, but that it stops at 312 the point where one directional arrow meets another with the opposite sign. The egoic or narcissistic identification finds itself here in a particular relation with the function of desire. I will come back to this commentary.

The second line is about what I constructed my entire discourse around at the start of the year when I was trying to get you to see in jokes a certain fundamental relationship that desire has, not with signifiers as such, but with speech – namely, with demand. The D written here stands for demand. The big A that comes next is the big Other, the locus, seat or witness that the subject makes reference to as the locus of speech, in his relationship with any kind of little a. There is no need here to remind you how much, over a long period of time, and by coming back to it incessantly, I have declared that the big Other as the locus of speech, articulated as such, is necessary. The little d is found here, and also, for the first time, the little s, with the same signification that it normally has in our formulas, namely that of the signified. The little s of big A designates what in the Other is signified, and signified with the help of signifiers – that is, what in the Other, for me as a subject, takes on the value of a signified – that is, what earlier I was calling insignias. It's in relation to these insignias of the Other that the identification occurs whose product and outcome is the constitution of the big I, which is the ego-ideal, in the subject. The mere constitution of these formulas presents you with the fact that access to the identification of the ego-ideal is only possible once the term 'the big Other' is taken into account.

As with the previous lines, the third is trying to articulate a problem in a reference chain [chaîne-repère]. This is the problem that I am formulating here with you today.

The delta is precisely what we are enquiring about, namely the very mainspring by which the human subject is placed in a certain relationship with the signifier, the human subject in his essence as a subject, as total subject, as subject in his completely open, problematic and enigmatic character – and which this symbol expresses.

Here we see the subject returning again, this time in relation to the fact that his desire goes through a demand, that he speaks it and that this has a number of effects. Next, you have the big S which is, as usual, the letter I use to designate the signifier. The formula explains that the big S of barred Ⱥ is precisely what Φ, the phallus, produces. In other words, the phallus is the signifier that introduces something new into Ⱥ, introduces it only into Ⱥ, and at the level of Ⱥ – owing to which this formula will be illuminated by the effects of signifiers.
313 This precise point of impact on the Other is what this formula will enable us to clarify.

Let's now return to the matter at hand.

Man's relationship to desire is not a pure and simple relationship of desire. In itself, it isn't a relationship with an object. If the relationship with an object were already established, there would be no problem for analysis. Men would, as we can assume for the majority of animals, go to their object. Man would not have this second relationship, as it were, to the fact that he is a desiring animal, which conditions everything that happens at the level we call perverse – namely, that he enjoys his desire. The entire evolution of desire has its origins in these lived facts that are classed in, let's say, the masochistic relation, because this is the one we are told to consider first in the genetic order, although one comes to it by a kind of regression. The one that suggests itself as the most exemplary and the most pivotal is either the so-called sadistic relationship or the scopophilic relationship.

It's quite clear that it's through a reduction, the manipulation or second-order artificial decomposition of what is given in experience that we isolate them in the form of drives that are interchangeable and equivalent to one another. The scopophilic relationship, insofar as it conjugates exhibition and voyeurism, is always ambiguous – the subject sees himself being seen, one sees the subject as seen, but, of course, one does not just see him, but sees him in his jouissance, in that species of irradiation or phosphorescence that emerges by virtue of the fact that the subject finds himself in a position that comes from some sort of primitive gap, in some way extracted from his relationship of involvement with an object, and from there he fundamentally grasps himself as the patient in that relation. The fact that what we find at the core of the analytic exploration of desire is masochism stems from there – the subject grasps himself as suffering, and he grasps his existence as a living being as one of suffering, that is, as being a subject of desire.

Where is the problem now? Human desire will always remain irreducible to any form of reduction and adaptation. No analytic experience goes against this. The subject does not simply satisfy a desire, he derives enjoyment from desiring, and this is an essential dimension of his enjoyment. It's completely erroneous to omit this primitive datum which, I have to say, the so-called existentialist investigation has illuminated and cast in a certain light. If what I am saying here for you, as best I can, is to mean anything, it requires you to refer to our daily experience, but that is elaborated over the course of pages that are masterful in a variety of ways by Mister Sartre in Being and Nothingness. It isn't always absolutely rigorous 314 philosophically, but it's certainly the work of an undisputed literary talent. What is striking is that it has only been possible for things of this order to be articulated so brilliantly since analysis gave the dimension of desire freedom of the city.

Mister Jones, whose usefulness to and function in analysis are in direct proportion to what he didn't understand, very quickly tried to expound the castration complex by finding an equivalent for it. To be frank, the phallic signifier was the object of what one could perhaps call a veritable phobia throughout his entire existence as a writer and analyst. The best of his writing, which culminates in his article on the phallic phase, consists precisely in saying this – why privilege this damned phallus that we find here under our feet at every moment, this inconsistent object, moreover, whereas other things are just as interesting? The vagina, for example. And, effectively, the man is right. It's quite clear that this object is no less interesting than the phallus. We know this. It's just that what astonishes him is that they don't have the same function. He was, strictly speaking, condemned to understand nothing, insofar as, from the outset, from his first sentence, as soon as he tried to spell out what the castration complex is in Freud, he felt the need to produce an equivalent for it, instead of clinging to what there is in the Oedipus complex that might be tough, even irreducible, namely the phallus signifier.

Jones didn't lack an orientation. Perhaps he had only one failing, which was to think that God created them man and woman. This is the sentence with which he ends his article, 'The Phallic Phase', thereby clearly showing the biblical origins of his conviction. Since God created them man and woman, they are therefore well made to go together, and that is where it has to culminate, and if not, we need to say why.

Now, precisely, in analysis we appreciate that when one is asked to say why, one gets into all sorts of complications. This is why, from the start, he substituted the term 'aphanisis' for the castration complex, which is a word he went looking for in a Greek dictionary, and which, it has to be said, is not one of the words most commonly used by authors. It means disappearance. Disappearance of what? Disappearance of desire. It's what the subject is afraid of in the castration complex, according to Mister Jones. With his jaunty little step of a Shakespearean character, he seems to be unaware that it was already an enormous problem that a living being might feel threatened, as if by some danger, by the disappearance, lack or withdrawal, not of his object, but of his desire. There is no other 315 way of making aphanisis equivalent to the castration complex than by defining it as he does, namely as the disappearance of desire. Isn't there something there that completely lacks foundation? That there is already something there that stands at a second or third degree in relation to a relation described in terms of need is not in doubt. However, he does not give the slightest impression of being aware of this.

That said, even if we allow that all the complications suggested by merely posing the problem in these terms have already been resolved, the subject's relationship to the Other remains to be structured, insofar as it's in the Other, in the gaze of the Other, that he apprehends his own position. It's not for nothing that I am singling out the scopophilic position – it's because it's effectively at the core, not only of this position, but also of the Other's attitude, insofar as, although the sadistic position can be described as sadistic in the strict sense, there is no sadistic position that is not accompanied by a degree of masochistic identification. The human subject is, thus, in a detached relationship to his own being, which places him in a position with respect to the Other such that, in both what he grasps and what he enjoys, we are dealing with something other than a relation to the object, we are dealing with a relation to his desire. What we now need to know is this – what does the phallus as such do there? That's where the problem is.

To solve it, let's refrain from trying to engender or imagine the term in question through a genetic reconstitution founded on what I would call the fundamental references of modern obscurantism. I am thinking of formulas that, in my opinion, are so much more stupid than what you find in the little books of catechism, of which an example is: ontogenesis recapitulates phylogenesis. When our great-grandchildren come to know that in our day this was sufficient to explain a heap of things, they will say to themselves that man really is a weird thing – moreover, without realizing what they will have in its place in their time.

It is, then, a question of knowing what the phallus is doing there. For today, let's set out what the existence of the third line comprises, namely that the phallus plays the role of a signifier. What does that mean?

To clarify, let's start with the second line, which means that man has a certain relationship with the little other which is structured like what I have just called human desire, in the sense in which this desire is already fundamentally perverse, and that as a consequence all his demands are marked by a particular relationship, represented by this new little lozenge symbol that we keep coming across in these formulas. It simply implies – this is its entire meaning – that 316 everything here is controlled by this quadratic relationship that from the outset we have always placed at the foundation of our way of articulating the problem, and which says that there is no conceivable – nor articulable, nor possible – $\mathcal{S}$ that is not sustained by the ternary relationship A-a'-a. That's all the lozenge means. In order for demand to exist, to have a chance, or to be something, there needs to be a certain relationship between s(A) and desire as it's structured, A $\lozenge$ d. This refers us back to the first line.

There is, effectively, an organization to these lines. The first indicates that narcissistic identification, namely what constitutes the subject's ego, takes place in a certain relationship all of whose variations, differences and nuances we have seen over the course of time – prestige, presence, domination – in a certain relationship with the image of the other. You find what corresponds to the ego, its correlate, in what lies on the other side of the point of revolution of this table, namely the double line of equivalence there in the middle. The very possibility of the existence of an ego is thus brought into relationship with the subject's fundamentally desiring nature, tied to the avatars of desire, which is expressed here in the first part of the first line.

Similarly, what does all identification with the insignias of the Other, that is, of the third party as such, depend on? On demand. On demand and on the Other's relations with desire.

This is quite clear and quite apparent, and it enables the term by which Freud designates what we quite incorrectly call – I will say why – frustration to be given its full value. Freud says Versagung. We know from experience that it's insofar as something is versagen that the phenomenon of secondary identification, or identification with the insignias of the Other, is produced in the subject.

What does that imply? That in order for anything to be able to be established for the subject between the big Other as the locus of speech and the phenomenon of his desire – which is located on a completely heterogeneous plane, since it has a relation to the little other as his image – in order to explain human desire as perverse desire, it's necessary that something introduce, into the Other, this same relationship with the little other that is required, necessary and phenomenologically tangible. It's the need for this problem to be spelled out that I am proposing today.

This may seem obscure to you. I will only tell you one thing – it's this. To say that not only does this become increasingly obscure, but that it's also all a muddle, is to say nothing at all. It's possible, on the other hand, that in saying this we will manage to contribute a little bit of order.

317 I propose that Φ, the phallus, is this signifier by which the relationship to a, the little other, is introduced into A as the locus of speech, and insofar as the signifier plays a part.

There you are. This looks like it's biting its own tail – but it has to bite its own tail. It's clear that the signifier plays a part, since we encounter this signifier every step of the way. We have encountered it from the outset, since man would not enter into culture – or rather into society if we distinguish between culture and society, but it's the same thing – if the relationship to the signifier were not there at the origin.

Just as we have defined the paternal signifier as the signifier which establishes and authorizes the play of signifiers in the locus of the Other, there is another privileged signifier which has the effect of instituting in the Other the following, thereby changing its nature – and this is why on the third line the symbol for the Other is barred – namely, that it isn't purely and simply the locus of speech, but that it is, like the subject, implicated in the dialectic located on the phenomenal plane of reflection with respect to the little other. What this adds is that this relationship exists inasmuch as the signifier inscribes it.

I ask you to keep this in mind, no matter how difficult it might be for you. You will stop there for today. I will show you what this makes possible to illustrate and formulate another time.

Today I would like to bring you back to one primitive understanding of the object of our experience, that is, the unconscious.

My aim, in short, is to show you the pathways and possibilities that the discovery of the unconscious opens up for us, without having you forget the limits it places on our powers. It is, in other words, about my showing you from what perspective, from what approach we get an insight into the possibility of normativization – therapeutic normativization – when the entire analytic experience is there to remind you that it nevertheless runs up against the antinomies internal to all normativization in the human condition.

Analysis even makes it possible for us to go into the nature of these limits in depth.

One cannot but be struck by the fact that, in one of his last articles – the one whose title has been incorrectly translated as 'Analysis Terminable and Interminable', whereas in fact it's about the finite or the infinite, and where the question is whether an analysis comes to an end or must be situated in a kind of infinite range – Freud points out the projection to infinity of the aim of analysis in the clearest way possible, at the level of concrete experience, as he says, emphasizing what for man is irreducible in the castration complex, for woman in Penisneid, that is, in a particular fundamental relationship to the phallus.

What was it that the Freudian discovery emphasized at the outset? It emphasized desire. What Freud essentially discovers, 320 what he apprehends in every kind of symptom, whether they are pathological symptoms or whether they are what he interprets in what till then had presented itself as more or less reducible to normal life – namely, dreams for example – is always a desire.

Moreover, in dreams, he doesn't just talk about desire but about the fulfilment of desire, Wunscherfüllung. We should not fail to be struck by this fact – namely, that he speaks about the satisfaction of desire, precisely, in dreams. He also indicates that, in symptoms themselves, there is something that resembles this satisfaction, but it's satisfaction whose problematic character is quite marked, since it's also satisfaction turned upside down.

It already seems, then, that desire is linked to something that is its appearance and, to use this word, its mask. In the way desire presents itself to us in analytic experience, the close link that it maintains with what cloaks it, problematically, invites us to reflect upon this as an essential problem.

Several times recently, I have emphasized the way desire, insofar as it appears in consciousness, manifests itself in a paradoxical form in analytic experience – or, more precisely, how much the latter has promoted this characteristic inherent in desire qua perverse desire, which is a second-order desire, an enjoyment of desire qua desire.

Speaking generally, it's not analysis that discovered the function of desire, but it has made it possible for us to see just how far down goes the fact that human desire is not directly implicated in a pure and simple relationship with the object that satisfies it, but that it's just as much linked to the position that the subject adopts in the presence of this object as it is to the position he adopts outside his relations with the object, in such a way that nothing in his relations with an object is ever completely exhausted.

Moreover, analysis is well placed to remind us of the fact, which has always been known, that desire is restless, fleeting and elusive in nature. It evades synthesis by the ego and leaves it no other way out than that of being nothing but an illusory affirmation of synthesis. While it's always me who desires, this can only be grasped in me in the diversity of these desires.

Behind this phenomenological diversity, behind the contradiction, the anomaly and the aporia of desire, it's certain, moreover, that there exists a deeper relationship, which is the subject's relationship to life and, as one says, to the instincts. By taking this 321 approach, analysis helps us make progress on the subject's situation in relation to his position as a living being. But analysis makes us experience the intermediaries through which the aims or ends, not only of life, but perhaps also of what lies beyond life, are realized. What Freud envisaged, effectively, was some sort of teleology of first vital ends, of ultimate ends that life supposedly aims at lying beyond the pleasure principle – and this is a return to the equilibrium of death. Analysis enabled us, I won't say to define all that, but to catch a glimpse of it, insofar as it has also made it possible for us to follow the course of the fulfilment of desires.

There have always been glimpses of human desire in its internal relations with the Other's desire. One doesn't need to refer to the first chapter of Hegel's Phenomenology of Mind to encounter the paths that a reasonably in-depth reflection would enable this research to take. This is in no way to detract from the originality of the new phenomenon that Freud contributes, and which makes it possible for us to throw such essential light on the nature of desire.

The approach that Hegel takes in his first study of desire is far from being, as one thinks from the outside, a uniquely deductive approach. It's a matter of capturing desire through the intermediary of the relations of self-consciousness with the constitution of self-consciousness in the other. The question that this raises, then, is how the dialectic of life itself can be introduced via this intermediary. This can only be translated in Hegel through what, when the occasion arises, he calls a synthesis. Freudian experience shows us quite a different pathway, even though, very curiously and also very remarkably, desire appears there just as profoundly tied to the relationship with the other as such, even though it appears as unconscious desire.

Now let's go back and place ourselves at the level of what this approach to unconscious desire was in the experience of Freud himself, in his experience as a human being. We have to imagine the first moments at which Freud encountered this experience with its quality of surprising novelty, appealing, I won't say to intuition, but rather to divination, since it was about comprehending something beyond a mask.

Now that psychoanalysis is established and has developed into a discourse that is so broad and shifting, we can imagine – but we 322 imagine this fairly poorly – what the significance was of what Freud introduced when he started reading his patients' symptoms and his own dreams and started bringing us the notion of unconscious desire. Indeed, that is what is missing for us to evaluate the true value of his interpretations. We are always quite astonished by what very often appears as their extraordinarily interventionist nature compared to what we allow ourselves to do, and, I would say, compared to what we may and may no longer allow ourselves to do.

One may even add that to some extent his interpretations strike us as wide of the mark. Have I not pointed out to you a thousand times, concerning the case of Dora for example, or his interventions in the analysis of the young homosexual woman whom we have discussed at length here, to what extent Freud's interpretations – and he recognizes this himself – were connected with his incomplete knowledge of psychology, in particular that of homosexuals in general, but also of hysterics? The inadequate knowledge that Freud possessed at that time means that, in more than one case, his interpretations look too directive in nature, almost forced and precipitate all at once, which effectively gives full value to the term 'an interpretation wide of the mark'.

Still, it's certainly true that these interpretations, at that moment, and up to a point, looked like they had to be made and looked like efficacious interpretations for resolving a symptom. What does that mean?

Obviously, this raises a problem. To begin to solve it, we have to mention that when Freud gave interpretations of this nature, he found himself faced with quite a different situation from the present one. Effectively, everything that in a verdict-interpretation emerges from the mouth of an analyst, insofar as there is interpretation in the strict sense – this verdict, what is stated, proposed and given as true literally gets its value from what is left unsaid. The question, therefore, is what is the background of the unsaid against which an interpretation is being given.

At the time when Freud was giving Dora his interpretations, he was telling her, for example, that she was in love with Herr K. and he would indicate to her, in no uncertain terms, that normally she should be redoing her life with him. This comes as a surprise for us, and all the more so because we know that this was out of the question for the best of reasons, and ultimately Dora wants to have nothing to do with it. Nevertheless, an interpretation of this order, when Freud made it, appeared against a background that carried no presumption for the patient that her interlocutor was there to rectify her understanding of the world or bring her object relation to maturity. For a subject to expect such things from the mouth 323 of an analyst, there has to be an entire cultural atmosphere and none of this had been formed as yet. In actual fact, Dora does not know what to expect, she is taken by the hand, and Freud tells her, 'Speak', and there is nothing else on the horizon of an experience conducted in this way – unless implicitly, for, merely by virtue of the fact that she is told to speak, something of the order of truth has to come into play.

This situation is far from being like ours. Today, the subject comes to analysis already with the idea that the maturation of the personality, the instincts and the object relation is a reality that is already organized and normativized, and the analyst stands as the measure of this. The analyst seems to be like the possessor of the pathways into and the secrets about what initially presents itself as a network of relations, and, while not all are known to the subject, at least their general outline is available to him – at least in the notion that there are these grand lines. He has the idea that pauses in his development are conceivable, that progress is an achievement. In short, there is an entire background concerning the normativization of his person, his instincts and so on – add whatever you like to the list. This all implies that when an analyst intervenes he intervenes from a position, it's said, of judgement, of ratification – there is an even more precise word that I will point you to later – which gives his interpretation a completely different weight.

To get a good grasp of what is in question when I speak to you of unconscious desire in the Freudian discovery, one has to return to these times of freshness in which nothing was implied in the analyst's interpretation, except for immediately detecting, behind something that paradoxically presented itself as completely closed, an x that lies beyond.

Each and every one of you here goes crazy over the term 'meaning'. I don't think that this term is anything but a weakening of what was originally involved, whereas the term 'desire', in what it binds and gathers together as identical with the subject, gives what was encountered in the initial understanding of the analytic experience its impact. That's what we should return to if we wish to bring together both where we are now and what is essentially signified not only by our experience but by its possibilities – I mean, by what makes it possible.

This is also what has to keep us from sliding down the slope and giving into the tendency, I would almost say the trap, in which we are ourselves implicated along with the patient that we introduce into the experience – this would be to lead him down a path that would rest upon a number of circular arguments, I mean upon the 324 idea that an ultimate solution can be given to his condition that would in the end allow him to become, let's use the word, identical to some object or other.

Let's return, then, to the problematic character of desire such as it presents itself in analytic experience, that is, in every type of symptom.

Here, what I am calling a symptom in the most general sense is a morbid symptom as well as a dream and anything that's analysable. What I am calling a symptom is anything that is analysable.

A symptom appears behind a mask, appears in a paradoxical form.

The pain of one of the first hysterics that Freud analyses, Elisabeth von R., initially appears to present itself in a way that is completely closed off. Freud, little by little, with patience that can truly be said here to be inspired by some kind of instinct of a sleuth, relates it to the patient's lengthy presence at the side of her ill father and to the impact, while she was caring for him, of something else that at first he glimpses as if through a fog – namely, the desire that bound her at that time to one of her childhood friends whom she had hoped to make her spouse. Something else presents itself subsequently, also in an incompletely unveiled form, namely her relations with the spouses of her two sisters. The analysis makes us dimly aware that, in various forms, they represented something of importance for her – she detested one of them for some kind of indignity, vulgarity or masculine loutishness, the other on the other hand she seems to have found infinitely seductive. It effectively seems that her symptom precipitated around a number of encounters, and around a sort of oblique meditation concerning the otherwise very good relations between this brother-in-law and one of her sisters. I am going back over these details so as to focus the mind by way of examples.

It's clear that there we are at a primitive period of analytic experience. That Freud should purely and simply say to the patient, as he did not fail to do, that she was in love with her brother-in-law and that her symptoms, namely the pain in her leg, crystallized around this suppressed desire. We now feel and we know, after all the experiences we have had since, that, for a hysteric, this is forcing things – like telling Dora that she was in love with Herr K.

When we come across an observation like this, we experience first 325 hand the above view that I am putting to you. You don't need to turn the observation upside down to do it, for – while Freud doesn't formulate it like this, diagnose it or discern it – he provides all its elements in the clearest of manners. Up to a point, beyond the words that he puts into his paragraphs, the very composition of his observation allows it to appear in a way that is infinitely more convincing than anything he says.

What does he highlight concerning Elisabeth von R.'s experience? Precisely the fact that, in his words and in his experience, in many cases the appearance of hysterical symptoms is bound up with the experience, in itself so difficult, of being entirely devoted to the care of a sick person and playing the role of nurse – and even more so, when one considers the impact that this function has when it's taken on by the subject with respect to someone close. Then, all the ties of affection, even passion, attach the carer to the cared for. The subject thus finds herself in the position of having to satisfy, more so than on any other occasion, what can be emphatically described as a demand. The subject's entire submission, indeed abnegation, in relation to demand is really given by Freud as one of the essential conditions of the situation, insofar as it turns out to be hysterogenic here in this case.

This is made all the more important by the fact that for this hysteric, in contrast with others that he also gives as examples, both the personal and family history is extraordinarily vague and underemphasized, and that, as a consequence, the term 'hysterogenic situation' here becomes highly significant. Freud, moreover, indicates as much.

In the middle formula of my three formulas, I thus isolate, here, the function of demand. Correlatively, as a function of this background position, I would say that essentially the question is about the interest that the subject takes in a situation of desire.

Freud makes only one mistake here, if I may say so, and it's that he is somewhat led along by the requirements of language, orientates the subject prematurely and implicates her in this situation of desire in an overly defined way.

There is a situation of desire and the subject takes an interest in it. But now that we know what an hysteric is, we cannot even add 'whatever side she takes'. This would effectively already imply that she takes one side or another – that she is interested in her brother-in-law from the perspective of her sister or in her sister from the 326 perspective of her brother-in-law. An hysteric's identification is perfectly capable of subsisting, in a correlative manner, in several directions. Here it's twofold. Let's say that the subject is interested, that she is implicated, in the situation of desire and that that's essentially what is represented by a symptom – and this reintroduces the notion of a mask.

The notion of a mask means that desire presents itself in an ambiguous form that does not make it possible for us to orientate the subject in relation to this or that object in the situation. The subject is interested in the situation as such, that is to say, in the relations of desire. This is exactly what is expressed by the symptom that appears, and it's what I call the element of a mask in a symptom.

This is the respect in which Freud can say to us that symptoms speak in the session. The 'it speaks' that I am always talking to you about is there from the first of Freud's formulations, expressed in the text. He will later say that the stomach noises of his patients, when they come to be audible in a session, have the signification of words. But here, what he is telling us is that the pains that reappear, worsen and become more or less intolerable during the session itself are part of the subject's discourse, and that he measures the extent of the heartburn, the impact and the revelatory value of what the subject is avowing and releasing into the session by the tone and modulation of his speech. The trace, the centripetal direction of this trace, the progress of the analysis, is measured by Freud by the very intensity of the modulation by which the subject registers a greater or lesser intensification of his symptom during the session.

I took this example – I could just as well take others, I could just as well take the example of a dream – in order to centre on the problem of symptoms and unconscious desire. The question is that of the link with desire, which remains a question mark, an x, an enigma, which the symptom cloaks itself in – the link, that is, with the mask.

We are told that, insofar as a symptom is unconscious, it is, in short, and to a certain extent, something that speaks and of which one can say with Freud – with Freud from the outset – that it's articulated. A symptom, therefore, goes in the direction of the recognition of desire. But what was the nature of this symptom that is the desire to be recognized, before Freud turned up and, following him, his whole crowd of disciples, the analysts? This recognition has a tendency to surface, to find its own way, but it only manifests itself through the creation of what I have been calling a mask, which is something closed. This recognition of desire is recognition by nobody, it doesn't target anybody, since nobody was able to read it till someone began to discover the key.

This recognition is presented in a form that is closed off to the 327 other. Recognition of desire, then, but recognition by nobody.

On the other hand, insofar as desire is a desire for recognition, this is something other than a desire. Moreover, we are told as much – this desire is a repressed desire. It's for this reason that our intervention adds something more to a simple reading. It's a desire that the subject excludes insofar as he wants it to be recognized. As a desire for recognition, it's perhaps a desire, but, at the end of the day, it's a desire for nothing. It's a desire that is not there, a rejected, excluded desire.

This twofold characteristic of unconscious desire, which, by identifying it with its mask, turns it into something different from anything that can be directed towards an object – we must never forget this.

That's what enables us literally to read the analytic meaning of what is presented as one of the most essential of Freud's discoveries, namely, the debasement, the Erniedrigung, of love life, which stems from the depths of the Oedipus complex.

Freud presents the mother's desire as being at the bottom of this debasement for certain subjects, who, we are specifically told, have not abandoned their incestuous object – well, they have not abandoned it sufficiently, for, ultimately, we learn that no subject ever abandons it completely. There must, of course, be something that corresponds to this greater or lesser abandonment, and we diagnose – fixation on the mother.

These are cases in which Freud presents to us the dissociation of love and desire.

These subjects are incapable of contemplating being with a woman who for them has the full status of being lovable and human, of being in the sense of complete, of a being who, as the saying goes, is able to give and give herself. There is an object there, we are told, which of course means that it's there under a mask, for it isn't the mother that the subject addresses, but the woman who succeeds her and takes her place. Here, then, there is no desire. On the other hand, Freud tells us, these subjects get their pleasure from prostitutes.

What is the meaning of this? As we are at the moment of an initial exploration of the obscurity surrounding the mysteries of desire, I will say – it's inasmuch as the prostitute is the complete opposite of the mother.

328 Is this entirely sufficient? Is she the complete opposite of the mother? We have made enough progress since then in learning about images and fantasies of the unconscious to know that what the subject seeks in prostitutes is, as it happens, nothing other than what ancient Rome openly displayed, sculptured and represented at the entrance to brothels – namely, the phallus – the phallus insofar as it's what inhabits the prostitute.

What the subject seeks in a prostitute is the phallus of all the other men; it's the phallus as such, the anonymous phallus. There is something problematic here, in an enigmatic form behind the mask, which binds desire to a privileged object whose importance we have only too well come to appreciate by following the phallic phase and the defiles through which subjective experience has to pass in order for the subject to be able to reconnect with his natural desire.

What we are here calling the mother's desire is a symbolic label or designation of what we observe in the facts, namely, the correlative and fractured promotion of the object of desire into two irreconcilable halves. On the one hand, what on our own interpretation can be put forward as being the substitute object, the woman insofar as she is the heir to the mother's function, and insofar as she is dispossessed and deprived of the element of desire. On the other hand, this element of desire itself, which is tied to something extraordinarily problematic and, also, presents itself with the characteristic of a mask and a mark – with the characteristic, let's use the word, of a signifier. Everything happens as if, as soon as it's a question of an unconscious desire, we find ourselves in the presence of a mechanism, a necessary Spaltung which makes desire – which for a long time we have presumed alienated in a quite special relationship with the other – appear here as marked, not only by the need for an intermediary in the other as such, but also by the mark of a special signifier, a chosen signifier, which here happens to be the obligatory path which, as it were, the course of the vital force, desire in this case, must follow.

The problematic feature of this particular signifier, the phallus, is the question. That's where what we are considering is located. What raises all the difficulties for us is there. How are we to think about the fact that we have encountered this obstacle along the path to so-called genital maturation? Besides, it's not simply an obstacle, it's an essential defile which makes it the case that it's only through the intermediary of a certain position adopted in relation to the phallus – for the woman, as lack, for the man, as threatened – that what presents itself as what will be, let's say, the best outcome necessarily comes about.

We see here that by intervening, interpreting and naming something, we are always doing more, whatever we do, than we think. 329
The precise word that I wanted to give you on this point earlier is the verb 'to ratify'. We identify the same with the same, and we say, 'That's it.' We substitute someone for this 'nobody' to whom the symptom is addressed inasmuch as it is there on the path to the recognition of desire. We thus always misrecognize, to some extent, the desire that wants to be recognized, inasmuch as we assign an object to it, whereas it's not about an object – desire is desire for this lack which, in the Other, designates another desire.

That will now introduce us to the second of these three formulas that I am proposing to you here, namely the chapter of demand.

In the way I am tackling things and returning to them, I am trying to spell out for you the originality of this desire which is in question at every moment of an analysis by leaving aside the monitoring we can bring to it in the name of a more or less theoretical idea about an individual's maturation.

I think you must be starting to understand that when I speak of the function of speech, or the instance of the letter in the unconscious, it's clearly not in order to eliminate what is irreducible and unformulatable in desire – not the preverbal, but what lies beyond words.

I say this with respect to a comment that, in the event, was recently made by some very ill-advised person about the fact that certain psychoanalysts – as if there are all that many – gave too much importance to language with respect to this famous 'unformulated' that some philosophers, I do not know why, have made their personal property. This person whom I describe as ill-advised, as it happens, which is the least of what I think, declared that the unformulated is not unformulatable. I would answer them in the following way, which one would do better to pay attention to rather than strive to implicate each and every one in his personal squabbles, for it's a remark that philosophers don't yet seem to be aware of. The perspective is the opposite – the fact that desire is not articulable is no reason for its not being articulated.

What I mean is that in itself desire is articulated, insofar as it's 330 tied to the presence of signifiers in man. Still, this does not mean that it's articulable. Precisely because it essentially involves a link with signifiers, it's never fully articulable in any given case.

Let's now return to this second chapter, which is that of demand, where we are in the articulated articulable, in the actually articulated.

For the moment we are concerned with the link between desire and demand. We won't get to the end of this discussion today, but I will devote the next time to these two terms, desire and demand, and to the paradoxes in desire as masked desire that I designated just before.

Desire is articulated in demand necessarily, because we are only able to approach it through some demand or other. As soon as the patient contacts us and comes to see us, it's to demand something, and we are already getting very involved and being very specific about the situation simply by saying to him, 'I'm listening'. It's appropriate, therefore, to start again on what one might call the premises of demand, on what produces a demand about demand, on what constitutes the situation for a demand and on the way in which demand takes effect inside an individual's life.

What institutes a demand? I am not going to redo the 'Fort-Da' dialectic for you. Demand is linked above all to something that is there in the very premises of language, namely the existence of an appeal, which is both the basis of presence and the term that makes it possible to reject it, a game of presence and absence. The object called for by the first words is already no longer an object pure and simple, but a symbol-object – it becomes what the desire for presence makes of it. The initial dialectic is not that of the part object, breast-mother, nourishment-mother or total mother-object as in some kind of Gestaltist approach, as if it were a question of an ever-expanding acquisition. The baby at the breast is well aware that the breast extends to the armpit, neck and hair. The object in question is the symbolic parenthesis of presence, inside of which is the sum of all the objects it can bring. This symbolic parenthesis is already more precious than any good. None of the goods it contains are capable by themselves of satisfying the appeal for presence. As I have already observed several times, none of these goods in particular can be used for anything other than crushing this appeal at its source. The child feeds, perhaps begins to sleep, and at this moment, obviously, there is no longer any question of an appeal. Any relationship with any part-object, as we say, within the maternal presence, is not 331 satisfaction as such, but a substitute, the crushing of desire.

The causal role of the object's symbolization, this object appealed to as object, as the object in its presence, is already marked by the fact – we, too, have read this, but, as always, we don't know how to extract all the consequences from what we read – that an aspect of the mask appears in the object.

What does our good friend, Mister Spitz, contribute, if not that? What is initially recognized by the baby at the breast is the headpiece [frontal grec], framework or mask, with a characteristic of the beyond that characterizes this presence as symbolized. His researches effectively go beyond this presence insofar as it's masked, symptomatized and symbolized. With no ambiguity in his behaviour, the child shows us that he possesses the general outline of this beyond.

In another connection, I have already spoken of the very unusual character of the child's reaction to the mask. You put on a mask, you take it off and the child beams – but if, from under this mask, another mask appears, then he no longer laughs and even becomes quite anxious.

There is not even any need to undertake these tiny little exercises. One has to have never observed a child over the course of his development in his first months to be unaware that even before speech, the first true communication – that is, communication with what is beyond what you are for him as a symbolized presence – is laughter. Before talking, the child laughs. The physiological mechanism of laughter is always linked to smiling, relaxation and a level of satisfaction. People have spoken about the outline of a smile on a sated child, but the child laughing at you laughs at you present and awake and in relation not only to the satisfaction of desire but, after and beyond, to what lies beyond presence insofar as it is able to satisfy him and possibly match his desire. The familiar presence, the presence he is accustomed to, which he knows is capable of satisfying his desires in their diversity, is appealed to, apprehended and recognized in this so special code that in the preverbal child is his first laughter in the presences that care for him, feed him and respond to him.

Laughter is also a response to all the maternal games that are the first activities in which modulation and articulation, as such, are brought to him. Laughter is rightly linked to the beyond, as I called it in all the early remarks in my lectures this year on witticisms –
332 beyond the immediate, beyond all demand. Whereas desire is linked to a signifier which happens to be the signifier of presence, the first laughter is addressed beyond this presence, to the subject behind it.

From that moment, from the beginning, as it were, we find the root of the identification that will take place successively, over the course of the child's development, with the mother first and then with the father. I am not saying that this step exhausts the question, but identification is precisely the correlate of this laughter.

The opposite of laughter is, of course, not tears. Tears express colic, they express need. Tears are not a communication, tears are an expression, whereas laughter, inasmuch as I am obliged to articulate it, is a form of communication.

What is the opposite of laughter? Laughter communicates, it's an address to the one who, beyond the signified presence, is the mainspring, the resource of pleasure. Identification? That is the contrary. You are no longer laughing. You are as serious as a Pope, or as a Papa. You act nonchalantly because the person who is there is scowling, because it's no doubt not the moment to laugh. It's not the moment to laugh because this is not the point at which needs are to be satisfied. Desire models itself, as they say, on the person who holds the power to satisfy it and brings the resistance of reality up against it – where reality is perhaps not entirely what one says it is, but it is surely present here in some form and, frankly, already in the dialectic of demand.

According to my old schema, we can see what is at issue in laughter appear when demand reaches its destination, which is beyond the mask, and there it encounters not satisfaction, but a message of presence. When the subject acknowledges the fact that he does indeed have before him the source of all his goods, that is surely when laughter breaks out and the process does not need to be taken any further.

The process may also have to be taken further, however, if he gets scowled at and the demand is rejected. Then, as I've told you, what is at the origin of this need and desire appears in a transformed form. The scowl gets transferred into the circuit and ends up here [i(a)], the place where it's not for nothing that we encounter the other's image. What is known as the ego-ideal is produced at the conclusion of this transformation of demand. However, on the signifying line, the principle of what is called prohibition and superego, articulated as coming from the Other, emerges.

Analytic theory has always had great difficulty in reconciling the existence, the coexistence, the co-dimensionality of the ego-ideal 333 and the superego, whereas they correspond to different formations and productions. However, it's sufficient to draw this essential distinction between need and the words in which need is expressed to understand how these two products can be both co-dimensional and different. Even in its most primitive forms, the superego is formulated along the [lower] line of the articulation of signifiers, the line of prohibition, whereas the ego-ideal is produced along the [upper] line of the transformation of desire, insofar as it's always linked to some kind of mask.

In other words, the mask is constructed in dissatisfaction, via the intermediary of rejected demand. This is the point I wanted to bring you to today.

But, then, what is the outcome of this? There should be, in sum, as many masks as forms of dissatisfaction.

Yes, that is actually how things seem, and you can take that as your guide with certainty. In the psychological dimension that unfolds following frustration, so alive for some subjects, you can pick out this relationship between dissatisfaction and the mask in their very declarations, and this would mean that, up to a point, there would be as many masks as there are forms of dissatisfaction. The plurality of a subject's relationships with others, according to the diversity of his dissatisfaction, poses a problem here. It's possible to say that, up to a point, it would make every personality a moving mosaic of identifications. What enables a subject to see himself as a subject requires the intervention of a third dimension, which I will leave aside for today and keep in reserve for next time.

334 This dimension is not introduced by genital maturation, as is said, nor by the gift of oblativity, nor by any of the other moralizing blatherings that are the completely secondary features of the question. It's no doubt necessary that a desire intervene therein – a desire that is not a need, but eros, a desire that is not autoerotic, but, as they say, alloerotic, which is another way of saying the same thing. It's just that saying that is not enough, since genital maturation is not sufficient to bring about the decisive subjective reworking that will enable us to grasp the link between desire and the mask.

Next time we will see the essential condition that binds the subject to a prevailing, privileged signifier that we call – not by chance, but because concretely it is this signifier – the phallus. We shall see that this is the stage at which, paradoxically, what enables a subject to see himself as one across the diversity of masks is realized, but also, moreover, to see what makes him fundamentally divided, marked by an essential Spaltung between what is desire and what is mask.

SIGNIFIER, BAR AND PHALLUS

Desire is eccentric to satisfaction
Outline of the graph of desire Friday's footprint
Aufhebung of the phallus
The Other's castration

Today, we are going to keep exploring the distinction between desire and demand, which we think of as so essential to a well-conducted analysis that we believe that, without it, it will irresistibly slide into a practice of speculation founded on the terms 'frustration' on the one hand and 'gratification' on the other, which, to my mind, constitutes a real deviation in its approach.

What we will do, then, is continue along the direction that we have already given a name to – the distance between desire and demand, their Spaltung.

'Spaltung' is not a term I choose at random. It was, if not introduced, at least strongly emphasized in Freud's last work, the one he was in the middle of writing when he died. This 'Ichspaltung' is truly a point of convergence in Freud's final meditation. We cannot say that it brought him back to it again and again because we only have a fragment of several pages which is in volume 17 of the Gesammelte Werke and which I advise you to read if you wish to get a sense of the question that this Spaltung raises in Freud's mind. You will see, however, the force with which he emphasizes that the ego's synthetic function is far from being everything as far as the psychoanalytic Ich is concerned.

I am, therefore, going to pick up from what I was saying last time, for I believe that one can only make progress here by taking three steps forward and two steps back, by starting again and advancing one small step at a time. I will move fairly quickly, all the same, and remind you of what I insisted on when I spoke about desire, on the one hand, and demand, on the other.

As far as desire is concerned, I emphasized that it's inseparable from the mask, and I quite especially illustrated this for you by recalling that it's too swift a move to make a symptom the simple underside in relation to an outside.

I spoke to you about Elisabeth von R., about whom, as I was telling you, by simply reading Freud's text, one is able to formulate, since he himself articulates it, that her pain in the upper-right thigh is her father's desire and her childhood friend's desire. In effect, this pain comes up when the patient evokes the time she was entirely enslaved to her sick father's desire and demands, and when her attraction to her childhood friend's desire, which she reproached herself for having taken into consideration, was at work in the margins. The pain in her left thigh is the desire of her two brothers-in-law, one of whom, the spouse of her younger sister, represents the good masculine desire, and the other, the bad – the latter was considered, moreover, by all these women as quite a nasty man.

Beyond this remark, what we have to consider before we can understand what our interpretation of desire means is that in a symptom – and this is what 'conversion' means – desire is identical to somatic manifestation. The latter is the front, as the former is the back.

Moreover, since, if we have made any progress, it's only because things have been introduced in problematic form, I introduced the problematic of desire insofar as analysis reveals it to us as determined by an act of signification. But the fact that desire is determined by an act of signification does not at all yield its meaning in any final form. It's possible that desire is a by-product, as it were, of the act of signification.

I cited a number of articles that formed a true introduction to the question of perversion, insofar as it presents itself as a symptom and not as the pure and simple manifestation of an unconscious desire. For me, these articles re-establish the moment at which the authors realize that there is just as much Verdrängung [repression] in a perversion as in a symptom. In one of these articles, published in the International Journal, fourth year, with the title 'Neurosis and Perversion', the author, Otto Rank, considers the fact that a subject, a neurotic, immediately after having successfully performed his first coitus with satisfaction – this is not to say that others won't also be subsequently – commits a mysterious act, unique in his existence. Returning home from the place of the woman who had 337 granted him her favours, he performs a particularly successful exhibition – I think I already alluded to this in a seminar last year – in the sense that it's performed with the greatest abundance and security at one and the same time. He drops his pants, effectively, and displays himself on the embankment of the railway line, lit up by a train as it goes past. He thus happens to display himself to a whole crowd of people without running the slightest risk. The author interprets this act within the general economy of the subject's neurosis in a way that is more or less successful.

I am not going to elaborate on this aspect, but I will pause at the following – to be sure, for an analyst, it's certain that this is a significant act, as one says, but what does it mean?

I repeat, he has just engaged in his first act of copulation. Does his act mean that he still has it? That it's at everyone's disposal? That it has become, as it were, his personal property? What does he want, then, by displaying it? Does he want to efface himself behind what he is displaying, to be no longer anything but the phallus? All of this is equally plausible about this one same act, and within the one same subjective context.

What, however, seems worth emphasizing more than anything – and this is underlined and confirmed by the patient's words, the context of the observation and the very sequence of things – is that this first coitus was fully satisfying. His satisfaction is captured and realized. But what the act in question shows especially, prior to any other interpretation, is what is left to be desired beyond satisfaction.

I'm only recalling this little example so as to focus your minds on what I mean when I speak about the problematic of desire as being determined by an act of signification – this is distinct from any graspable meaning. Considerations of this kind, which display desire's profound coherence and coalescence with a symptom, or a mask's with what appears in a desire's manifestation, put many futile questions back in their place, questions that one always asks oneself about hysteria, but even more so about all kinds of sociological, ethnographical and other facts, where one always sees people tying themselves up in knots over the question.

Let's take an example. An excellent small book by Michel Leiris has just appeared in a tiny collection by L'Homme, published by Plon, about the facts of possession and the theatrical aspects of possession, which he discusses on the basis of his experience amongst the Ethiopians of Gondar. Reading this book, you can clearly see how perfectly the incontestably consistent facts about trances line up or match up with the externally typified, determined, expected, 338 known and mapped-out-in-advance features of the said spirits. The latter supposedly take possession of the people who are the site of all these singular manifestations. This can be observed in the ceremonies known as ceremonies of wadāgā, for what's involved can be found there, in the region indicated. There is more. One is struck not only by the conventional part played in the manifestations that are reproduced with the incarnation of this or that spirit, but also by their disciplinable character – to the point where subjects perceive it as a veritable training of these spirits who are, however, supposed to be taking possession of them. The order is reversed – the spirits have to behave themselves, they have an apprenticeship to undertake.

Possession, and everything it implies concerning phenomena powerfully inscribed in the emotions, in a 'pathetics' by which the subject is totally possessed for the duration of its manifestation, is perfectly compatible with the entire signifying richness linked to the domination that the insignias of the god or genie exercise. Attempting to inscribe the thing in the category of simulation, imitation and other terms of this nature would create an artificial problem in order to satisfy the demands of our own mentality. The very identity between the manifestation of desire and its forms is quite apparent here.

The other term to inscribe in this problematic of desire, and on which, in contrast, I insisted last time, is desire's eccentricity in relation to all forms of satisfaction. This term makes it possible for us to understand what, in general, desire's deep affinity with pain is. Ultimately, what desire borders on – not in its developed, masked forms, but in its pure and simple form – is the pain of existence. The latter represents the other pole, the area within which its manifestation presents itself to us.

By describing thus, at the other pole of the problematic, what I call the wandering movement of desire, its being off-centre in relation to satisfaction, I am not claiming to solve the question. This is not an explanation I am giving here, it's a view of the problem. This is what we have to go into more deeply today.

I return to the other element of the diptych I proposed last time, that is, the identificatory and idealizing function, insofar as it comes to depend on the dialectic of demand. Effectively, everything that takes place in the register of identification is founded on a relationship to signifiers in the Other – signifiers which, in the register of demand, are characterized on the whole as a sign of the Other's presence. Something is also instituted there that must bear a relationship to the problem of desire, which is that the sign of presence comes to dominate the satisfactions that this presence brings. This is what makes it the case that, so fundamentally, in such 339 an extended and constant manner, the human being engages as much in empty speech as in more substantial satisfactions – or at least in an appreciable and quite measurable proportion in comparison with the latter. The fundamental characteristic of what I have just been discussing is about this.

Here, again, a complementary parenthesis to what I said last time. Does this mean that the human being is the only being who engages in empty speech? Up to a point, it isn't out of the question that some domestic animals have certain satisfactions linked to human speech. I have no need to evoke these things, but we do learn quite strange things if we can trust the words of those who are called, more or less appropriately, specialists, and who seem to have a degree of credibility. I thus allow myself to say that minks that have been kept in captivity for money, namely, to derive profit from their pelts, waste away and will yield the furriers only fairly mediocre products unless one converses with them. This makes rearing minks very onerous, apparently, and adds to the overall cost. What's apparent here, and we lack the means to pursue this any further, has to be linked to the very fact of being enclosed, that minks in their natural state, to all appearances and till further notice, do not have the possibility of having this satisfaction.

I would simply like to go from there to giving you an indication of the direction from which, in connection with our problem, we can refer to Pavlovian studies on conditioned reflexes. At the end of the day, what are conditioned reflexes?

In their most widespread form, which occupies the greater part of experience, the existence of conditioned reflexes rests on the intervention of signifiers in a more or less predetermined, innate cycle of instinctive behaviours. All the little electrical signals, the little buzzers and little bells which are drummed into the poor animals so as to make them secrete, on command, their various physiological productions, their gastric juices – they are all actually signifiers, really, and nothing but. They are the fabrication of experimenters for whom the world is very clearly constituted by a number of objective relations – a world an important part of which is formed by what one can rightly single out as properly signifying. In any case, the purpose of dreaming up and constructing all these things is to show the path of progressive substitution by which psychical progress can be conceived.

animals are so well trained, they don't end up having acquired some kind of language. Now, precisely, this leap isn't made. When the Pavlovian theory became interested in what happens in man with respect to language, Pavlov took the very correct position, where language is concerned, of speaking, not of a prolongation of significations as it's brought into play in conditioned reflexes, but of a second system of significations. This is to recognize – implicitly, for this is perhaps not fully articulated in the theory – that there is some difference between them. To try to define this difference, I would say that it's due to what I call the relationship to the big Other, insofar as it is the locus of a unitary system of signifiers. I would also say that what the discourse of animals lacks is concatenation.

Ultimately, I would state the simplest formula in this way – no matter how elaborate these experiments, what is not found, and what there is perhaps no question of finding, is the law by which the signifiers involved are organized. This comes down to saying that this is the law by which the animals would be organized. It's completely clear that there is no trace of reference to any such law, that is, to anything that goes beyond a signal or a short chain of signals, once they've been introduced. No kind of law-like extrapolation is visible there, and that's why one can say that no one has ever managed to establish a law. I repeat, this is still not to say that there is no dimension of the Other with a big 'O' for animals, but only that, effectively, nothing like a discourse ever comes of it for them.

Where are we now? If we summarize what is involved in a subject's relationship to signifiers in the Other, namely what is happening in the dialectic of demand, it's essentially this. What characterizes a signifier is not that it's substituted for the subject's needs – which is the case in conditioned reflexes – but that it's capable of being substituted for itself. A signifier is essentially substitutive in nature in relation to itself.

In this direction, we can see that what is dominant, what matters, is the place it occupies in the Other. What points in that direction, and this is what I am trying to formulate here in various ways as essential to the signifying structure, is this topological, not to say typographical, space whose law is the law of substitution. The numbering of places provides the fundamental structure of a signifying system as such.

What one calls identification emerges – this is a fact highlighted by experience – inasmuch as the subject presents himself within a 341 world that is structured in this way in the position of Other. In the absence of satisfaction, a subject will identify with the subject who is able to accede to his demand.

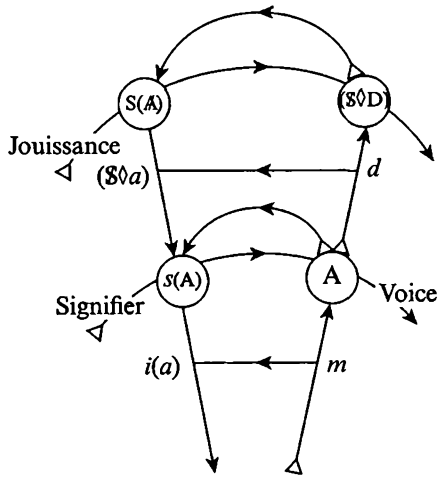
I left you last time with this question – so, why not the greatest plurality of identifications? As many identifications as there are unsatisfied demands? As many identifications as there are Others that place themselves in the subject's presence as responding, or not responding, to his demand?

This distance, this Spaltung, is reflected here in the construction of this little schema that I am putting on the blackboard for you for the first time today.



Here, we again find the three lines I have already repeated twice for you [see the formulas at the start of Chapter XVII, p. 285]. I think that you have them in your notes, but I can go over them for you.

The first line links the small d of desire to the image of a [i(a)], on the one hand, and, on the other, to m, which is the ego – by the intermediary of the subject's relation to small a [$ ◊ a].

The second line represents demand, inasmuch as it goes from demand to identification, passing through the position of the Other 342 in relation to desire. Thus, you see the Other split in two. Desire is there beyond it. This line passes through the signified of A [s(A)], which is placed here, on the schema at this first stage that I detailed for you last time when I told you that the Other only corresponds to demand. Because of the something that is what we are looking for, at a second moment it will divide in two and establish itself in a relationship that is not single but double – and which I have already started through other avenues – with two signifying chains.

The first chain, which is here when it's single and the only one, is situated at the level of demand – this is a signifying chain which demand has to pass through to emerge. Then, something intervenes to double the signifying relation.

What does this doubling of the signifying relation correspond to? The bottom line can, for example, amongst other things – not in a univocal way, naturally – be identified, as has been done till now, with the mother's response. This is what happens at the level of demand where the mother's response lays down the law all by itself – that is, subjects the subject to its arbitrariness. The other line represents the intervention of another instance, corresponding to the paternal presence, and to the modes under which this instance is felt beyond the mother.

Of course, it's not so simple. If it were all only a question of Mummy and Daddy, I would find it difficult to see how we could explain the facts we are dealing with.

We shall now go into the question of the Spaltung – the gap between desire and demand responsible for this discordance or divergence that establishes itself between these two terms. This is why we still need to go back over what a signifier is.

I know, you ask yourselves this every time we part – 'So, what on earth does he mean?' You are right to ask because, to be sure, things are not said this way, it's not so common.

Let's return to the question of what a signifier is at the elementary level. I propose that you stop and think about a number of remarks. For example, do you not think that with signifiers we are touching on something with respect to which one could speak of 'emergence'?

Let's begin with what a trace is. A trace is an imprint, not a signifier. One does, however, get the sense that there may be a relationship between the two, and in actual fact what is called the material of signifiers always partakes in something of the evanescent 343 character of a trace. That even seems to be one of the conditions for the existence of signifying material. It is not a signifier, however. Friday's footprint that Robinson Crusoe discovers during his walk on the island is not a signifier. On the other hand, if we suppose that for one reason or another he, Robinson Crusoe, effaces this trace, then the dimension of signifiers is clearly introduced. As soon as it's removed, where removing it has a meaning, that of which there is a trace is manifestly constituted as signified.

If the signifier is thus a hollow, it's insofar as it bears witness to a past presence. Conversely, in what is a signifier, in fully developed signifiers in speech, there is always a passage, that is, something following each of the elements that are articulated together and that are, by nature, fleeting and evanescent. It's this passage from one to the next that constitutes the essential feature of what I call the signifying chain.

This passage, insofar as it's evanescent, is the very thing that becomes voice – I won't even say 'signifying articulation', for it's possible that the articulation remains enigmatic, but it's the voice that sustains this passage. It's also at this level that what corresponds to what we initially designated as the signifier as bearing witness to a past presence emerges. Conversely, when the passage is present, something emerges that deepens it, that is beyond it and that makes it a voice.

What we still find there is that if there is a text, if the signifier is inscribed among other signifiers, what remains after the effacement is the place where one has done the effacing, and this place also sustains transmission. Transmission is something essential there, since it's due to it that what is linked together in the passage adopts the consistency of voice.

As to the question of emergence, this is one essential point to grasp, which is that a signifier as such is something that can be effaced, leaving nothing but its place – that is, it can no longer be found. This is an essential property, and it means that, while one can speak of emergence, one cannot speak of development. In reality a signifier contains this property within itself. I mean that one of the fundamental dimensions of a signifier is to be able to cancel itself out. It is a possibility that in this context we can describe it as a mode of the signifier itself. It's materialized by something very simple which we are all familiar with, and we cannot allow the trivial nature of its use to hide its originality – it's the bar. Every kind of signifier is by nature something that can be barred.

Ever since there have been philosophers who think, a great deal has been said about Aufhebung, and they have learnt to make a more 344 or less cunning use of it. The word essentially means cancellation – for example, I cancel my subscription to a newspaper, or my reservation somewhere. It also means, owing to an ambiguity of meaning that renders it valuable in the German language, raise to a power, to a higher situation. It doesn't seem that one dwells enough on the fact that properly speaking there is only one kind of thing that, in general terms, can be annulled, and that is a signifier. In truth, when we cancel anything else, whether it's imaginary or real, we thereby elevate it to the grade, to the title of a signifier.

There is, therefore, in signifiers, in a chain of signifiers, in operating with or using them, something that is always apt to demote them from their function in a line or in a lineage – the bar is a sign of bastardry – to demote them as such by virtue of the properly signifying function of what I will call 'high regard'. I mean that a signifier can have a place in what is pre-given in a battery of signifiers, insofar as this battery forms a particular system of signs that are available in an actual, concrete discourse, and also that it can always lose the function its place creates for it and be torn from this place in the constellation that the signifying system introduces when it applies itself to the world and punctuates it. From there, it falls from discredit [déconsidération] into desideration [désideration], where it's marked by the fact that it leaves something to be desired.

I am not just amusing myself by playing on words. I merely wish, through the use of words, to show you which direction brings us closer to our object, which is desire, by exploring its links with the play of signifiers. Contrasting 'consideration' with 'desideration' marked by the bar of the signifier is, of course, only a beginning and doesn't solve the question of desire, whatever homonymy the conjunction of these two terms which meet in the Latin etymology of the French word 'désir' lends itself to.

The fact remains that it's when a signifier is present as struck out, marked by the bar, that we have what one can call a product of the symbolic function. It's a product insofar as it's isolated and distinct from the general chain of signifiers and the law it establishes. It's only when it can be barred that a signifier acquires its proper status, that is, enters into this dimension which makes every signifier, in principle – to specify what I mean here – revocable.

The term 'Aufhebung' is used by Freud, and in some quite amusing places where no one seems to have thought of looking for it. Ah! All 345 of a sudden, when Freud uses it, we wake up. It's not that the word has the same resonance for him as it does for Hegel.

Every signifier is revocable in principle. As a result, for anything that is not a signifier – that is, for the real in particular – the bar is one of the surest and shortest ways to raise it to the dignity of a signifier.

I have already pointed this out to you in an extremely precise manner with respect to the fantasy of the child being beaten.

At the outset, this sign that the child is being beaten by the father is the sign of the hated brother's humiliation. I showed you that at the second stage of this fantasy's evolution, the one that Freud indicates as having to be reconstructed, as never having been perceived, except obliquely and in exceptional cases, when it's a question of the subject himself, this sign becomes on the contrary the sign of love. He, the subject, being beaten, is loved. The change in the meaning of this action in the interval does not fail to raise a problem, however. The same act which, when it applies to the other, is taken to be abusive and perceived by the subject as the sign that the other is not loved, assumes an essential value when it's the subject who becomes its support. This is only conceivable, properly speaking, via the function of signifiers.

It is inasmuch as this act raises the subject himself to the dignity of a signifier-subject that at this moment he is brought into its positive inaugural register. It institutes him as a subject with whom there can be a question of love.

This is what Freud – we must always come back to Freud's sentences, they are always lapidary – expresses in 'Some Psychical Consequences of the Anatomical Distinction between the Sexes' when he says that the child who is being beaten, then, becomes loved, valued on the plane of love. And then he introduces a remark that was merely implicit in 'Ein Kind wird geschlagen' ['A Child is Being Beaten'], a text I started to analyse and comment on. Here, Freud formulates it explicitly, without absolutely explaining it, but orientating it with this prodigious flare of his. It's exactly what is in question in the dialectic of the recognition of the beyond of desire. I will summarize what he says: this very peculiar rigidity, Starrheit, that can be detected in the monotonous formula 'a child is being beaten' probably allows of only one meaning – the child who is 346 being beaten, and thereby valued, nichts anderes sein, als die Klitoris selbst, is nothing other than the clitoris itself [see SE 19: 254]. In this study we are dealing with young girls.

'Starrheit' – the word is very difficult to translate into French because it has an ambiguous meaning in German. It means both a stare, in the sense of a fixed look, and rigid. They are not absolutely unrelated, although there is contamination of two meanings which have an analogy in history. That's actually what is at issue, namely that here we see something highlighted whose place as a knot to be untied I have already indicated, and this is the relationship that exists between the subject as such, the phallus as problematic object and the essentially signifying function of the bar insofar as it enters into play in the fantasy of the child that is being beaten.

For that, it isn't enough to be satisfied with this clitoris which leaves a lot to be desired in many respects. It's a matter of seeing why it's there in a particular position that is so ambiguous that, ultimately, although Freud recognizes it in the child being beaten, the subject on the other hand does not recognize it as such. It's in fact a question of the phallus inasmuch as it occupies a certain place in the economy of the subject's development and is the indispensable support of subjective construction as the pivot of the castration complex and Penisneid. It now remains to be seen how it enters into play in the subject's capture by the signifying structure, one of whose essential terms I have just recalled – or conversely.

For this we should pause for a moment at the mode in which the phallus can be considered. Why does one speak of the phallus, and not simply of the penis? Why do we effectively see that it's one thing to bring the phallus into play in the way we do, but that the way the penis comes in as a substitute for it in a more or less satisfactory manner is another thing, both for the masculine subject and the feminine subject? To what extent is the clitoris possibly involved in what we can call the economic functions of the phallus?

We find it attested for the first time in Greek Antiquity. If we go to the texts, to different places in Aristophanes, Herodotus, Lucian and so on, we see first of all that the phallus is not at all identical to the organ as an appendage of the body, a prolongation, a member or a functioning organ. The use of the word that dominates by far is its employment with respect to a simulacrum, an insignia, in whatever way it's presented – a raised staff with the male organ hanging from it, an imitation of the male organ, a piece of wood, a piece of leather 347 and other varieties in which it's presented. It's a substitute object and, at the same time, this substitution has one property very different from substitution in the sense we have just been hearing about, sign-substitution. One could almost say that this object has all the features of a real substitute, of what in a good story we call, and with always more or less of a smile, a dildo, a gode michet, from gaude mihi, one of the most unusual of objects, by their rarity, that exist in human industry. All the same, it's something whose existence, and whose very possibility, one cannot fail to take into account.

I also note that the olisbos is often confused in Greek with the phallus.

There is no doubt that this object played a central role at the heart of the Mysteries, since the final veils that the initiation raised were placed around it. That is, at the level of the revelation of meaning, it was considered to have an ultimate meaningful character.

Doesn't that put what this is about – namely, the prevailing economic role of the phallus, insofar as it represents desire in its most manifest form – on the right path?

I would contrast it term for term with what I was saying about the signifier, which is essentially hollow and introduces itself as such into the fullness of the world. Conversely, what presents itself in the phallus is what in life manifests itself in the purest manner as turgescence and growth. We get the clear sense that the image of the phallus goes to the very heart of the term 'pulsion' [drive], which we use to translate the German term 'Trieb' into French. This is the privileged object of the world of life, and its Greek appellation relates it to everything belonging to the order of flux and sap, and even the vein itself, for it seems that this is the same root as in 'phleps', 'φλεψ' and 'phallos'.

It seems, then, that things are such that this extreme point of the manifestation of desire in its vital appearances can only enter the field of signifiers by unleashing the bar. Everything in the order of the intrusion of vital growth as such is here highlighted or maximized in this form or image. And, as experience shows – all we are doing here is reading it off – this is precisely what introduces what appears in the human subject who does not possess the phallus with the connotation of absence there where it is not to be since it is not, which makes her regarded as castrated, whereas, conversely, the one who has something, and can claim to resemble it, is taken to be threatened with castration.

I alluded to the Mysteries of Antiquity. It's altogether striking to see that on the rare frescoes conserved remarkably intact, those of the Villa of the Mysteries in Pompeii, it's very precisely just along- 348 side the place where the unveiling of the phallus is represented that different kinds of demons appear, represented on an impressive, life-size scale and able to be identified by a number of cross-references. There is one on a vase in the Louvre and others in other places. These demons – winged, booted, not helmeted, but almost, and in any case armed with a flagellum – are beginning to administer the ritual punishment to one of the applicants or initiates who are in the image. Thus, the fantasy of flagellation emerges in the most direct of forms and in the most immediate of connections with the unveiling of the phallus.

We don't need to undertake any kind of investigation into the depths of the Mysteries to know what texts of all sorts attest to – that, in every ancient cult, as one gets closer to the cult, that is to say, to the signifying manifestation of the fertile power of the Great Goddess, the Syrian goddess, everything that has a reference to the phallus is the object of amputations, marks of castration or prohibition that are increasingly accentuated. Specifically, the eunuch character of the priests of the Great Goddess is attested in texts of all kinds.

The phallus always finds itself covered by a bar placed over its accession to the domain of signifiers, that is, over its place in the Other. And this is how castration is introduced into development. It's never – you see this directly in observations – by means of a prohibition on masturbation, for example. If you read the observation on Little Hans, you will see that the first prohibitions have no effect on him. If you read the history of André Gide, you will see that his parents fought during all his early years to stop him from it, and that Professor Brouhardel, showing him the huge pikes and the long knives that he had on his wall – because it was already the fashion amongst doctors to have a whole second-hand shop at one's place – promised him that if he did it again it would be sawn off. And the child Gide recounts very well that he did not believe in such a threat for one single moment, because he thought it was excessive – in other words, nothing more than the occasion for the emergence of Professor Brouhardel's own fantasies.

That's not at all what this is about. As the texts show us, and observations as well, this has to do with that being in a world who, in reality, would have the least cause to consider herself castrated, namely, the mother. It's in the place where castration in the Other manifests itself, where it's the Other's desire that is marked by the signifying bar – it's essentially here, in this way that, for a man as 349 for a woman, this something specific that functions as the castration complex is introduced.

When we spoke about the Oedipus complex at the start of last trimester, I stressed the fact that the first person to be castrated in the intersubjective dialectic is the mother. This is where the position of castration is encountered in the first instance. If the destinies of the boy and the little girl are different, it's because castration is first of all encountered in the Other.

The little girl combines this perception with what it is that the mother has deprived her of. What is perceived in the mother as castration is, then, also perceived as castration for her and initially presents itself in the form of a reproach against the mother. This rancour then comes to be added to those that earlier frustrations have given rise to. It's in this mode that the castration complex first presents itself to the girl.

The father only enters here in the position of a replacement for what she initially finds herself deprived of, and this is why she moves onto the plane of the experience of privation. It's because the real penis of the father – which, we are told, she expects as a substitute for what she perceives to be what she has been deprived of – already appears at the symbolic level that we are able to speak of privation, with both the crisis that the latter engenders and the crossroads that presents itself to the subject of either renouncing her object, which is the father, or renouncing her instinct by identifying with the father.

This produces a curious consequence. Precisely as a result of having been introduced into the woman's castration complex in the form of a symbolic substitute, the penis is the source in the woman of all sorts of conflicts of the conflicts-of-jealousy type. The partner's infidelity is experienced in her as a real privation. The emphasis is quite different here from the same conflict seen from the side of the man.

I'm going through this quickly. I will come back to it, but there is one more thing that we really must see. If the phallus is encountered in the barred form where it has the place of indicating the Other's desire, what about the subject? In my remaining comments I will show that the subject also has to find his place as a desired object in relation to the Other's desire. Consequently, and as Freud indicates to us with such remarkable insight in 'A Child is Being Beaten', it's always insofar as the subject is and is not the phallus that he will ultimately have to be situated and find his identification as subject. In short, as we can see, the subject is, as such, himself a subject marked by the bar.

This is manifest in the woman. Today I have been exploring the effects of her development concerning the phallus in one simple indi- 350 cation. The woman – the man also, moreover – finds herself caught in an insoluble dilemma, around which it's necessary to place all the typical manifestations of her femininity, whether neurotic or not. As to finding her satisfaction, there is first of all the man's penis, then, by substitution, the desire for a child. I'm doing no more here than indicating what is current and classical in analytic theory. But what does that mean? That, ultimately, she will only obtain satisfaction that is as deep, fundamental and instinctual as that of maternity, and as demanding moreover, via the pathways of lines of substitutions. It's inasmuch as the penis is initially a substitute – I would go so far as to say a fetish – that the child, he too, is, then, in a certain way, a fetish. There you have the pathways by which the woman finds what is, let's say, her instinct and her natural satisfaction.

Conversely, for everything that is aligned with her desire, she will find herself tied to the necessity that to a variable degree is implied by the function of the phallus, to be this phallus, insofar as it's the very sign of what is desired. However verdrängt the phallus's function may be, it's what the manifestations of what is thought of as femininity correspond to. The fact that she displays herself and offers herself as an object of desire identifies her in a latent and secret manner with the phallus and situates her being as subject as the desired phallus, the signifier of the Other's desire. This being locates her beyond what one may call feminine masquerade, since everything that she displays of her femininity is ultimately linked to this profound identification with the phallic signifier, which is the most linked with her femininity.

What we see appear here is the root of what, in the subject's completion on the path to the Other's desire, can be called her profound Verwerfung, her profound rejection, qua being, of how she appears as a woman. Her satisfaction goes via a substitutive path, whereas her desire manifests itself on a plane where it can only end in a profound Verwerfung, a profound estrangement of her being in relation to how she feels she is obliged to appear.

Don't think that the situation is any better for the man. It's even more comical. The phallus, he has it, the poor bastard, and indeed it's the knowledge that his mother doesn't have it that traumatizes him – for then, since she is much stronger, where does that leave us? Karen Horney revealed one of the most essential sources of the disturbances of the castration complex in the primitive fear of women. Just as the woman is caught in one dilemma, so the man 351 is caught in another. For him, masquerade is established along the lines of satisfaction, because he resolves the question of the danger that threatens what he effectively has, we well know how, namely by simply identifying with the one who possesses its insignias and gives every appearance of having escaped the danger – that is, with the father. Ultimately, man is only virile through an indefinite series of proxies that come to him from all his male ancestors, passing via his immediate ancestor.

But conversely, in line with desire, that is, inasmuch as he has to find his satisfaction with a woman, he also is going to seek the phallus. Now – we all have testimony of this, clinical and other, I will come back to it – it's because he does not find this phallus there where he is looking for it, that he looks for it everywhere else.

In other words, for the woman, the symbolic penis is inside, as it were, the field of her desire, whereas for the man it's outside. This explains why men always have centrifugal tendencies in monogamous relationships.

Inasmuch as she is not herself, that is, inasmuch as in the field of her desire she has to be the phallus, the woman experiences the Verwerfung of subjective identification, the one that arises where the second line, the one starting with the capital D, ends. [See the formulas on p. 285.] And it's inasmuch as he is not himself either, insofar as he satisfies, that is, insofar as he obtains the Other's satisfaction, but only perceives himself as the instrument of that satisfaction, that the man finds himself in love outside his Other.

The problem of love is the problem of the profound division it introduces into the subject's activities. What is at issue for a man, following the very definition of love, 'to give what one does not have', is to give what he does not have, the phallus, to a being who is not it.

THE DIALECTIC OF DESIRE AND DEMAND IN THE CLINICAL STUDY AND TREATMENT OF THE NEUROSES

XX

THE DREAM BY THE BUTCHER'S BEAUTIFUL WIFE

The Other's desire
Unsatisfied desire
The desire for something other Barred desire
Dora's identification

If the things of man, which we are concerned with in principle, are marked by his relationship to signifiers, one cannot use signifiers to speak about these things in the way one does when speaking about things that signifiers help him pose. In other words, there has to be a difference between the way we speak about the things of man and the way we speak about other things.

We know very well today that things are not indifferent to being explored by signifiers, that they bear a relationship to the order of the logos and that this relationship has to be studied. We are well placed, more so than our predecessors were, to appreciate that language penetrates things, makes furrows in them, raises them up and disrupts them even if only modestly. But in the end, at the point where we are now, we know, at least we suppose, that unless we're wrong things did not develop in language. That, at least, was where one started for the work of science as it's currently constituted, the work of the science of phusis.

Think, first, of purifying language – that is, of reducing it to the necessary minimum for it to be able to grasp onto things, which is the principle of what is called the transcendental analytic. In short, people have contrived to disconnect language as much as possible – not totally, of course – from the things with which it was deeply connected up until a certain period that corresponds more or less to the beginning of modern science, in order to reduce it to its interrogative function.

Now, everything has become complicated. Do we not observe strange upheavals in things, which are certainly not unconnected to the way in which we question them? And, moreover, curious 356 impasses in language, which, as soon as we start speaking about things, becomes strictly incomprehensible to us? But that is not our concern. We are dealing with man. And, here, I want you to observe that the language in which to question him has not yet been discovered.

We think we have discovered it when we employ the discourse of the Academy or of psychiatric psychology – until otherwise informed, they are the same thing – for the things of man. We ourselves can very adequately perceive the poverty, and moreover the immutability, of the constructions that we engage in, for, if the truth be known, over the century since in psychiatry one has been speaking about hallucinations, almost no progress has been made and they can still not be defined in any other than a ridiculous manner.

The entire language of psychiatric psychology presents the same handicap, moreover, and makes us aware of its profound stagnation. We say that such-and-such a function is being reified, and we feel the arbitrariness of these reifications, when for example we speak in a Bleulerian language about dissociation in schizophrenia. And when we say 'reify' we get the impression that we are formulating a valid critique. What does that mean? It's not at all that we are reproaching this psychology with having turned man into a thing. If only it did make a thing of him, for that is indeed the aim of a science of man. But, precisely, it makes of him a thing that is nothing other than prematurely frozen language, which hastily substitutes its own form of language for something that is already woven into language.

What we call 'formations of the unconscious', what Freud presented us with under this heading, are nothing other than the grip of a certain primary in language. This is why he called it 'primary process'. Language marks this 'primary', and this is why the ground for Freud's discovery, that of the unconscious, can be said to have been prepared by the enquiry into this primary, inasmuch as its structure as language was detected first.

I said 'prepared'. Freud's discovery effectively made it possible for the enquiry into this 'primary' to be prepared for and for an accurate enquiry into primary tendencies to be commenced. But we will not be at that point as long as we haven't first focused on what has to be recognized, namely that this primary is first and foremost woven from language. This is why I am returning you to it. Those who dazzle you with the synthesis of psychoanalysis and biology are showing you that it's obviously a lure, not only by virtue of the fact that till now there have been absolutely no developments in this direction, but because until further notice it's a swindle even to promise them.

I am, then, now at the point of trying to show, project and situate 357 here, with you, what I am calling the texture of language. That does not mean that we exclude the primary inasmuch as it's something other than language. It's what we are looking for as we move forward.

In previous classes, we got to a point where we were touching on what I called the dialectic of desire and demand.

I was saying to you that, in demand, identification is with the object of a sentiment. Why, in the end, is that so? Precisely because nothing intersubjective can be established unless the Other with a big 'O' speaks. Or, again, because the nature of speech is to be the speech of the Other. Or, again, because everything that is a manifestation of primary desire is necessarily established on what Freud, following Fechner, calls the other scene, because that is necessary for man's satisfaction inasmuch as, being a speaking being, his satisfactions have to pass through the intermediary of speech.

This one fact introduces an initial ambiguity. Desire is obliged to be mediated by speech, and it's apparent that it is only in the Other as the locus of speech that this speech gains its status, becomes established and develops in its nature. Now, it's clear there is no reason why the subject should be aware of this. I mean that the distinction between the Other and him himself is the most difficult of distinctions to make at the outset. Freud thus emphasizes the symptomatic value of this moment of childhood in which the child thinks his parents know all his thoughts, but he explains the link between this phenomenon and speech very well. Since the subject's thoughts have been formed in the Other's speech, it's quite natural that in the beginning his thoughts should belong to this speech.

On the imaginary plane, on the other hand, at the start there is only a weak border between the subject and the other, an ambiguous border in the sense that it can be crossed. The narcissistic relation is open, effectively, to permanent transitivism, as the child's experience shows here also.

These two forms of ambiguity, these two limits – one located on the imaginary plane, the other belonging to the symbolic order whereby desire is grounded in the Other's speech – these two forms of crossing-over which mean that the subject is alienated are not to be confused with one another. As experience shows, it is, on the contrary, their discordance that opens up an initial possibility for 358 the subject to differentiate himself as such. Of course, he differentiates himself most particularly on the imaginary plane, establishing himself in a position of rivalry with his semblable in relation to a third object. But there always remains the question of what happens when there are two of these subjects, namely, when it's a question of the subject sustaining himself in the presence of the Other.

This dialectic is limited to the one called the dialectic of recognition, of which you have some idea, at least some of you do, due to what I have communicated about it here. You know that a certain Hegel sought the mainspring of this in the conflict of enjoyment and in the struggle called the struggle to death from which he extracted his entire master–slave dialectic. All this is very important to know, but of course this does not cover the entire field of our experience, and for the best of reasons. The fact is that there is something other than the dialectic of the master–slave struggle. There is the child's relationship to its parents, and there is, precisely, what occurs at the level of recognition when what is involved is not a struggle, not a conflict, but a demand.

It is, in short, a question of seeing when and how the subject's desire, alienated in demand, profoundly transformed by the fact of having to pass through demand, can and must be reintroduced. These are simple things I am telling you today.

Primitively, the child, in its impotence, finds itself entirely dependent on demand, that is, on the Other's speech, which modifies, restructures and profoundly alienates the nature of its desire. This dialectic of demand corresponds more or less to the period that is called, rightly or wrongly, pre-Oedipal and, surely rightly, pre-genital. By virtue of the ambiguity of the limits between the subject and the Other, we see introduced into demand the oral object, an object which is incorporated inasmuch as it's demanded on the oral level, and the anal object, the support of the dialectic of the primitive gift, essentially tied in the subject to the fact of satisfying or not satisfying an educative demand, that is, the demand to accept or not to accept to let go of a certain symbolic object. In short, the profound reworking of initial desires by demand is permanently palpable for us in the dialectic of the oral object and particularly in that of the anal object – and the result of this is that the Other with whom the subject is involved in the relation of demand is itself subject to a dialectic of assimilation, incorporation or rejection.

Something different, then, has to be introduced – something by which the originality, irreducibility and authenticity of the subject's desire is re-established. The progress that is made at the time of the so-called genital stage means nothing else. It consists in the fact that 359 the subject, installed in the initial, pre-genital dialectic of demand, encounters another desire at some point, a desire that has not yet been integrated, and cannot be integrated without much greater critical and even more profound reworkings than is the case for the initial desires. The usual way in which this other desire is introduced for the subject is as the Other's desire. The subject recognizes a desire beyond demand and locates it beyond the first Other to whom he addresses his demand – let's say, to focus our minds, the mother.

What I am saying here is just one way of expressing what people have always taught, which is that it's via the Oedipus complex that genital desire is assumed and takes its place in subjective economy. But what I intend to draw your attention to is the way this desire of the Other's functions, insofar as it makes it possible for the real distinction between the subject and the Other to become established once and for all.

At the level of demand, there is a situation of reciprocity between the subject and the Other. If the subject's desire depends entirely on his demand of the Other, what the Other demands also depends on the subject. This is expressed in the relations between child and mother by the fact that the child knows full well that he, too, holds some part of the mother's demand that he can refuse – by refusing for example to accede to the request for excremental regulation. This relationship between the two subjects over demand demands to be completed by the introduction of a new dimension which makes the subject something other than a dependent subject, whose relation of dependence makes this being essential. What must be introduced, and which is there right from the start, latent from the outset, is that beyond what the subject demands and beyond what the Other demands of the subject, there has to be the presence and the dimension of what the Other desires.

Initially, this is profoundly veiled for the subject but nevertheless immanent to the situation, and it's what is going to unfold, little by little, in the experience of the Oedipus complex. It is essential in the structure, and it is more original and more fundamental than the perception either of the relations between the father and the mother, which I have expanded on in what I have called the paternal metaphor, or of any point that results in the castration complex and constitutes a development in what lies beyond demand.

The fact that the subject's desire is initially located and discovered in the existence as such of the Other's desire – desire as distinct from demand – is what I want to illustrate for you today with an example. Which example? It is a requirement that it be the first one.

360 Effectively, if what I am suggesting really is an introduction to everything regarding the structuration of the unconscious in relation to signifiers, then we ought to find our example immediately.

I have already alluded here to what we can point to in the initial observations Freud makes on hysteria. Let's go, then, to the time when Freud spoke about desire for the first time.

He speaks about it in relation to dreams. I have previously commented on what Freud extracts from the inaugural dream of Irma, the dream of her injection, and I won't go back over it. The second dream is one of Freud's own dreams – since he also analyses some of his own dreams in the Traumdeutung – the dream of Uncle Joseph. I will analyse it some other time, because it's so entirely convincing, and it illustrates very well the schema of the two intertwined loops in particular – nothing shows better the two levels on which a dream unfolds, the properly signifying level which is the level of speech, and the imaginary level where in some way the metonymic object is embodied.

I will, then, take the third dream Freud analyses. It appears in the fourth chapter, 'Die Traumentstellung', 'Distortion in Dreams'. It's the dream by the woman whom we shall call the butcher's beautiful wife. Here is the dream. Freud says:

> I wanted to give a supper-party, but I had nothing in the house but a little smoked salmon. I thought I would go out and buy something, but remembered then that it was Sunday afternoon and all the shops would be shut. Next I tried to ring up some caterers, but the telephone was out of order. So I had to abandon my wish to give a supper-party. [SE 4: 147]

That is the text of the dream. Freud scrupulously notes the manner in which the text of a dream is verbalized, and it's on the basis of this verbalization, a kind of written text of the dream, that the analysis of a dream always and only seems conceivable to him.

> I answered, of course, that analysis was the only way of deciding on the meaning of the dream. [SE 4: 147]

In fact, the patient had contradicted him with this dream, saying:

> You're always saying to me that a dream is a fulfilled desire. Here, I have the greatest difficulty fulfilling my desire. [SE 4: 146]

Freud continues:

> I admitted that at first sight it seemed sensible and coherent and looked like the reverse of a wish-fulfilment. 'But what material did the dream arise from? As you know, the instigation to a dream is always to be found in the events of the previous day.' 361
>
> ANALYSIS. – My patient's husband, an honest and capable wholesale butcher, had remarked to her the day before that he was getting too stout and therefore intended to start on a course of weight-reduction. He proposed to rise early, do physical exercises, keep to a strict diet, and above all accept no more invitations to supper. She laughingly added that her husband, at the place where he regularly lunched, had made the acquaintance of a painter, who had pressed him to be allowed to paint his portrait, as he had never seen such expressive features. Her husband however had replied in his blunt manner that he was much obliged, but he was sure the painter would prefer a piece of a pretty young girl's behind to the whole of his face. She was very much in love with her husband now and teased him a lot. She had begged him, too, not to give her any caviare. [SE 4: 147]

What did that mean?

> She had wished for a long time that she could have a caviare sandwich every morning but had grudged the expense. [SE 4: 147]

Or, rather, she didn't grant herself that licence.

> Of course her husband would have let her have it at once if she had asked him. But, on the contrary, she had asked him not to give her any caviare, so that she could go on teasing him about it. [SE 4: 147]

Then Freud makes this parenthesis:

> This explanation struck me as unconvincing. Inadequate reasons like this usually conceal unconfessed motives. They remind one of Bernheim's hypnotized patients. When one of these carries out a post-hypnotic suggestion and is asked why he is acting in this way, instead of saying that he has no idea, he feels compelled to invent some obviously unsatisfactory reason.

> The same was no doubt true of my patient and the caviare. I saw that she was obliged to create an unfulfilled wish for herself in her actual life; and the dream represented this renunciation as having been put into effect. But why was it that she stood in need of an unfulfilled wish? [SE 4: 147–8]

A further parenthetical remark by Freud:

> The associations which she had so far produced had not been sufficient to interpret the dream. I pressed her for some more. After a short pause, such as would correspond to the overcoming of a resistance, she went on to tell me that the 362 day before she had visited a woman friend of whom she confessed she felt jealous because her [my patient's] husband was constantly singing her praises. Fortunately this friend of hers is very skinny and thin and her husband admires a plumper figure. I asked her what she had talked about to her thin friend. Naturally, she replied, of that lady's wish to grow a little stouter. Her friend had enquired, too: 'When are you going to ask us to another meal? You always feed one so well.'
> The meaning of the dream was now clear, and I was able to say to my patient: 'It is just as though when she made this suggestion you said to yourself: "A likely thing! I'm to ask you to come and eat in my house so that you may get stout and attract my husband still more! I'd rather never give another supper-party." What the dream was saying to you was that you were unable to give any supper-parties, and it was thus fulfilling your wish not to help your friend to grow plumper. The fact that what people eat at parties makes them stout had been brought home to you by your husband's decision not to accept any more invitations to supper in the interests of his plan to reduce his weight.' All that was now lacking was some coincidence to confirm the solution. The smoked salmon in the dream had not yet been accounted for. 'How', I asked, 'did you arrive at the salmon that came into your dream?' 'Oh,' she replied, 'smoked salmon is my friend's favourite dish.' I happen to be acquainted with the lady in question myself, and I can confirm the fact that she grudges herself salmon no less than my patient grudges herself caviare. [SE 4: 148]

It's at this point that Freud introduces the text of the dream that bears another interpretation, one that enters into the dialectic of identification:

> She had 'identified' herself with her friend. I believe she had in fact done this; and the circumstance of her having brought about a renounced wish in real life was evidence of this identification. [SE 4: 149]

I think you must already sense the outline that is being drawn in this simple text. I could have opened the Traumdeutung at any other page, we would have found the same dialectic. This dream, which was the first to fall into my hands, will show us the dialectic of desire and demand, which is particularly straightforward in the hysteric.

Let's keep on reading, so that we can pursue to the end what this very important text articulates for us. It is in short one of the first very clear articulations, by Freud, of what hysterical identification signifies. He spells out its meaning. I will leave out several lines so as not to go on too long. He discusses what is called hysterical imitation, the hysteric's sympathy for the other, and criticizes, with great energy, the simple reduction of hysterical contagion to pure and simple imitation.

The process of hysterical identification, he says, 363 > is a little more complicated than the common picture of hysterical imitation; it consists in the unconscious drawing of an inference, as an example will make clear. Supposing a physician is treating a woman patient, who is subject to a particular kind of spasm, in a hospital ward among a number of other patients. He will show no surprise if he finds one morning that this particular kind of hysterical attack has found imitators . . . but the psychical infection has occurred along some such lines as these. As a rule, patients know . . . [SE 14: 149]

You have to be aware of the importance that such a remark carries, I am not saying simply at the time at which it was made, but for us still.

> . . . more about one another than the doctor does about any of them; and after the doctor's visit is over they turn their attention to one another. [SE 4: 149]

An essential comment. In other words, the human object continues to live out its little special relationship to signifiers, even after the observer, whether a behaviourist or not, has shown an interest in his photography.

> Let us imagine that this patient had her attack on a particular day; then the others will quickly discover that it was caused by a letter from home, the revival of some unhappy love-affair, or > some such thing. Their sympathy is aroused and they draw the following inference, though it fails to penetrate into consciousness: 'If a cause like this can produce an attack like this, I may have the same kind of attack . . .' [SE 4: 150]

Articulation of the elementary symptom with an identification in discourse, with a situation articulated in discourse

> . . . since I have the same grounds for having it.' If this inference were capable of entering this consciousness, it might possibly give rise to a fear of having the same kind of attack. But in fact the inference is made in a different psychical region, and consequently results in the actual realization of the dreaded symptom. Thus identification is not simple imitation but assimilation on the basis of a similar aetiological pretension; it expresses a resemblance and is derived from a common element which remains in the unconscious. [SE 4: 150]

The term 'appropriation' [in the French, the English gives 'assimilation'] is not a particularly good translation. It's rather, 'made one's own'. Freud says:

> A hysterical woman identifies herself in her symptoms most readily – though not exclusively – with people with whom she has had sexual relations or with people who have had sexual relations with the same people as herself. Linguistic usage takes this into account, for two lovers are spoken of as being 'one'. [SE 4: 150]

The problem raised by Freud is the relation of identification with the jealous friend. In this respect I want to draw your attention to the following – the desire we encounter from the very first steps of the analysis, and on the basis of which the solution to the puzzle will unfold, is desire as unsatisfied. At the time of this dream, the patient was preoccupied with creating an unsatisfied desire for herself. What is the function of this unsatisfied desire?

What we effectively read in the dream is the satisfaction of a wish, a wish to have an unsatisfied desire. And what we discover in this connection is the underlying situation, which is man's fundamental 364 situation, between demand and desire, to which I am trying to introduce you, and which effectively I am introducing you to via hysteria, because the hysteric is suspended between this necessary split, as I was showing you earlier, between demand and desire. Here, it could not be any clearer.

What was she asking for before the dream, in her life? What is this patient, very much in love with her husband, asking for? It's love, and hysterics, like everybody else, ask for love – except that, for them, it's more of an encumbrance. What does she desire? She desires caviar. You just have to read. And what does she want? She wants not to be given caviar.

The question is precisely knowing why, for a hysteric to enter into a commerce of love that she finds satisfying, it's necessary, first, that she desire something else, and the caviar has no other role than to be this something else, and, in the second place, that in order for this something else to fulfil the function that is its task to fulfil, precisely, one doesn't give it to her. Her husband would ask for nothing better than to give her caviar, but she imagines it would probably be so that he would be left alone. But what Freud tells us in so many words is that she wants her husband not to give her caviar so that they can continue to be madly in love, that is, tease one another and make each other's lives endlessly miserable.

These structural elements, apart from the fact that we have stopped to think about them, are not particularly original, but they are beginning to take on meaning here. What is expressed is a structure which, beyond its comical side, has to represent something necessary. The hysteric is precisely a subject who finds it difficult to establish a relation – one that enables her to retain her place as a subject – with the constitution of the Other as big Other and bearer of the spoken sign. This is the very definition that one can give of the hysteric. In a word, the hysteric, man or woman, is so open to suggestion through speech that there must be something in it.

In Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego Freud enquires into the way in which hypnosis arises, when its relation to sleep is far from being transparent, and when the tendency that suits it to certain people, whereas others refuse it and radically distance themselves from it, remains enigmatic. But everything seems to show, however, that what occurs in hypnosis is made possible in a subject by the purity of certain circumstances – I would even say by libidinal attitudes. What is at issue, if not places or positions that we are in the process of throwing light on? The unknown element Freud speaks of revolves around the way demand and desire are articulated. That is what I will try to show later.

If a subject has to create an unsatisfied desire for himself, it's 365 because this is the condition for a real Other to be constituted for him, that is, one that is not entirely imminent to the reciprocal satisfaction of demand or to the entire capture of the subject's desire by the Other's speech. That the desire in question is, by its nature, the Other's desire is very precisely what the dialectic of dreams introduces us to, since the patient does not want this desire for caviar to be satisfied in reality. And this dream incontestably tends to satisfy her with respect to the solution to the problem she is pursuing.

What is the desire for caviar represented by in the dream? By the intermediary of the person in the dream, the friend with whom – Freud points out the signs – she identifies. Her friend is also an hysteric, or not, it doesn't matter, it's all pure hysterico-hysterical. The patient is hysterical, and the other is as well, to be sure, and all the more easily because the hysterical subject is almost entirely constituted on the basis of the Other's desire. The desire that the subject makes clear in the dream is the preferred desire of her friend, the desire for salmon, and even when she is unable to give a dinner party, this is all that she is left with, smoked salmon, which is an indication of the Other's desire as well as of the fact that it's capable of being satisfied, but only for the Other. 'Besides, there is nothing to worry about, we have some smoked salmon.' All the same, the dream does not say that things come to the point where she gives it to her friend, but the intention is there.

On the other hand, what gets stranded is her friend's request, the dream's genetic element. She asked her if she could come to dinner at her place where one eats so well, and where, moreover, one can meet the handsome butcher. This amiable husband who always speaks so well of her friend must also have his own little desire inside his head, and the backside of the young girl evoked so promptly in relation to the proposition by the amiable painter who would like to draw him and sketch such an interesting, expressive face is certainly there as proof. In a word, everyone has his little desire beyond, simply more or less intensified.

Except that, in the specific case of an hysteric, desire as lying beyond all demand, that is, as having to occupy its function in the name of a refused desire, plays a role very much in the foreground. You will never understand anything about hysterics, him or her, if you don't start with this primary, structural element. Moreover, in man's relationship to signifiers, the hysteric is a primordial structure. Should you push the dialectic of demand far enough with a subject, you will always encounter the Spaltung between demand and desire at some point in the structure, at the risk of committing major 366 errors, that is, of rendering the patient hysterical, for everything that we analyse there is, of course, unconscious for the subject. In other words, an hysteric does not know that he cannot find satisfaction in the demand, but it's quite essential that you yourself know this.

These notations are now going to enable us to begin to point to what the little diagram that I drew for you last time means, the interpretation of which it was a little premature to give you then. [See the diagram on p. 321.]

As I have told you, what manifests itself as a need must be expressed in demand, that is, must be addressed to the Other [A]. An encounter takes place opposite, or does not take place, and it occupies the place of the message [s(A)] – that is, what in the Other is signified. Then, a relic of demand is produced, which consists in the alteration of what manifests itself in the still unformed state of the subject's desire, which manifests itself in principle in the form of the subject's identification. I will come back to this next time, with Freud's text in hand, and you will see that the first time he speaks in a fully articulated manner about identification – you can already look it up if your heart is in it – primitive identification is not articulated in any other way than I have noted for you here.

You are aware, moreover, that down the path along which the narcissistic short-circuit is introduced, there already exists a possibility, an opening, an outline.

What's essential in what I gave you when describing the function of the phallus is that it's the signifier that is the mark of what the Other desires insofar as it itself, as a real, human Other, is, in its economy of being, marked by the signifier. It's this formula that we are precisely in the process of studying. It's precisely insofar as the Other is marked by the signifier that a subject can through there, and only through there – through the intermediary of the Other – recognize that he, too, is marked by the signifier, that is, that there is always something that remains beyond what can be satisfied through the intermediary of the signifier, that is, through demand. This split created around the action of signifiers, this irreducible residue linked to signifiers, also has its own sign, but this sign is going to be identified with this mark in the signified. This is where a subject must encounter his desire.

In other words, it's insofar as the Other's desire is barred that the subject will recognize his own barred desire, his own unsatisfied desire. It's at the level of this desire, barred through the intermediary of the Other, that the subject's encounter with his most authentic desire, namely genital desire, occurs. It's for this reason that genital desire is marked by castration, in other words by a 367 particular relationship to the signifier phallus. The two things are equivalent.

What we find first off corresponds to demand, that is, at an initial stage, the mother's speech. This speech itself has a relation to a law that lies beyond, and which, as I have shown, is incarnated by the father. This is what constitutes the paternal metaphor. But you have the perfect right to think that not everything is reducible to this layering of speech, and I think that this sort of lack must have left you – you too – with something to be desired when I explained it to you.

Effectively, beyond speech and beyond over-speech, beyond the law of the father, whatever one calls it, something else is required. This is the capacity in which this chosen signifier, the phallus, is introduced and, naturally, it's situated at the same level as the law. Under normal conditions, it's located at a second order of the encounter with the Other. This is what, in my little formulas, I have called S(Ⱥ), the signifier of barred A. It's precisely the question of what I have just now defined as being the function of the signifier phallus – namely, the function of marking what the Other, as marked by the signifier, that is, as barred, desires.

Where is the subject? When we are no longer dealing with the ambiguous subject, at one and the same time perpetually dipping into the speech of the Other and getting caught up in the specular, dual relationship with the little other, but rather with the constituted and completed subject of the Z-shaped formula – this is the subject insofar as the bar has been introduced, namely, insofar as he himself is also marked somewhere by the relationship to signifiers. This is why we find it here, in [$ ◊ D], where the subject's relation to demand as such happens.

How are we to explain the necessary stage by which the Oedipus complex is integrated with the castration complex, namely, the structuration of the subject's desire through them? How does that happen? You can see it set out on this diagram. This beyond-the-relationship-to-the-Other's-speech is introduced through the signifier phallus. But, of course, once it is constituted and the signifier phallus is there in this place as the Other's desire, it doesn't remain there, but becomes integrated into the Other's speech and, with all the consequences that follow, occupies its place this-side-of, in the primitive place of the speech relationship with the mother. It's here that it plays its role and takes on its function.

In other words, this beyond I have posited, inasmuch as I am attempting to determine the requisite stages for the integration of speech to enable desire to take its place for the subject, remains 368 unconscious for the subject. Henceforth, this is where the dialectic unfolds for him, without him knowing that this dialectic is only possible insofar as his desire, his true desire, finds its place in a relationship, which therefore remains unconscious for him, with the Other's desire. In short, these two lines are normally interchangeable [see lines 2 and 3 on p. 285].

Solely because they have to be interchangeable, all sorts of accidents can happen in the interval. We will encounter these accidents in various forms. I simply wish to point out to you today the elements of the deficiency that is always to be found in hysterics.

Take the Dora case.

In her we see this beyond-the-Other's-desire produced in its pure state, and we can point out why a portion of the set of elements is missing. There is absolutely no mention of the mother. You have perhaps observed that she is completely absent from the case. Dora is exposed to her father. It's from her father that she wants love.

It has to be said that before the analysis Dora's life is neatly balanced. Before the drama explodes, she had come up with a very good solution to her problems. Her demand is addressed to her father, and things go very well because her father has a desire, and things go even better because this desire is an unsatisfied desire. Dora, as Freud does not hide from us, knows full well that her father is impotent and that his desire for Frau K. is a barred desire.

But what we also know – Freud only found this out a little too late – is that Frau K. is the object of Dora's desire, because she is the father's desire, the father's barred desire.

Just one thing is necessary to maintain this equilibrium. It's that Dora succeed in achieving somewhere self-identification that stabilizes her and enables her to know where she is, and to do so as a function of her demand which is not satisfied, a demand for love from her father. This works so long as there is a desire, a desire that cannot be satisfied, neither for Dora, nor for her father.

That all depends on the place in which the identification called the ego-ideal takes place. You can see it on the schema [p. 321], normally it's always produced after the line of the Other is crossed twice, at I(Ⱥ). It's the same in the Dora case, except for the fact that the father's desire is represented by the second line. It's after the two lines cross that the hysteric's identification becomes actual, here, in [$ ◊ a]. It's no longer a question of an identification with the father, 369 as is the case when the father is purely and simply the one to whom demand is addressed. Don't forget, there is now a beyond, and this suits the hysteric very well for her satisfaction and equilibrium. The identification is with a little other who is in a position to satisfy her desire. This is Herr K., the husband of Frau K., this Frau K. who is so seductive, charming and radiant, the real object of Dora's desire. Identification occurs here because Dora is an hysteric and because in the case of an hysteric, the process cannot go any further.

Why? Because desire is the sole element to have charge of taking the place of the beyond located by the subject's own position with respect to demand. Because she is an hysteric, she does not know what she is demanding. She simply has the need for this desire to be there beyond, somewhere. But for her to be able to draw upon this desire, complete herself with it and discover her identification, her ideal in it, there needs to be, at least at the level of this beyond-demand, an encounter that enables her to rely upon and locate herself on this line, and this is where Herr K. comes in, where, as is obvious to all observation, she finds her other, in the sense of little a, the other in whom she recognizes herself.

This is the reason that she is extremely interested in him, to the point of initially deceiving her world, that is, to the point where Freud believes that she loves this Herr K. She doesn't love him, but he is indispensable to her, and even much more indispensable to her for desiring Frau K. As I have already pointed out to you a hundred times, that is super-demonstrated by the fact that the circulation completely short-circuits, and that vis-à-vis the little a Dora falls back into a situation of aggressive fury that manifests itself with one huge slap. This is fury towards the other insofar as he is your semblable, and that, being your semblable, he quite simply steals your existence from you. The fatal words that Herr K. says to her – he knows nothing of what he is saying, the poor unfortunate man, and does not know that he is the support of Dora's identification – namely, that his wife means nothing to him, are precisely what Dora cannot tolerate. She cannot tolerate it. Why?

One says, and with very good reason, except that it's incomplete, that Dora is manifestly structured in a homosexual way, inasmuch as any hysteric can be. After what Herr K. says to her, normally she should be very pleased. Not at all. This is precisely what triggers her fury, because at that moment her beautiful hysterical construction of identification with the mask, with the insignias of the Other – namely with the abundant masculine insignias that Herr K., and not her father, presents her with – collapses. She then simply falls back onto 370 the demand, onto the claim for love from her father, and she enters into a quasi-paranoid state when she much more objectively thinks of herself as what she effectively is for her father, namely an object of exchange, someone to amuse Herr K., while he, her father, can take care of Frau K. As vain as this is, that's all it takes, and you get a good sense, in this case, of the very function of desire.

Following Herr K.'s words, our hysteric falls from on high and returns to the entirely primitive level of demand. She simply demands that her father take care of her, that he give her his love – in other words, according to our definition, everything that he does not have.

Today, I've performed the first little exercise at the barre for you in an attempt to show you what the meaning of the relationship between desire and demand is. As you become more and more accustomed to it, you will be able to go much further and with much greater confidence.

THE 'STILL WATERS RUN DEEP' DREAMS

Madame Dolto and the phallus
An hysteric's jacket
The unconditional in the demand for love
The absolute condition of desire
The Other become object of desire

We'll start with recent events which those of you who attended the society's scientific presentation last night will be able to appreciate. Someone spoke about heterosexual relationships. This is exactly what I, too, am trying to talk about.

From the point of view that was presented to us, a heterosexual relationship proves to be essentially formative. It was, in short, a primary given in the evolving tension between parents and child. From another perspective, which is our point of departure, this is precisely what is in question – is the heterosexual relationship between human beings something simple?

The truth of the matter is that if we hold fast to primary experience, it seems that it is not. If it were simple, it should constitute a series of harmonious islands within the human world, at least for those who had managed to clear away the worst of the undergrowth. It doesn't seem that up till now we can consider that analysts – but, after all, do we need to invoke analysts on the matter? – speak with a single voice and say that, even when it has come to completion, the heterosexual relationship presents itself to man as anything other than unstable, since the least one can say is precisely that the entire problem with it revolves around this. Take for example Balint's writings, which are quite focused on this, since even the title of his collection is Genital Love – which attests to the existence of a completely ultimate Spaltung and the juxtaposition of the current of desire and the current of tenderness. The entire problem of the heterosexual relationship is constructed around this juxtaposition. 372

The remarks I have just been making detract none of the interest from what was said last night, far from it – even if only for the terms of reference that were used and, for example, the conscious and aesthetic valorization of the sexual organ, to use the speaker's own terms, which from her perspective constitute the fundamental stage of the Oedipus complex. As Madame Dolto was saying, the sexual organ, its symbol, presents itself as a beautiful and good form. The sexual organ is beautiful, she added. It's a question, obviously, of a remark coming from the speaker's perspective, and it is clearly flattering for those who possess this male organ.

Nevertheless, this doesn't seem to be a given that we can embrace in any univocal manner, even if merely by reference to the reservations of one of the people who intervened, authoritatively, on the subject, giving us what one can call ethnological observations. Primitive peoples, good old primitive peoples, have always been a reference point for anthropologists, but it doesn't seem, if the truth be known, that any of the earliest data – if primitive people were in fact the earliest – about the beautiful and good form of the phallus is to be found there either.

If you refer to these documents as a whole – I'm not talking about learned documents, those things that are devised in the ethnographer's study, but about testimonials of the experience of those ethnographers who have been in the field, amongst the said primitives, good or bad – it seems that it is truly a basis and a principle of the relations between the sexes, even in the most backward tribes, that the phallus's erection at least be hidden. It's striking to note that even in tribes that possess only the most primitive forms of clothing, the existence of something that is used precisely to hide the phallus, a penis sheath for example, is the one remaining remnant of clothing.

Also, quite a large number of ethnographers have recorded the sort of irritation, as if with a truly primary response, that the persons of female sex experience in the presence of manifestations of an erection of the phallus. There are the very rare cases where there is no clothing at all, amongst the Nambikwara for example, whom as you know our friend Lévi-Strauss visited on several occasions and has spoken about at length. On the question that I put to him in this connection, Lévi-Strauss told me, repeating what he says in his book, Tristes Tropiques, that he never observed an erection in the presence of the group. Sexual relations occur without any special 373 concealment, a few feet away from the group, during the evening round the campfire, but an erection, either during the day or at that time, doesn't occur in public. This isn't entirely irrelevant to our subject.

There is the notion of the beautiful-and-good form. Situating the meaning of the phallus in such terms seems to arise from a fairly unique natural perspective. On the other hand, I am well aware that there is the beautiful and good form of a woman. It's certainly valued by every element of civilization, but, well, even if only because of the individual variety, it can't be said that we can, in this respect, speak univocally of a beautiful and good form. Let's say, in any case, that this beautiful and good form leaves more room for variation than the other. Undoubtedly, behind every woman there is the silhouetted form of the Venus de Milo or Aphrodite of Cnidus, but ultimately it's not always with unambiguously favourable results. Daumier has been much criticized for having given the Greek gods the rather crumpled forms of the bourgeois men and women of his time. He was criticized for it as if it were a sacrilege. This is precisely the point at which the problem I am indicating is situated – if it is obviously so deplorable to humanize gods, it is undoubtedly because humans are not always so easily deified.

In short, if what's necessary for the perpetuation of the human race lies in the hands of this beautiful and good form, the overall indication is that we make do with middling requirements, which the term 'beautiful and good form' perhaps doesn't tend to evoke. It at least remains fairly puzzling.

In fact, everything remarkable and appropriate that has been said to emphasize this beautiful and good form of the phallus is precisely what is being called into question here. This doesn't of course eliminate its typical prevalence as a form. The discourse that I am maintaining here, inasmuch as it is founded on and directly continues both Freud's own discourse and his experience, is intended to give a different idea of the meaning of the phallus.

The phallus is not a form. It doesn't have the form of an object, insofar as a form remains a captivating and fascinating form – at least not in one sense, for the problem remains intact in the other. The attraction between the sexes is something infinitely more complex than an imaginary attraction, as the entire economy of analytic doctrine shows us. As for us, we are committed to following the path that gives the solution to the problem in accordance with this formula, which itself is none other than a statement that needs to be developed if it is to be understood – the phallus is neither a fantasy, nor an image, nor an object, not even a part object, not even an internal one. It's a signifier. It's solely the fact that it is a signifier that makes it possible to conceptualize and articulate the diverse functions it assumes at different levels of the intersexual encounter. 374

A signifier. It's not enough to say it's a signifier. Which signifier? It's the signifier of desire. That of course throws up the further question – what does 'signifier of desire' mean? It's certain that the scope of this affirmation implies that first we say what desire is.

Desire isn't something self-evident in the function it fulfils in our experience. It's not simply intersexual appetite, intersexual attraction or the sexual instinct. It's also well understood that this notion doesn't eliminate the existence of tendencies that are more or less accentuated, that vary from one individual to the next, and have the primary characteristic of expressing – in general let's say – greater or less power in each individual with respect to sexual union. This in no way resolves the question of the constitution of desire as we locate it in this or that individual, whether neurotic or not. The constitution of his desire is something other than whatever sexual potency he carries around with him.

They are some remarks to put us back on track after the sense of disorientation that the point of view perhaps gave us last night – we will now quietly return to Freud's text.

Today isn't the first time I have made this remark, but I will convey it to you today – one is filled with awe at the existence of this text, Die Traumdeutung. One is filled with awe at it as if it were a kind of miracle, because it is actually not too much to say that it can be read as thought in motion. But it's a lot more than this.

At times things are brought in that correspond to a composition that is overdetermined – here the word would apply well – on several levels. Merely by taking this text in the way I said I would last time, that is, by selecting the first dreams, one can see that the significance of what comes first goes well beyond the reasons put forward for placing them first in the chapters. For example, it's regarding the day's residues, insofar as they enter into account in the determinism of dreams, that a number of the initial dreams are presented there, like the one I commented on last time, the dream by the butcher's beautiful wife, as I call it.

As you saw, I chose it in order to examine the question of demand and desire. It wasn't I who put demand and desire in the dream, they're there. And Freud didn't put them there, he read them in it. He saw that the patient has a need to create an unsatisfied desire 375 for herself, it's he who tells us. Of course, when Freud wrote Die Traumdeutung, he wasn't there to give this name along with a little lamp. But if he approached and composed things in this order, it's because he was urged on by a concern that may well go beyond the divisions of the chapters. Effectively, this dream presents a characteristic that especially offers an introduction to the problem that is fundamental to the perspective that I am trying to promote here, that of desire.

As to demand, it is hardly necessary to say that it, too, is everywhere. The reason the dream occurred is that a friend asked the patient if she could come to dinner at her place. In the dream itself, the request is there in the clearest of forms. The patient knows that everything was closed that day and that she was unable to make up for her inadequate provisions and offer the dinner as she should, and then she requests, in the clearest and most isolated manner in which one could present a request, since she makes it over the telephone, which at the time – this text is in the first edition – was not in widespread use. The telephone is actually there with its full symbolic power.

Let's go on a bit further. What are the first dreams that we encounter in the chapter on the 'Material and Sources of Dreams'?

The first dream we encounter is the dream of the botanical monograph, which is one of Freud's own. I am going to leave that one – not that it doesn't contribute exactly what we can expect today as I try to show you how the phallic signifier's relations with desire function, but simply because it's one of Freud's dreams, and so it would take a little bit longer and it would be a little bit more complicated to show you this. I will do it later if I have the time, for it is absolutely clear and structured exactly along the lines of the little schema I started drawing for you in relation to the hysteric's desire. But Freud is not purely and simply an hysteric. If he has the relation to hysteria that every relationship with desire comprises, it's in a slightly more elaborate manner.

We will therefore skip the dream of the botanical monograph and come to the patient who, as Freud tells us, is an hysteric. We are therefore returning to the hysteric's desire.

> An intelligent and cultivated young woman, reserved and undemonstrative in her behaviour, reported as follows: I dreamt that I arrived too late at the market and could get nothing either from the butcher or from the woman who sells vegetables. An innocent dream, no doubt; but dreams are not as simple as that, so I asked to be told it in greater detail. She thereupon gave me the following account. She dreamt she was going to the market with her cook, who was carrying the basket. After she had asked for something, the butcher said to her: 'That's not obtainable any longer', and offered her something else, adding 'This is good too.' She rejected it and went on to the woman who sells vegetables, who tried to get her to buy a peculiar vegetable that was tied up in bundles but was of a black colour. She said: 'I don't recognize that; I won't take it.' [SE 4: 183] 376

Freud's commentary is essential here, since we weren't the ones who analysed this patient. At the time Die Traumdeutung appeared, it was more or less as if the first work on atomic theory had appeared without any kind of link with the physics that preceded it. Besides, the book was greeted with almost total silence.

It is, then, on the first pages of this book that, when speaking of the presence of recent and indifferent material in dreams, Freud calmly laid out for his readers the following comments. 'She had actually gone to the market too late and had got nothing.' An attempt to attach this dream to the events of the day. 'One is tempted to say: the butcher's shop was already closed.' Here he isn't saying that he is reporting the words of the patient, he is putting himself forward by saying that that is what the utterance obviously is. 'But, stop – Doch halt. Was not that, or rather its opposite, a vulgar description of a certain sort of slovenliness in a man's dress?' It seems in effect that in the language of the Viennese, at least in familiar terms, it's customary to say to someone who has forgotten to button up his pants, 'Your butcher's shop, the door of your butcher's shop, is open – Du hast deine Fleischbank offen.' As Freud recognizes. 'However, the dreamer herself did not use the phrase.' And he adds, 'She may have perhaps avoided using it' [SE 4: 183].

That said, let's go on a little further. 'When anything in a dream has the character of direct speech, that is, when it is said or heard and not merely thought (and it is easy as a rule to make the distinction with certainty).' It's therefore a question of words inscribed in a dream as if written on a banner. One doesn't escape the implications of the situation. It's something that can be easily distinguished, Freud tells us – namely, the factor of language, which he invites us always to take as a factor that has its own value. 'It is derived from something actually spoken in waking life – though, to be sure, this something is merely treated as raw material and may be cut up and slightly altered and, more especially, divorced from its content. In carrying out an interpretation, one method is to start from spoken phrases of this kind. What, then, was the origin of the butcher's remark, 'That's not obtainable any longer'?'

This sentence, 'Das is nicht mehr zu haben', is recalled by Freud at the time he is writing the case of the Wolf Man, as an indication of the fact that for a long time he has been interested in the difficulty involved in reconstructing what is pre-amnesic in the subject's life 377 prior to infantile amnesia. Indeed, it is in relation to this that he said that to the patient.

> A few days earlier I had explained to the patient that the earliest experiences of childhood were 'not obtainable any longer as such', but were replaced in analysis by 'transferences' and dreams. So I was the butcher and she was rejecting these transferences into the present of old habits of thinking and feeling. What, again, was the origin of her own remark in the dream, 'I don't recognize that; I won't take it'? 'Das kenne ich nicht, das nehme ich nicht.' For the purposes of the analysis this had to be divided up. 'I don't recognize that' was something she had said the day before to her cook, with whom she had had a dispute; but at the time she had gone on: 'Benehmen Sie sich anständig', 'Behave yourself properly!' [SE 4: 184]

As Freud says, what has been retained in the dream is precisely the element of language, the part that has no signification, 'Das kenne ich nicht', whereas the censor has moved the second sentence over onto the servant. What therefore appears in the dream, 'Das kenne ich nicht, das nehme ich nicht', gives meaning to what has been retained from 'Das kenne ich nicht, Benehmen Sie sich anständig.'

Freud continues:

> At this point there had clearly been a displacement. Of the two phrases that she had used in the dispute with her cook, she had chosen the insignificant one for inclusion in the dream. But it was only the repressed one, 'Behave yourself properly!' that fitted in with the rest of the content of the dream: those would have been the appropriate words to use if someone had ventured to make improper suggestions and had forgotten 'to close his meat-shop'.
> The allusions underlying the incident with the vegetable-seller were a further confirmation that our interpretation was on the right track. A vegetable that is sold tied up in bundles (lengthways, as the patient added afterwards) and is also black, could only be a dream-combination of asparagus and black (Spanish) radishes. No knowledgeable person of either sex will ask for an interpretation of asparagus. But the other vegetable – Schwarzer Rettig ['black radish'] – can be > taken as an exclamation – 'Schwarzer, rett' dich!' ['Blacky! Be off!'] –; and accordingly it too seems to hint at the same sexual topic which we suspected at the very beginning, when we felt inclined to introduce the phrase about the meat-shop being closed into the original account of the dream. We need not enquire now into the full meaning of the dream. So much is quite clear: it had a meaning and that meaning was far from innocent. [SE 4: 184–5]

I apologize if this might have seemed a bit long. I would simply like to refocus things on this little dream, now that we know so much and have a tendency to read a little too quickly.

Here, we find represented in the clearest of manners another 378 example of the hysteric's relationship to desire as such, the place of which, as I indicated last time, the hysteric has a need for in her dreams and symptoms – a need for its place to be marked somewhere. But here something else is in question, namely, the place of the phallus signifier.

Let's mix our theoretical discourse in with references to dreams so as to vary things a bit and not to lose our attention. Three other dreams by the same patient are subsequently mentioned, and we will make use of them at the appropriate moment. Let us pause for a second over what needs to be stressed.

Like the other day, the question is what place to give desire. But this time, this place isn't marked in the field external to the subject. It's not about desire, insofar as the subject rejects it for herself beyond demand and only accepts it in the dream as the Other's desire, who, here, is her friend. It's about desire insofar as it is supported, by hypothesis, by the phallus signifier. Let's see what function the signifier plays in this case.

As you can see, Freud introduces the phallus signifier here without hesitation or ambiguity. The only element that he has not stressed as such in his analysis, since he has to leave something for us to do, is the following, and it is altogether striking. The entire ambiguity of the subject's behaviour in relation to the phallus resides in this dilemma, which is that the subject may either have or be this signifier.

The reason that this dilemma arises is that the phallus isn't the object, but the signifier, of desire. The dilemma is absolutely essential. It lies at the heart of all the shifts, transmutations and sleights of hand, I would say, of the castration complex.

Why does the phallus come into this dream? From this perspective, I think that it's not at all overstepping the mark to say that the phallus is, as such, actualized in this hysteric's dream around

Freud's sentence, 'Das ist nicht mehr zu haben', that is, 'That's not obtainable any longer.'

I obtained confirmation about the absolute use of the verb 'avoir', to have, as in the linguistic usage that has us say, 'l'avoir', to have it, or, even better, 'en avoir ou pas', to have some or not, which also has significance in German. It's a question here in this sentence of the phallus insofar as it emerges as the object that is lacking.

Who is it that lacks the object? This is, of course, what it would be good to know, but nothing is more uncertain than that it is purely and simply the object that the biological subject lacks. Let's say, 379 first, that it presents itself in signifying terms as linked to the sentence that expresses the fact that it is what is no longer obtainable – Das ist nicht mehr zu haben. This isn't an experience of frustration. It's a signification, a signifying articulation of the object lack, as such.

This of course tallies with the notion that I am placing in the foreground, that here the phallus is the signifier insofar as – who doesn't have it? – insofar as the Other doesn't have it. With the phallus it is effectively a matter of something that is articulated on the plane of language, and which therefore is located as such on the plane of the Other. It's the signifier of desire insofar as desire is articulated as the Other's desire. I will return to this presently.

We'll now take the second dream by the same patient. It's a dream that is purportedly innocent.

> Her husband asked her: 'Don't you think we ought to have the piano tuned?' And she replied: 'It's not worth while ['Es lohnt nicht' – which means something like, 'it's not worth it']; the hammers need reconditioning in any case.'

Freud comments in these terms:

> This was the repetition of a real event of the previous day . . .. But what was the explanation of her dreaming it? But why does she dream about it? She told me that the piano was a disgusting old box, that it made an ugly noise, that it had been in her husband's possession before their marriage, and so on.

In a footnote, he says, 'This last was a substitute for the opposite idea [that is that her husband did not have it before their marriage], as the course of the analysis will make clear.'

> 'It's not worth while.' These were derived from a visit she had paid the day before to a woman friend. She had been invited to take off her jacket, but had refused with the words: 'Thank you, but it's not worth while; I can only stop a minute. As she was telling me this, I recollected that during the previous day's analysis she had suddenly caught hold of her jacket, one of her buttons having come undone. Thus it was as though she were saying: 'Please don't look; it's not worth while.' In the same way the 'box' ['Kasten'] was a substitute for a chest ['Brustkasten']; and the interpretation of the dream led us back at once to the time of her physical development at puberty, when she had begun to be dissatisfied by her figure. We can hardly doubt that it led back to still earlier times, if we take the word 'disgusting' into account and the 'ugly noise', and if we remember how often – both in doubles entendres and in dreams – the lesser hemispheres of a woman's body are used, whether as contrasts or as substitutes, for the larger ones. [SE 4: 185–6]

We find ourselves here on the other side of the question. If the phallus is the signifier of desire, the Other's desire, and the problem that presents itself to the subject from the very first step of the dialectic of desire, then the other side is this – a question of being or not being the phallus.

Let's put all our faith in this function as a signifier that we are granting the phallus, and let's say the following – just as 'one cannot be and have been', so too 'one cannot be and not be'. If it is necessary that what one is not is what one is, what remains is not to be what one is, that is, what remains is to reject what one is in appear- 380 ance, which is very precisely the woman's position in hysteria. As a woman, she makes a mask of herself. She makes a mask of herself precisely so that, behind this mask, she can be the phallus. The entire behaviour of hysterics manifests itself in the gesture of this hand placed on her button – the meaning of which Freud's eye accustomed us to see a long, long time ago – accompanied by this sentence, 'It's not worthwhile.' Why isn't it worthwhile? Because there is, of course, no question of looking further, because further on is where the phallus should be. But it's truly not worthwhile looking, 'Es lohnt nicht', because you won't find it there.

For the hysteric, it is a matter of seeing and knowing, as Freud immediately gives us in a note addressed, 'Für Wissbegierige' ['For anyone curious to know'], which is translated into French as, 'A ceux qui voudraient l'approfondir', 'For anyone who would like to go into it in depth'. More rigorously, 'To lovers of knowledge'.

This brings us to the heart of what I have perhaps already referred to with this term – borrowed from a morality that despite everything bears the imprint of a human experience that is perhaps richer than a lot of others, moral theology – the Cupido sciendi [the curiosity or desire to know]. We can choose this term for translating 'le désir', although the equivalences between languages always raise delicate questions. With respect to desire, I have already obtained 'Begierde' ['desire'] from my German-speaking friends, which one finds in Hegel, but which some find too animal. It's funny that Hegel has employed it for the master–slave, a theme which isn't overly imbued with animality.

'If anyone is curious to know,' Freud says in this footnote, 'I may add that the dream concealed a phantasy of my behaving in an improper and sexually provocative manner, and of the patient putting up a defence against my conduct' [SE 4: 185fn]. Being provocative towards an hysteric is liable to produce the desire, but beyond what is known as a defence. That is, it indicates the place – beyond appearance, beyond the mask – of something that is presented to desire, something which, of course, it can't be offered access to, since it is something that is presented behind the veil but which can't be found there either. It's not worthwhile unbuttoning my jacket, because you will not find the phallus there, but if I place my hand on my jacket, it is so that you desire, inside my blouse, the phallus, which is the signifier of desire.

These remarks lead me to think about how to define this desire in a fully rigorous way, in such a way as to give you a good sense of what we are talking about.

Someone I was in conversation with called my little interwoven lines, the ones I have been refining for you over time, a little Calder mobile. It's quite a well-chosen expression, to my mind. The issue is not to stop there but to try to spell out what we mean by desire as such.

In this dialectic, we locate desire as what on this little mobile is located beyond demand. Why does there need to be anything beyond demand? There needs to be something beyond demand, inasmuch as, for the requirements of articulation, demand diverts, changes and transposes need. Therefore, there is the possibility of a residue.

Insofar as man is caught in the signifying dialectic, there is something that doesn't work – whatever optimistic people think when they point to all the positive things that take place between children and their parents, in terms of locating the other sex. Now this is precisely the level at which we come in.

There is, then, a residue. What form does it take? What form does it take, necessarily? It's now no longer a question of sexual desire, and we shall see why later, why it must come to this place. But we are considering the general relationship between a man's needs and signifiers, and we find ourselves faced with the following question. Is there anything that restores this margin of deviation marked by the impact of signifiers on needs? And in what form does that beyond appear, if indeed it appears at all? Experience proves that it does appear. And it's what we call desire. This is how we can formulate one possible form of its appearance.

The manner in which desire in the human subject must manifest itself depends on what is determined by the dialectic of demand. If demand has a particular effect on needs, it also has its own characteristics. I have already formulated the characteristics belonging to it. Demand, merely by virtue of being articulated as a demand, even when it isn't a demand for the Other, explicitly establishes the Other as absent or present, and as giving or not giving this presence. That is, demand is fundamentally a demand for love – a demand for what is nothing, no particular satisfaction, a demand for what the subject brings purely and simply by responding to the demand.

This is where the originality of introducing the symbolic in the 382 form of demand shows its originality. The originality of the introduction of demand in comparison with need is located in what is unconditioned in demand, namely, that demands are made against a background of the demand for love.

If the introduction of demand carries some loss with it, in whatever form, in relation to need, does what is thereby lost have to end up beyond demand? It's clear that if it has to end up beyond demand, that is, beyond the distortion introduced by the dimension of demand, it's inasmuch as we must rediscover in this beyond something where the Other loses its predominance, and where need, insofar as it stems from the subject, occupies the primary place.

However, since need has already passed through the filter of demand onto the plane of the unconditioned, it is only in the name of a second negation, as it were, that we encounter there, beyond, the margin that was lost in demand. What we find in this beyond is precisely the feature of absolute condition that is present in desire as such.

This feature is, of course, borrowed from need. How could we form desires, if it were not by borrowing the raw materials from our needs? But that passes to a state that isn't one of unconditionality, since it involves something borrowed from a particular need, but one of absolute condition, one that is without measure and incommensurate with the need for an object of any kind. This condition can be deemed absolute for the precise reason that it abolishes the dimension of the Other, that it's a requirement where the Other doesn't have to respond yes or no. This is the fundamental characteristic of human desire as such.

Every desire in its pure state is something that, uprooted from the soil of needs, assumes the form of an absolute condition in relation to the Other. It's the margin or result of the subtraction, as it were, of the requirements of need from the demand for love. Conversely, desire presents itself as what, in the demand for love, rebels against being reduced to a need, because in reality it satisfies nothing other than itself, that is, desire as an absolute condition.

This is the reason that sexual desire will come to that place, insofar as it presents itself, in relation to the subject or the individual, as essentially problematic and on the two planes of need and the demand for love.

On the plane of need, Freud wasn't the first to emphasize this – ever since the world has been the world, people have wondered how 383 the human being, who has the property of recognizing what is to his advantage, can bear and accept this sexual need which undeniably pushes him to aberrant extremes that correspond to no immediately rationalizable need, and which introduces, let's say, what is called the dialectic of the species into the individual. Thus, by its very nature, sexual need already presents itself as problematic in the subject, as we define him – even if philosophers have articulated this differently – that is, as someone who is able to rationalize his needs and articulate them in terms of equivalences, that is, in terms of signifiers.

Moreover, with respect to the demand for love, this sexual need will become desire, specifically, since it can only place itself at the level of desire as we have just defined it. Sexual desire presents itself in a problematic manner from the perspective of the demand for love, whatever one says, whatever holy water one tries to cover it with in the name of 'oblation'. With respect to what in all languages is called 'stating one's demands', the question of desire is problematic, inasmuch as – in order to express things in the most common form of language, which here is revealing – in whatever manner demand is formulated, what takes shape is that the Other comes into play in the form of the instrument of desire as soon as sexual desire is in question.

It's for this reason that sexual desire, insofar as it is a question, is placed at the level of desire. Insofar as it is a question, it can't really be articulated. There are really no words for it – hear it from the horse's mouth, since it perhaps won't do any harm for me to say that not everything is reducible to language. I have always said so, of course, but I haven't been heard. I repeat it – there are no words to express something, something that has a name, which is desire.

For expressing desire, as popular wisdom knows very well, there are only sweet nothings.

The question of the signifier of desire, then, arises as such. What it is expressed by isn't just any ordinary signifier. It's effectively something that borrows from prevailing forms of thrust or vital flux, but it is still as a signifier that it is less caught up in the dialectic, along with what the mortification that passing into the register of signifiers always comprises for anything that attains the dimension of signifiers.

Here, the ambiguous mortification presents itself in the form of a veil, one that we see reproduced every day in the form of the hysteric's jacket. This is the fundamental position of woman in relation to man where desire is concerned, namely that above all don't take 384 a look there, inside her jacket, because of course there is nothing there, there is nothing but the signifier. But it is nothing other than the signifier of desire.

Behind this veil, there is, or there is not, something that must not be shown, and this is why the demon I was talking about concerning the unveiling of the phallus in the sacred Mysteries is called the demon of shame. 'Shame' has a different meaning and significance in man and woman, whatever its origin, whether it is the horror of it that a woman has, or something that quite naturally arises from the oh-so delicate souls of men.

I alluded to the veil that quite often covers the phallus in man. It's exactly the same thing that normally covers a woman's being almost entirely, inasmuch as what is precisely there lying behind, and which is veiled, is the signifier phallus. What Freud called, concerning the female sex, Abscheu, the horror that corresponds to absence as such, the Medusa, is connected with the unveiling that would only show nothing, that is, the absence of what is unveiled.

We are told that sexual progress or maturation would entail passing from a partial object to a total object. What I have managed to introduce on the perspective that I am giving you on the play between the subject of desire and the signifier of desire, and which is far from having been exhausted, already suffices to completely reverse notions like this that obscure the whole dialectic about approaching the other in the sexual relation. There is, here, a real camouflage or evasion. In coming to the place of desire, the other does not in any way become the total object, but on the contrary the problem is that the other totally becomes an object as instrument of desire. The problem is maintaining the two positions compatible with one another.

There is, on the one hand, the position of the Other as Other, as the locus of speech, to whom demand is addressed and whose radical irreducibility manifests itself in the fact that it can give love, that is, something that is all the more totally gratuitous because there is no support for love, since, as I have been telling you, to give one's love is to give nothing of what one has, for it's precisely insofar as one doesn't have it that love is at issue. But there is discordance between what there is that is absolute in the subjectivity of the Other who gives or doesn't give love and the fact that, to gain access to the Other as object of desire, it is necessary for it totally to become an object. It's in this vertiginous or nauseous, to call it by its name, gap that the difficulty of accessing sexual desire is located.

385 In the Studies on Hysteria, Breuer connects the manifestation of hysterical symptoms in the form of nausea and disgust to the phenomena of dizziness. He refers to the work of Mach on motor sensations, showing, with an extraordinary intuition, that the essential source of this labyrinthine phenomenon, in which we see this series, dizziness, nausea, disgust, appear, lies in the discordance between optical sensations and motor sensations [SE 2: 210–11].

I have in fact already observed in more than one person, to the point where the analysis of such a thing is possible, the sort of short-circuit that is established between the phallus signifier, in the form of which the perception of the Other in desire is actualized, and what, at that moment, can only appear empty to the subject, namely, the place that the organ would normally occupy, I mean between the legs, and which is at that moment evoked only as a place. I have ten observations I could give you on this point, in all sorts of forms, whether totally clear and raw or variously symbolic, with the subject stating it clearly, nevertheless – it's insofar as the Other as object of desire is perceived as the phallus and insofar as, as such, he is perceived as a lack at the place of his own phallus, that the subject experiences something that resembles a very curious form of dizziness. Someone has even gone so far as to compare it to a kind of metaphysical dizziness experienced in other circumstances, the rarest of circumstances, with respect to the notion of being itself, insofar as it lies subjacent to everything that is.

I will end there today. We will come back to the dialectic of being and having in the hysteric, and we will progress further when we see what point this takes us to in the obsessional.

I will tell you this straightaway, and you must feel it anyway – this isn't unconnected to an entire dialectic, a different one, an imaginary one, for which a theory has not only been proposed to you, but patients have been more or less forced to swallow it with a particular technique concerning obsessional neurosis, and where the phallus as imaginary element plays the dominant role therein.

We shall see what theoretical and technical rectifications we can contribute by no longer regarding the phallus as an image or a fantasy, but as a signifier.

THE OTHER'S DESIRE

Three articles by Maurice Bouvet

The third 'still waters run deep' dream
The future of the obsessional's fixed ideas
The supports of desire

Fonderung : Demand Begehren : Desire Bedürfnis : Need	Wunsch : The dream's desire

Our trajectory, in which the theme of the phallus plays an essential role, has brought us to the point of grasping more fully what in analysis is advanced concerning the notion of object.

We must both centre our attention on the effective function that the object relation plays in contemporary analytic practice, the way it's used and the services that that renders, and at the same time attempt to spell out more fully what we have specified in speaking about the phallus.

As to the first part of this programme, we can refer to an article that with time has come to assume historical value, published in 1953 in the Revue Française de Psychanalyse, authored by Maurice Bouvet and on 'Le moi dans la névrose obsessionelle' ['The Ego in Obsessional Neurosis']. In reality, it's solely about object relations in the obsessional, and something to explore would be why the author gave it this unsuitable title, when he actually says nothing about the ego in obsessional neurosis, except – it's weak, it's strong.

The author has, at the end of the day, adopted an attitude of prudence on this matter that one can only praise.

I will mention two earlier articles by the same author. One, dated 388
December 1948, appeared in 1950 in the same journal under the title 'Incidences thérapeutiques de la prise de conscience de l'envie du pénis dans la névrose obsessionnelle féminine' ['Therapeutic Effects of Becoming Aware of Penis Envy in Obsessional Neurosis in Women']. The freshness of this first approach to the function of the penis in obsessional neurosis gives this article its value. It enables one to gauge how much things have gone rather downhill since, for this still new experience provides an interesting reflection on the question. The other was published in the July–September 1948 issue, 'Importance de l'aspect homosexuel du transfert dans quatre cas de névrose obsessionnelle masculine' ['Importance of the Homosexual Aspect of the Transference in Four Cases of Obsessional Neurosis in Men'].

These are the three things to read, since there are not all that many articles written in French on the topic. They show reasonably well the level that things are now at on these problems. Moreover, rereading them can't fail to create an overall impression that will provide a basis for what we can manage to explore, or so it seems to me, concerning the exact articulation of the issue, and will enable us to situate the value and significance of a therapeutic approach centred thereon. When one sees object relations being articulated in synoptic tables enabling one to follow the object's progressive constitution, one realizes that these are, at least in part, false windows. I do not believe that either the genital object or the pre-genital object has any other significance here than to embellish the beauty of the said synoptic tables.

What gives the object relation its value and is its pivot, what introduced the notion of object into the analytic dialectic, is above all what is known as the part object. The term is taken from Abraham's vocabulary, in a manner that isn't quite exact, since what the latter spoke of was the partial love for the object, and this shift in meaning is itself already significant. It requires no great effort to identify the part object purely and simply with this phallus we are talking about – and must all the more readily talk about given that we have endowed it with such significance, which removes any discomfort we might have over treating it as a privileged object. We know that it deserves this privilege as a signifier. It's because of their extraordinary discomfort at giving such privilege to a particular organ that authors have ended up not mentioning it at all, whereas it's in virtually every analysis.

If you reread these articles, you will see that there is one enormous fact, centre stage, across every page, which is that the phallus is taken – not only by the psychoanalyst in question, but by all those who listened to him – at the level of fantasy. From the author's 389 perspective, the treatment for obsessional neurosis entirely revolves around the incorporation or imaginary introjection of this phallus that appears in the analytic dialogue in the form of a phallus attributed to the analyst and to which all fantasies refer.

There are, supposedly, two phases. In the first, fantasies of incorporation and devoration of this fantasmatic phallus have a clearly aggressive and sadistic character at the same time as it's experienced as horrible and dangerous. These fantasies have the value of being capable of revealing the subject's position in relation to the object constitutive of its stage, which, in this instance, is that of the second phase of the anal-sadistic stage, marked by fundamental tendencies to destroy the object. From there, one moves to a second phase in which one begins to respect the object's autonomy in an at least partial form.

The entire dialectic of the moment – the subjective moment, I would say here – at which obsessional neurosis is situated is, it's claimed, suspended at the point of maintaining a certain form of the part object. A world can be established around this object – a world that isn't completely destined to be fundamentally destroyed by the stage immediately subjacent to the precarious equilibrium which the subject has achieved. The obsessional is effectively presented as always ready to lapse into destruction of the world, since, from the perspective from which the author expresses himself, one also thinks in terms of the subject's relationship to his environment. It is through maintaining the part object – maintenance that requires an entire scaffolding, which is precisely what constitutes obsessional neurosis – that the subject is said to avoid lapsing into a permanently threatening psychosis. This is quite clearly what the author considers to be the very basis of the problem.

Still, one can't fail to object that whatever the obsessional's parapsychotic symptoms – depersonalization, for example, disturbances of the ego and feelings of estrangement and the darkening of the world, all feelings obviously touching on mood [couleur], even perhaps on the structure of the ego – the cases of transition from obsession to psychosis, while they have always existed, have always been extremely rare. Authors observed long ago that, on the contrary, there was a sort of incompatibility between the two afflictions. When a real obsessional neurosis is involved, the idea that one runs the risk in analysis of not curing the subject but of seeing him lapse into psychosis is a risk that seems extraordinarily fantasmatic, for it's really the thing that one runs the least risk of. That an obsessional, in the course of an analysis, even subsequent to an unfortunate or even wild therapeutic intervention, lapses into 390 psychosis is very, very, very rare. Personally I've never seen it in my practice, thank God. Nor have I ever had the impression that this was a risk I was running with these patients.

An appraisal like that must betray a little more than a simple lack of discernment in clinical experience. One can assume that the author's concern to assure the coherence of his theory leads him further than he wants. Very probably there is, no doubt, also something that goes even further, and which derives from the author's own particular position when faced with the obsessional. It's not a question of speaking about the countertransference of a particular person, but of the countertransference in a more general sense, where one may consider it as formed by what I often call the analyst's prejudices, in other words, the background of things said or not said against which his discourse is articulated.

This practice is led, then, in the specific therapeutics with obsessional neurosis, to take as its pivot the fantasy of the imaginary incorporation of the phallus, the analyst's phallus. It's a bit difficult to see at what moment, or why, the about-turn occurs, unless it's through what one may suppose is a kind of effect by attrition. It's actually a bit mysterious. We are told there is a moment where, by virtue of the 'working through' or of insistence in the treatment, the incorporation of phallic fantasies seems to have a completely different value to the subject. What appears to have been the incorporation of a dangerous and in some way repudiated object in these fantasies suddenly changes in nature, provoking acceptance and becoming a welcome object, an object that is a source of power – 'source', the word is there, I am not the one creating this metaphor.

Doesn't this introjection, which has become, we are told, conservative, 'have traits in common with religious communion in which one swallows without chewing?' [p. 172] One adds by way of commentary that the 'feelings of happiness' that this fantasy supposedly brings 'comprises no destruction, similar in that respect to the sucking fantasies of Abraham's melancholics' [p. 172].

These traits are not chosen in any tendentious way. We do get the sense that in an analysis conducted in this way something effectively occurs like a kind of ascesis that plays principally on fantasies, no doubt in doses, with barriers, with the brakes on and in stages, with all the precautions that the technique carries, and that it enables the subject of an obsessional neurosis to enter into new relationships with the object. It is more difficult to see what one wants out of it, which the author calls the distance from the object. If I understand well, it's a matter of enabling the subject to get closer to the object and pass through a phase in which this distance is nullified and, 391 no doubt, then recovered – at least, we have to hope so. An object which has all the powers of fear and danger successively concentrated upon itself subsequently becomes the symbol by which a libidinal relation that is considered more normal and described as genital is established.

From our perspective, we remain perhaps a little more strict than the author who congratulates himself on having achieved the aim of having garnered from a patient, after a number of months of treatment, the following declaration – 'I had an extraordinary experience, that of being able to enjoy my husband's happiness, I was extremely moved to observe his joy, and his pleasure was my pleasure' [p. 164].

I ask you to weigh these terms. They are certainly not without value. They describe very well an experience that implies no lifting of the said patient's prior frigidity. The extraordinary experience of being able to enjoy her husband's happiness is something frequently observed, but it still doesn't signify that the patient has in any way attained orgasm. The patient remains, we are told, semi-frigid. This is why one remains a little surprised when the author immediately adds: 'Is this not the best way to characterize adult genital relations?' [p. 164].

The notion of adult genital relations is obviously what gives this entire perspective the character of being a construction of false windows. It's not very clear what 'adult genital relation' means when you examine it closely.

As soon as the author tries to explain himself, he doesn't seem to find either the simplicity or the unity that that seems to imply. 'As to affirming the ego's coherence, not only does it emerge from the disappearance of an obsessional symptomatology and phenomena of depersonalization, but also it translates into the achieving of a sense of freedom of unity which is a new experience for these subjects' [p. 164]. Nor do these optimistic approximations exactly correspond to our experience of what progress and cure really represent in obsessional neurosis.

We clearly see here what kind of mountain, wall or ready-made conception we are dealing with when it's a question of appraising what an obsessional structure is, the manner in which it's lived and the manner in which it evolves. Here we are trying to articulate things in a completely different register. I don't think I am any more complicated than others, and if you can manage to familiarize yourselves with the measures I bring into play here, and count them, you will see that, in the end, there are not that many more things and that this is simply articulated in another less unilinear way.

I am well aware that the desire to have a synoptic table corresponding to or contradicting the one by Mrs Ruth Mack Brunswick 392 lies deep in the heart of many in the audience. We will perhaps get there one day, but before we do it's perhaps best to proceed step by step and start by criticizing the notion of the phallus as a part object whose present use, which involves clear dangers, has to be put in its proper place.

We are trying to articulate this place with the use of this little schema.

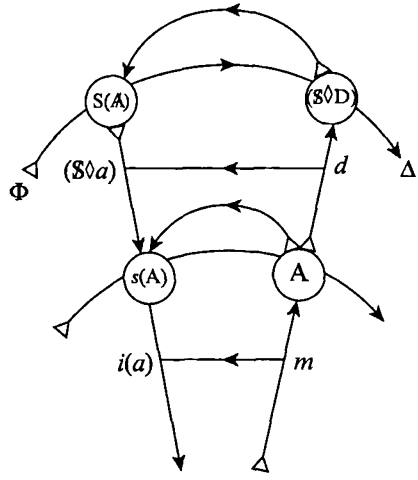
It would be possible to cover the entire schema with signs and equations, but I do not want to give you the impression of something artificial, even though I have tried to reduce things to their essential necessity.



We've already placed here the big A, the big Other, which is where the code is located and receives demands. It's in the passage from A to the point where the message is that the signified of the Other [s(A)] is produced. And then, need, which begins here, finds itself transformed there [at A], and is characterized differently at the different levels. If we take this line [that starts bottom right and ends bottom left] as the line of the realization of the subject, at the end it translates into something that always emerges more or less as an identification, that is, as the remodelling, as the transformation also and ultimately the passage of the subject's need through the defiles of demand.

Now, we know that this isn't sufficient to constitute a satisfactory 393 subject, a subject who holds together over the requisite number, let's say four, of points of support. This is why there is a field beyond demand.

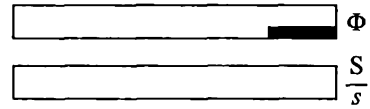
What I have already tried to define by characterizing it as the signifier of desire is initially articulated there, in its topological place, and I have explicitly presented it to you as this Φ. There is, effectively, a necessity linked to this topology, which is that it's in the field lying beyond demand that sexual desire comes to be situated and, at the same time, undergoes the articulation particular to this beyond.

The line on which the drive, the tendency as such, is inscribed and the place assigned to the capital Phi in the beyond-demand coincide here by virtue of the structural necessity that something come and superimpose itself on the set of signifiers to make a signified of it, which is what we usually place below the bar of our formulation, big S over small s. Here the signified is initially a 'to be signified'.



The phallus is this particular signifier which, in the body of signifiers, is specialized for designating the overall effects of the signifier, as such, on the signified. That goes a long way, but there is no way of not going this far to give the phallus its signification. It occupies a privileged place here in what of the signifier will be produced in the beyond of desire – that is, the entire field located beyond the field of demand.

To the extent that this beyond of desire is symbolized, there is the possibility – this is simply articulating the sense of what I am saying – that there is a relationship between the subject and demand as such: [$ ◊ D]. It is quite clear that such a relationship assumes that the subject isn't completely included therein prior to the moment at which this beyond is constituted, even if, by hypothesis, the subject is constituted through being articulated, thanks to the phallus signifier.

On the near side, which is the field of demand, the pure and simple Other creates all the law of the subject's constitution – even if only taken simply at the level of the existence of his body – by virtue of the fact that the mother is a speaking being. The fact that she is a speaking being is absolutely essential, whatever Spitz might think. It's not only the little kisses and cuddles and dabs of eau de cologne that constitute a relationship to the mother. The mother has to speak to him or her, everyone knows that. Not only does she speak to him, undoubtedly, but a mute nurse would not fail to produce certain fairly visible consequences on the infant's development.

Beyond this Other, if something called the beyond of desire is 394 constituted by signifiers, we then have the possibility of the relationship [$ ◊ D]. $ is the subject as such, a less complete, barred subject. That means that a complete human subject is never a pure and simple subject of knowledge, as all of philosophy constructs it, well and truly corresponding to the percipiens of this perceptum that is the world. We know that there is no human subject who is a pure subject of knowledge, save reducing him to a photoelectric cell or an eye or, again, to what in philosophy is called a consciousness. But as we are analysts, we know that there is always a Spaltung, that is, there are always two lines along which he is constituted. This, moreover, is where all our problems of structure originate.

Here on the upper left, what has to be formed? It's precisely what I no longer call the signified of A, s(A), but the signifier of A, S(A), insofar as the subject knows this Spaltung, is structured by it and has already undergone its effects. That means that he is already marked by this signifier-effect that is signified by the phallus signifier. This is, therefore, the A insofar as the phallus is barred within it and brought to the state of a signifier. This Other as castrated is represented here in the place of the message. The terms are inverted in relation to the message at the lower level. Desire's message is that.

Nevertheless, this isn't to say that this message is easy to receive, precisely because of this difficulty of articulating desire, which brings it about that there is an unconscious. In other words, we must imagine, in fact, that what is presented here as on the upper level of the schema is ordinarily on the lower level and not articulated in the subject's consciousness, although well and truly articulated in his unconscious. It's even because it's articulated in his unconscious that it exists. This is the question we are asking here – it's articulable in the subject's consciousness, but up to a point, and the question is knowing precisely what point.

What does the hysteric who we spoke about last time show us? The hysteric, of course, isn't psychoanalysed, otherwise, by hypothesis, she would no longer be an hysteric. The hysteric, as I have said, situates this beyond in the form of a desire that is the Other's desire. I will justify that to you a little bit more later, but for now – because, if one is trying to articulate something, it's quite necessary to start by commenting on it – I will tell you that things happen as follows.

In the first loop, the subject, via the manifestation of need, its tension, crosses the first signifying line of demand, and we can place 395 here, so as to topologize things, the ego's [m] relation to the image of the other, the imaginary little a [i(a)]. Similarly, in the second loop the little d of desire – which in the Other as big Other enables the subject to access this beyond that is to be signified and which is the field we are in the process of exploring, that of his desire – occupies the corresponding place to that of the little m. This simply expresses the fact that the subject will encounter the desire of the Other as such, in the place at which the subject has sought to articulate his desire.

I have been developing this using other terms over a long period of time, but also using the formula that the desire in question, namely desire in its unconscious function, is the Other's desire. This is a formula founded on [analytic] experience and which was verified last time when I spoke about the hysteric with reference to dreams.

Let's pick up this thread.

These are not selected dreams, any more than I give you selected texts of Freud.

If you apply yourselves to reading Freud, as it seems is starting to happen, I can't advise you too much to read him entirely, failing which you run the risk of coming across passages that will perhaps not have been selected, but which will be no less a source of all sorts of errors, even of fausses reconnaissances. You have to see what place such-and-such a text fits into in – I won't say the development of a thought, even though it would be right to say so, but ever since we started talking about thought, the term has become so hackneyed that we never quite know what we are talking about – the development of the research, the efforts of someone who has a certain idea about his magnetic field, as it were, and can only achieve it through a particular detour. Each of these detours has to be judged by the road taken overall.

Thus, I didn't choose the two dreams from last time, the hysteric's dreams, at random. I explained to you how I chose them. I chose the first dream because I came across it after other dreams, and I explained the reasons why I didn't choose them first. I will come back to this. The dream of the botanical monograph can help us understand what there is to demonstrate, but since it's one of Freud's dreams, it's best to explain it later.

First, I will continue the discussion of the hysteric's dream.

The hysteric showed us that what she discovers in the Other's desire is what can be called her point of support – this isn't a term whose use I reserve for myself, and if you read Mr Glover on obsessional neurosis, you will see that he uses exactly the same term to say that when one has withdrawn obsessional neurotics' obsessions from them, they lack their point of support. You'll see that the terms I make use of I have in common with other authors – we are all trying to metaphorize our experience, our little impressions. The hysteric, then, takes her point of support, as I was saying, from a desire that is the Other's desire. It's this creation of a desire beyond demand that is essential, and I think I have articulated it adequately. 396

One might mention here the third dream that I did not have time to explore last time, but I can easily read it out to you now.

> She was putting a candle in a candlestick; but the candle broke so that it wouldn't stand up properly. The girls at her school said she was clumsy; but the mistress said it was not her fault. [SE 4: 186]

This is Freud's comment on the dream: 'The occasion for the dream was a real event. The day before she had actually put a candle into a candlestick, though it did not break.' That is symbolic, and, to be frank, we know what a candle signifies. 'If it won't stand up properly, it means that the man is impotent.' And Freud emphasizes the 'It was not her fault, Es sie nicht ihre Schuld' [SE 4: 186].

'But could a carefully brought-up young woman, who had been screened from the impact of anything ugly, have known that a candle might be put to such use?' [SE 4: 187]. On this point we learn that during a boating trip, she had heard a rather unseemly students' song about the use that the Queen of Sweden made of Apollo's candles, behind closed shutters. She did not understand. Her husband explained the Apollo to her, behind closed shutters of course, and it all re-emerges and suitably frolics around when the occasion arises.

Here we see the phallus appear in a raw state, one might say, and appear isolated, with the status of a part, if not a flying, object. Although we don't know from what moment of this patient's analysis – for she is clearly in analysis – this dream was extracted, the important point is obviously in the 'It was not her fault'. The fact is that it's at the level of the others. It takes place in the presence of all the others, and it's because of the teacher that all the little classmates stop their mocking. The symbol of the Other is evoked, and it corroborates and confirms – this is what I want to get to – what was already present in the dream called the dream by the butcher's beautiful wife, that is, that in hysteria, which is in short a mode of constitution of the subject precisely concerning her sexual desire, the 397 stress is to be placed not only on the dimension of desire insofar as it's opposed to that of demand, but above all on the Other's desire, the position or the place of desire in the Other.

I reminded you how Dora lives up till her hysterical position collapses. She is very much at ease, apart from some minor symptoms, but they are precisely those that constitute her as an hysteric and can be read in the Spaltung of these two lines. We shall return to the overdetermination of symptoms, which is tied to the existence of these two signifying lines. What we saw the other day is that Dora subsists as a subject insofar as she demands love, like every good hysteric, but also insofar as she supports the Other's desire as such – it's she who supports it, it's she who is its support. Everything is going along very well, rolling along as happily as can be, and without anyone having anything to be worried about. Saying that she supports the Other's desire is the most suitable expression for the style of her position and action in relation to her father and to Frau K. As I have been indicating, it's inasmuch as she comes to identify with Herr K. that the whole little construction is possible. In the face of desire, she is the support, in that place, of a certain relationship with the other, the imaginary other, indicated by [$$ \lozenge a$].

Here I've drawn a little square whose four corners are represented by the ego, the image of the other, the now constituted subject's relationship to the imaginary other, and desire. These are the four feet on which a human subject can normally stand, a human subject constituted as human – that is, who is neither more nor less aware of the functioning and strings of the mechanism controlling the marionette of the other in which he sees himself, that is, in which he is capable, or more or less capable, of orientating himself.

The hysterical subject is here, opposite the Other's desire, and, as I showed last time, without things actually going beyond, because, 398 ultimately, one can say that, in the hysteric, the line of return from

[$ ◊ a] back to i(a) is weaker. This, moreover, is the reason that the hysteric has all kinds of difficulties with her imaginary, here represented by the other's image, and that she is susceptible to seeing effects of fragmentation and various forms of disintegration appear in it, which are what she makes use of in her symptoms.

So much for the hysteric. How do we now formulate what occurs in an obsessional structure?

Obsessional neurosis is much more complicated than hysterical neurosis, but not so much more. If one succeeds in pointing out the essential things, one can formulate it, but if one doesn't, which is certainly the case with the author that I was speaking about before, Bouvet, one literally ends up lost in it, one floats around between the sadistic, the anal, the part object, incorporation and distance from the object. One literally doesn't know where to turn. It's exceedingly diverse clinically, as the author shows in his cases – which it seems scarcely possible to bring under one single clinical rubric – that go by the names of Pierre and Paul, without mentioning the Moniques and the Jeannes. In the clinical material in the article, 'Le moi', there are only Pierre and Paul. Now, obviously, Pierre and Paul are completely different subjects from the point of view of the object's features. One can hardly place them under the same heading – which isn't an objection in itself, since for the moment we are not in a position to articulate any other nosological categories ourselves.

It is very striking to see that, ever since we have been treating obsessional neurosis, we are incapable of dismembering it, as would obviously be required of us clinically given the diversity of aspects it presents us with. One recalls the fine words of Plato about the knife of the good cook, the one who knows how to cut at the joints. In the current state of things, no one, and particularly no one who has ever worked with obsessional neurosis, is capable of formulating it correctly. This is quite an indication of some theoretical deficiency.

Let's go back to where we were.

What does the obsessional do in order to consist as a subject? He is like the hysteric, rest assured. Immediately before any serious elaboration – namely, before Freud – a Mr Janet managed to carry out a very curious exercise of geometrical superimposition, a point-by-point correspondence of images, as they say in geometry, of transformation of figures, where the obsessional is thought of, as it were, as a transformed hysteric. The obsessional, too, is orientated towards desire. If it were not a question of desire above all else, there 399 would be no homogeneity in the neuroses.

Except, there you have it. What, in his final formulation, does Freud tell us? What is his final word on obsessional neurosis, which classical theory echoes?

Freud said many things over the course of his career. He initially observed that what one may call the obsessional's primitive traumatism contrasts with the hysteric's primitive traumatism. In the hysteric, there is a sudden seduction, an intrusion or an irruption of the sexual into the subject's life. In the obsessional, inasmuch as the psychic traumatism supports the critique of reconstruction, the subject has, on the contrary, played an active role from which he has derived pleasure.

That was the first approximation. This was followed by all the developments in the Rat Man, namely the appearance of the extreme complexity of his affective relations, and notably the emphasis placed on affective ambivalence, the active–passive, masculine–feminine opposition and, most important thing of all, the love–hate antagonism. You must reread the Rat Man like the Bible, moreover. The case is rich with everything that still remains to be said on obsessional neurosis. It's a topic for study.

Where did Freud ultimately end up, in his final metapsychological formulation? Clinical experiences and metapsychological developments brought aggressive tendencies to light, which brought him to draw the distinction between life instincts and death instincts that has not stopped tormenting analysts since. According to Freud, in the obsessional there is a defusion of the early intrications of life instincts and death instincts. The detachment as such of destructive tendencies took place at too early a stage in him for it not to have marked all his subsequent development and installation in his particular subjectivity.

How is this to be inserted into the dialectic that I am presenting to you? Much more immediately, concretely and perceptibly. If these terms 'demand' and 'desire' begin to find their logic in your head, you will find a daily use for them, at least in your analytic practice. On a daily basis you will be able to use them before they wear out, but you will always come back to asking yourselves whether it's a question of desire and demand or desire or demand.

What does what I have just gone over for you concerning the instincts of destruction mean? The latter manifest themselves in clinical experience, which at first we have to take at the common 400 and ordinary level of what we know about obsessionals – not even those that we analyse, but those whom, simply as informed psychologists, we see living and breathing and on whose behaviour we are capable of assessing the effect of neurosis. It is quite clear that the obsessional has a tendency to destroy his object. It's merely a matter of not being satisfied with what is almost a self-evident truth of experience and seeing what the obsessional's destructive activity is close up.

That is what I propose to do.

As clinical experience clearly demonstrates, the hysteric lives entirely at the level of the Other. She emphasizes being at the level of the Other, and that is the reason that the Other's desire must exist, for without it, what would the Other be, apart from the law? The centre of gravity of the hysteric's constitutive movement is initially located at the level of the Other. Likewise, for reasons that are not impossible to spell out, and which are, in sum, identical with what Freud says when speaking of the early defusion of instincts, it's the aim of desire as such, of this beyond-demand, that is constitutive of the obsessional. But with one obvious difference from the hysteric.

I would like you to have some experience with a child who is going to become an obsessional. I believe that there are no young subjects where it's more tangible that what I called desire is located in the margin of need. As I tried to spell out for you last time when I presented to you that the margin of need, whose range is necessarily a limited range – as when one speaks of a company of limited liability, for need is always something whose range is limited – the margin, then, exists between need and the unconditional character of the demand for love. How did I define this desire as such? As something that, precisely because it has to be situated beyond, negates the element of otherness that is included in the demand for love.

But, so as to preserve the unconditional character of this demand by transforming it into an absolute condition of desire, into desire in a pure state, the Other is negated. By virtue of the fact that the subject has had to know, and break through, the unconditioned in the demand for love, which has a limit-character, this character remains and finds itself transferred onto need.

The young child who becomes an obsessional is this young child of whom the parents say – everyday language and the language of psychologists converge – 'He does have his fixed ideas [idées fixes]'. The ideas he has are no more extraordinary than those of any other child, if we think about the things he demands. He will demand a little box. It's not such a big deal, a little box, and there are lots of children where one won't pause for a moment over this demand 401 for a little box – except psychoanalysts, of course, who will find all sorts of fine allusions here. In fact, they wouldn't be wrong, but I find it more important to see that there are some children, amongst all children, who demand little boxes, and their parents find that this demand for a little box is strictly speaking intolerable – and it is intolerable.

One would be wrong to think that it would be enough to send the said parents to parenting school for remediation, because, contrary to what people say, the parents are implicated. It's not for nothing that one is obsessional. One has to have a model for that somewhere. So much is granted, but in the reception itself, the fixed-idea aspect that the parents point to is completely discernible, and is always immediately discerned, even by people who are not part of the parental couple.

In this very particular requirement that manifests itself in the way the child demands a little box, what is intolerable for the Other and which people loosely call a fixed idea, is that it isn't a demand just like any other, but that it presents with the characteristic of being an absolute condition, which is the very characteristic that I have been referring to as specific to desire. For reasons whose correspondence you can see with what might in this case be called strong drives, the emphasis for the subject is placed on what will be the element of the initial foundation of this tripod – which must subsequently have four legs if it's to stand up – namely, on desire. And not merely on desire, but on desire as such, that is, insofar as, in its constitution, it entails the Other's destruction. Desire is the absolute form of need, need that has passed to the state of an absolute condition, insofar as it lies beyond the unconditional demand for love, of which it can sometimes become the proof.

As such, desire negates the Other as such, and this is what renders it, like the desire for the little box in the young child, so intolerable.

Pay close attention here, because when I say that desire is the destruction of the Other I am not saying the same thing as when I say that the hysteric seeks her desire in the Other's desire. When I say that the hysteric seeks her desire in the Other's desire, it's the desire that she attributes to the Other as such. When I say that the obsessional puts his own desire before everything else, that means that he seeks it in a beyond by aiming for it as such in its constitution as desire, that is, insofar as it destroys the Other. That is the secret of the profound contradiction between the obsessional and his desire.

402 Thus aimed for, desire carries within itself this internal contradiction, which constitutes the impasse of the obsessional's desire and which authors try to translate by speaking about this perpetual and instantaneous toing-and-froing between introjection and projection.

I must say that this is something extremely difficult to represent to oneself, above all when one has adequately indicated, as the quoted author does in certain places, the extent to which the mechanisms of introjection and projection bear no relationship to one another. I have spelt it out for you more powerfully than this author has, but it's where one has to start from, all the same – namely, that the mechanism of projection is imaginary, and that the mechanism of introjection is symbolic. They bear absolutely no relationship to one another.

On the other hand, you can see, and you will find this in your experience on condition that you are alert to it, how the obsessional is inhabited by desires which, provided you tackle them a little bit, you will see swarming with an extraordinary species of vermin. If you steer the culture of obsessional neurosis in the direction of fantasy – it doesn't take much, it's enough to have the elements of your transference that I was talking about before – you will see a proliferation of said vermin in just about anything you like. That's why the culture of obsessional neurosis doesn't last long.

But, in the end, to see what's essential, what happens when, from time to time, the obsessional, taking his courage in his two hands, endeavours to cross the barrier of demand, that is, sets out in search of the object of his desire? For a start, he doesn't find it easily, even though there are many things that he is already accustomed to and can use as a support, even if it's only a little box. It is clear that down this path the most extraordinary accidents will befall him – accidents that one will try to account for at different levels by bringing in the superego, and a thousand other functions which, of course, do exist. But, much more radically than all that, the obsessional, insofar as his fundamental movement is directed at desire as such, above all in its constitution as desire, is moved to aim for what I am calling the Other's destruction.

Now it's in the nature of desire as such to require the Other's support. The Other's desire isn't a means of access to the subject's desire, it's quite simply the place of desire, and all movement by the obsessional towards his desire runs into a barrier which is absolutely tangible in the movement of his libido, as it were. In an obsessional's psychology, the more something plays the role of the object, even momentarily, of desire, the more the subject's law of approach in relation to this object will literally manifest itself in a lowering of libidinal tension. And this, to the point where, when he possesses 403 the object of his desire, nothing exists for him any longer. This is absolutely observable, and I will try to show it to you with some examples.

The problem for the obsessional is therefore entirely one of providing support for this desire – a desire which, for him, conditions the Other's destruction, where desire itself comes to disappear. There is no big Other here. I am not saying that the big Other doesn't exist for the obsessional, I am saying that there isn't one, where his desire is involved, and this is for the reason that he is seeking the only thing that, outside this point of reference, can maintain this desire as such in its place. The entire problem of the obsessional is to find the only thing that can give his desire a semblance of support, corresponding to this point that the hysteric, owing to her identifications, occupies so easily, namely what is opposite d, the formula $\mathbb{S}$ in relation to little a.

The hysteric finds support for her desire in her identification with the imaginary other. What takes its place and function in the obsessional is an object, one that is always – in a veiled form, no doubt, but recognizable – reducible to the phallus signifier.

I will end there today. In what follows, you will see the consequences for the behaviour of the obsessional vis-à-vis this object, and also vis-à-vis the little other. I will show you next time how a number of far more common truths can be deduced – for example, that the subject can only truly focus his desire by contrasting it with what I will call absolute virility, and also that insofar as he has to show his desire, since for him this is the essential requirement, he can only show it elsewhere, some place where he is required to surmount some exploit.

The performance aspect of all the obsessional's activity finds its reasons and motives here.

THE OBSESSIONAL AND HIS DESIRE

The duality of desire
The significance of fantasy
Sadistic scenarios
Permission, prohibition, exploit
The significance of acting out

Our exploration of neurotic structures as conditioned by what I call formations of the unconscious led us last time to the point of talking about the obsessional, and I ended by saying that he has to constitute himself in the face of his evanescent desire.

I started to show why his desire is evanescent on the basis of the formula 'Desire is the Other's desire'. The reason for that is to be found in a fundamental difficulty in his relationship with the Other, insofar as it's the locus where the signifier organizes desire.

It's this dimension that I am trying to articulate here, because I think that both the difficulties in theory and the deviations in practice were introduced by the failure to have identified it.

In passing, I want you to appreciate what Freud's discovery consists in and what the meaning of his work is, when it is considered once one has gone through it sufficiently and as a whole. The fact is that desire is organized by signifiers – but, of course, inside this phenomenon the subject tries to express, to manifest in an effect of signifiers as such, what is happening in his own approach to the signified.

Freud's work itself is inserted into this effort, up to a point. Many have spoken of naturalism with respect to him, of an effort to reduce human reality to nature. There is nothing of the sort. Freud's work is an attempt at a pact between the being of man and nature. This pact is without doubt sought elsewhere than in any innate relationship, since man is always experienced in Freud's work on the basis of the fact that he is constituted as a subject of speech, as the I of 406 the speech act. How can one deny it, since in analysis he is experienced in no other way? He finds himself, then, opposite nature, in a position that is different from that of being an immanent vehicle of life. The subject's relationship to nature comes to be formulated internally to the experience he has of speech.

His relationship to life comes to be symbolized by the phallus signifier, this lure he extracts from forms of life, and it's here that the central point is located, the most tangible and most significant of all the signifier crossroads that we explore over the course of a subject's analysis. The phallus is its pinnacle, its point of equilibrium. It's the signifier par excellence of man's relationship to the signified and is in a privileged position as a consequence.

Man's insertion into sexual desire is destined to a special problematic, the primary feature of which is that it has to find a place in something that preceded it, which is the dialectic of demand, insofar as demand always demands something that is more than the satisfaction which it's appealing to, something that goes beyond. Hence the problematic and ambiguous character of the place in which desire is located. This place is always beyond demand inasmuch as demand aims for the satisfaction of need, and it lies on this side of demand inasmuch as the latter, by virtue of being articulated in symbolic terms, goes beyond all the satisfactions to which it appeals, inasmuch as it's a demand for love, which targets the being of the Other and aims to obtain from the Other this essential presentification, inasmuch as the Other gives his very being, which lies beyond all possible satisfaction and is precisely what is aimed at in love.

It's in the virtual space between the appeal for satisfaction and the demand for love that desire has to assume its place and be organized. This is why we can only locate it in a place that is always double with respect to demand, both beyond and short of, according to the aspect under which we are considering demand – demand in relation to a need, or demand structured in terms of signifiers.

As such, desire always goes beyond every possible kind of response at the level of satisfaction, in itself calls for an absolute response and henceforth projects its essential characteristic of being an absolute condition onto everything that is organized in the interval internal to the two planes of demand – the signified plane and the signifier plane. It's in this interval that desire has to find its place and be articulated.

For precisely this reason, the Other becomes the relay for the subject's access to his desire. The Other as locus of speech, insofar 407 as demand is addressed to it, will also be the locus in which desire, or the possible formulation of desire, has to be discovered. This is where a contradiction is constantly operating, for this Other is possessed by a desire – a desire which, inaugurally and fundamentally, is alien to the subject. Hence, the difficulties in formulating desire, difficulties at which the subject will stumble, made all the more significant by the fact that we see him developing the neurotic structures that the analytic discovery has made it possible to describe.

These structures differ according as the emphasis is placed on the unsatisfaction of desire – and this is the mode in which the hysteric accesses its field and its necessity – or on the dependence on the Other for access to this desire, which is the mode in which this access is made available to the obsessional. By virtue of this fact, as I said at the end of the last session, something happens for the obsessional here in [$ ◊ a], which is different from hysterical identification.

For the hysteric, desire is a point of enigma, and we always bring to it, as it were, this sort of forced interpretation that characterizes all Freud's early explorations of hysteria.

Effectively, Freud didn't see that for the hysteric desire is located in a position such that telling her 'This or that person is whom you desire' is always a forced, inexact interpretation, wide of the mark. Either in Freud's initial observations, or later in the case of Dora, or even, if we extend the meaning of the word 'hysteria' to the case of the young homosexual woman that I discussed at length here last year, there is no example where Freud didn't make this mistake, and which didn't, at least, result, with no exception, in the patient's refusal to agree to the meaning of the desire of her symptoms and acts, whenever he went about it this way. Effectively, an hysteric's desire is not a desire for an object, but a desire for a desire, an effort to maintain herself opposite this point at which she calls for her desire, this point where the Other's desire is situated.

She identifies with an object, on the contrary. Dora identifies with Herr K., Elizabeth von R. identifies with different characters in her family or in her entourage. To describe the point where she identifies with someone, the terms 'ego' and 'ego-ideal' are equally inappropriate – in fact, for her, this someone becomes her other ego. It's a matter of an object the choice of which was always explicitly articulated by Freud in a manner consistent with what I am now telling you, namely that it's insofar as she or he recognizes in another man or in another woman the signs of her or his desire, 408 namely, that she or he is faced with the same problem of desire as the other is, that identification arises – with all the forms of contagion, crisis, epidemic and symptomatic manifestations that are so typical of hysteria.

The obsessional has different relations, for the reason that the problem of the Other's desire presents itself to him in a completely different way. To spell this out, I am going to try to get to it through the stages that our experience offers us.

In a certain manner, it doesn't much matter from what direction we approach the obsessional's lived experience. We mustn't lose sight of its diversity. The paths traced out by analysis, those by which our experience – where, it has to be said, we're groping around – have encouraged us to find the solution to the problem of the obsessional, are incomplete or biased. Of course, they give us material. We can explain this material and the manner in which it's used in different ways in relation to the results obtained.

First, we can criticize the approaches themselves. The critiques have to converge. In spelling this experience out in the way in which it has been effectively oriented, it incontestably emerges that both theory and practice have tended to be centred on the subject's use of his fantasies. Now, the role of fantasies in the case of obsessional neurosis has something puzzling about it inasmuch as the term 'fantasy' is never defined. We have spoken at length here about imaginary relationships, about the image's function as a guide for the instinct, so to speak, as channelling or indicating the path to the instinct's realizations. We also know to what extent the use – insofar as one can discern it with certainty – of the image's function is diminished in man, since it seems to be reduced to the specular, narcissistic image. It is, however, an extremely polyvalent and not neutralized function, since it functions on the level of relations that are both aggressive and erotic.

How can we articulate the essential, prevailing imaginary functions, the ones everybody speaks of, that are at the heart of analytic experience, those of fantasy, at the point we have come to?

I believe that at this place [$$ \lozenge a$], the schema presented to us here opens up the possibility of locating and articulating the function of fantasies. I ask you to represent it to yourselves first of all through an intuitive aspect, taking into account the fact that this isn't a real space, of course, but a topology in which homologies can be sketched out.

The relationship to the image of the other, i(a), is located at 409 the level of an experience integrated into the original circuit of demand where the subject initially addresses himself to the Other for the satisfaction of his needs. It's therefore somewhere along this circuit that transitivism and the effect of one's 'presence' are accommodated, placing the subject in a certain relationship to his semblable as such. The relationship to the image is thus found at the level of experiences from the time at which the child enters into the game of speech, at the limit of the passage from the infant state to the speaking state. Having said this, I would say that, in the other field, the one in which we look for the pathways to the realization of the subject's desire through access to the Other's desire, the function of fantasy is located at a homologous point – that is, at [$ ◊ a].

I will define fantasy, if you are happy with this, as the imaginary captured in a particular use of signifiers. Moreover, it manifests itself and is observable in characteristic ways, even if it's only when we speak of sadistic fantasies, for example, which play such an important role in the economy of an obsessional.

Do take good note that if I am describing it in these terms, if I qualify as sadistic the tendency that these manifestations represent for us, it's in connection with a particular work. This work itself is not presented as an investigation into instincts, but as a game which the term 'imaginary' would be very far from being adequate to characterize, since it's a literary work. I am referring to scenes, or to scenarios in fact – which are, therefore, profoundly expressed in signifiers. Well then, whenever we speak of fantasies, we must not misrecognize the scenario or story aspect, which constitutes one of their essential dimensions. They are not blind images of the instinct of destruction, they are not something in which the subject – I myself struggle to create an image of this that will explain to you what I mean – sees red all of a sudden when confronted with his prey, but a fantasy is not only something that the subject articulates into a scenario, but also something which the subject puts himself into. The formula, S with the little bar – that is, the subject at the most articulated point of his presentification in relation to the little a – is quite valid there for every kind of properly fantasmatic elaboration of what I call the sadistic tendency, inasmuch as it can be implicated in the economy of an obsessional.

You will notice that there is always a scene in which the subject is present in the scenario in different masked forms, in which he is implicated in a variety of images, in which another as semblable and also as the subject's reflection is presented. I would go even further – no one places sufficient emphasis on the presence of a certain type of instrument.

I have already alluded to the importance of whipping fantasies. Freud singled them out as seeming to play a very special role in 410 the female psyche. This is one aspect of the precise contribution he made on this topic. He came at it from an angle that came out of his experience, but this fantasy is far from being limited to the field and cases that Freud spoke of on that occasion. If you look closely, it was quite legitimate to limit it in that way, inasmuch as this fantasy plays a particular role at a turning point in the development of female sexuality and at one particular place – quite precisely, insofar as the function of the phallus signifier comes into play. But this function plays no lesser role in obsessional neurosis and in every other case where we see so-called sadistic fantasies appear.

What is the element that gives this instrument its enigmatic prevalence? No one can say that its biological function would be explained in any way. You might imagine it could by looking for it along the lines of some sort of relationship with superficial excitations, stimulations of the skin, but you sense to what extent these explanations would have an incomplete and almost artificial character. What becomes attached to the function of this element, which appears so often in fantasies, is a signifying multivalence that does rather tilt the balance towards the signified than towards anything of any kind that could be deduced from the order of biological needs, or from anything else.

This notion of fantasy as something that undoubtedly partakes of the imaginary order, but which, at whatever point of its articulation, only ever functions in the economy through its signifying function, seems essential to me, and it has not been formulated as such till now. I would go further – I do not believe that there is any other way of conceptualizing what are called unconscious fantasies.

What is an unconscious fantasy, if not the latency of something which, as we know through everything that we have learnt about the organization of the structure of the unconscious, is completely thinkable in terms of a signifying chain? The fact that in the unconscious there are signifying chains, subsisting as such, which, from there, structure and act on the organism and influence what appears externally as a symptom, is the heart of the analytic experience. It's much more difficult to conceptualize the unconscious impact of whatever is imaginary than it is to put fantasies themselves at the level of a common measure that presents itself to us at the level of the unconscious – that is, signifiers. Fantasy is essentially an imaginary embedded in a particular signifying function.

I am not able to develop this approach any further for the 411 moment, and I intend simply to situate the fantasmatic effect at this point – barred S in relation to small a. It's characterized by being an articulated and always complex relation, a scenario, one able to remain latent for a long time at a certain point in the unconscious, even as it is organized nevertheless – just as a dream, for example, can only be conceptualized if the signifier function gives it its structure, consistency and, thereby, its insistence.

A common fact of experience, and one of the very first facts, concerning the analytic investigation of obsessionals is to observe the place that sadistic fantasies occupy for the obsessional. They occupy this place but do not necessarily occupy it in an overt and declared manner. On the other hand, in the obsessional metabolism, the various efforts the subject makes towards a re-equilibration make evident what the object of his equilibrating search is, namely, to successfully recognize himself in relation to his desire.

When we see a pure obsessional, in a state of nature, as happens to us or is said to happen to us in our published observations, we find someone who speaks to us above all about all sorts of impediments, inhibitions, barriers, fears, doubts and prohibitions. We also already know that at that point he won't speak to us about his fantasmatic life, but will take advantage of our therapeutic interventions or of his own autonomous attempts at a solution, at finding an outcome or elaborating his properly obsessional difficulty. He will reveal to us the more or less predominant invasiveness of his psychic life by fantasies. You know how much these fantasies are capable of assuming a truly invasive, absorbing and captivating form in certain subjects, capable of swallowing up whole areas of their psychic life, lived experience and mental occupations.

We describe these fantasies as sadistic – this is, as it happens, merely a label. In fact, they confront us with an enigma, insofar as we are unable to be satisfied with describing them as the manifestations of a tendency but must see in them an organization that itself signifies the subject's relations with the Other as such. Indeed, the question is about finding a formula for the economic role of these fantasies insofar as they are articulated.

It's characteristic of these fantasies in the obsessional subject to remain in the state of fantasies. They are only actualized in quite exceptional circumstances, and these actualizations are, moreover, always disappointing for the subject. In effect, we observe here the mechanics of the obsessional's relationship to desire – the more he strives to approach the object, by the means that have been proposed to him, the more his desire dies away to the point 412 of extinction or disappearance. I would say the obsessional is a Tantalus, had Tantalus not been presented to us through what is quite a rich iconography as an image that is above all oral. But it is, however, not for nothing that I present it thus, because we shall see the oral underpinning of what constitutes the point of equilibrium of obsessional fantasies as such.

Still, this oral dimension must exist, since, in the end, this is the plane of fantasy attained by the analyst I alluded to in connection with the therapeutic line traced out in the series of three articles I have been referring to. Many analysts engaged in a practice of fantasmatic absorption in order to find a way for the obsessional to be given a new mode of equilibration, a certain temperament for him to realize his desire.

Some of the results there are undeniable, even if they remain subject to criticism.

You can already see that by approaching things from this angle we are only seeing one side of the problem. From the other side, one has to gradually deploy the whole range without misrecognizing what is present in the most apparent manner in the obsessional's symptoms, which are normally called the demands of the superego.

How should we think about these demands? What are their roots in the obsessional? That's what we will look at now.

We can identify, and we can read, what is going on in the obsessional at the level of this schema in a way that will subsequently prove to be no less fertile than what we have demonstrated so far.

One could say that the obsessional is always in the process of asking permission. You can see this concretely in what the obsessional tells you in his symptoms, where this is inscribed and frequently articulated. If we have confidence in the schema, this occurs at the level of [$ ◊ D]. To ask permission is, as a subject, to have a certain relationship to one's own demand. To ask permission, to the very extent that the dialectic with the Other – the Other as one who speaks – is called into question, challenged and even put in danger, is ultimately to apply oneself to restoring this Other and to place oneself in the most extreme dependence on 413 him. This already shows us the extent to which it's essential for the obsessional to maintain this place. It's where we see the relevance of what Freud always calls 'Versagung', refusal. Refusal and permission mutually imply one another. A pact is refused against the background of a promise. This is more valuable than talking about frustration.

It's not at the level of demand pure and simple that the problem of relations with the Other arises, at least not when it involves a complete subject. The problem only arises in these terms when we try to take recourse in development and imagine a small child, powerless with its mother, like an object at the mercy of someone. But as soon as the subject is in a relationship with the Other whom we have defined in terms of speech, there is a virtual point somewhere beyond any response from the Other, and very precisely insofar as speech creates this point beyond his response. Not only is it virtual, but, in truth, if there were no analysis, we would not be sure that anyone attains this point – save through this spontaneous master analysis that we always assume is possible in someone who perfectly fulfils this 'know thyself'. But we have all kinds of reasons for thinking that till now this point has never been designated in any strict manner except in analysis.

What the notion of Versagung designates, properly speaking, is a situation in which the subject has a relation to demand. I ask you to take the same little step forward as the one I asked you to take concerning fantasy. When we talk about stages or fundamental relations with the object, and we describe them as oral, anal or even genital, what are we talking about? About a certain kind of relation that structures the subject's Umwelt around a central function and defines his relationship with the world over the course of his development. Everything that comes from his environment would thus have a special signification due to the refraction that is undergone through the typical oral, anal or genital object. There is a mirage here – the notion of it is only ever reconstructed after the fact and projected back into development.

The conception I am criticizing is not even usually articulated in such an elaborate manner and it very frequently turns out to be avoided. One speaks of the object, then, as a side issue. One speaks of the environment, without thinking for a single instant about what the difference is between the typical object of a relation that is defined by a stage – as a reject, for instance – and the actual environment with multiple instances of a plurality of objects to which the subject, whatever he is, is subjected, whatever one says, from earliest infancy.

Until further notice, we must similarly have the greatest doubts about the supposed absence of objects for the child at the breast, his supposed autism. If you want to take my word for it, you will consider this notion to be purely illusory. It's enough to resort to 414 the direct observation of very young children to learn that this isn't so, that for them the objects of the world are as multiple as they are interesting and stimulating.

So, what's this about? What have we discovered? We can define it and articulate it as being effectively a certain style of demand in the subject. Where did we discover these manifestations that have us talking about successively oral, anal and indeed genital relationships with the world? We discovered them in the analyses of people who left the stages in question behind ages ago, the stages concerning the child's development. We say that the subject regresses to these stages – what do we mean by that?

Responding by saying that there is a return to one of the imaginary stages of infancy – if these are at all conceivable, but let's allow that they are – is a lure which doesn't yield the true nature of the phenomenon. Is there anything that looks like such a return? When we speak of fixation at a certain stage in the neurotic subject, what could we try to formulate that would be more satisfactory than what we are usually given?

What we effectively see in analysis is that over the course of regression – we shall see more clearly what this term means in what follows – the subject articulates his current demand in analysis in terms that enable us to recognize a particular relationship, respectively oral, anal or genital, with a particular object. This means that if these relationships of the subject have been able to exercise a decisive influence over the entire length of his development, it's insofar as, at a certain stage, they have shifted to the function of signifiers.

While, at the level of the unconscious, the subject articulates his demand in oral terms and articulates his desire in terms of absorption, he finds himself in a particular relationship [$ ◊ D], that is, at the level of a virtual signifying articulation which is that of the unconscious. This is what makes it possible for us to describe as a fixation at a certain stage something that will present with a particular value at some moment in the analytic exploration, and we might think there is some interest in having the subject regress to this stage so that something essential about the mode in which his subjective organization presents itself can be clarified.

But what interests us is to give neither gravitation nor compensation nor even symbolic return to what at a given moment of development has been, more or less with reason, the subject's unsatisfaction on the plane of an oral, anal or other demand – unsatisfaction at which, supposedly, he is arrested. If we are interested in this, it's solely because this is the moment of his demand where the problems in his relationships with the Other arise, insofar as they have been determinant for setting his desire in place.

In other words, everything that comes under demand in the subject's experience is over, once and for all. The satisfactions and compensations we might give him will never be anything but symbolic, and giving them to him can even be considered a mistake, even if it were possible to do so.

It's not completely impossible, precisely, owing to the intervention of fantasies, of this more or less substantial something supported by fantasy. But I believe that this is a mistake in the orientation of analysis, for at the end of an analysis it leaves the question of relations with the Other not settled.

I would say that the obsessional, like the hysteric, needs an unsatisfied desire, that is, a desire beyond demand. The obsessional resolves the question of the evanescence of his desire by turning it into a forbidden desire. He has it supported by the Other through the Other's prohibition.

Nevertheless, this manner of getting the Other to support his desire is ambiguous, because a forbidden desire does not, however, mean a strangulated desire. Prohibition is there to sustain desire, but it has to be present for it to be sustained. This, then, is what the obsessional does, and the question is how.

The way in which he does this is, as you know, very complex. He displays it and doesn't display it at one and the same time. In short, he disguises it, and it's easy to understand why. His intentions are, as it were, not pure.

As has already been noted, this is what has been referred to as the aggressiveness of the obsessional. Every time his desire emerges is said to be, for him, an occasion where this projection, this fear of reprisal, will inhibit all of its manifestations. I think this is a first approach to the question, but I don't think it's everything. It is to misrecognize quite fundamentally what is at issue simply to say that the obsessional is switching back and forth and that when his desire appears it becomes aggressive by going too far, redescends or swings back into the disappearance of this aggressiveness, linked to the fear of effective retaliation on the part of the other, namely, the fear of himself undergoing destruction equivalent to that of the desire he displays. 416

I think there is room to take a global apprehension of what's at stake in the case at hand, and there is perhaps no better way of doing this than to pass through the illusions that the relationship with the other gives rise to in us, we other analysts, and inside analytic theory.

The notion of the relationship with the other is invariably influenced by a slippage that tends to reduce desire to demand. If desire is effectively what I have said it is here, that is, what is produced in the gap that speech opens up in demand, and if it's therefore, as such, beyond all concrete demand, it's clear that every attempt to reduce desire to something from which one demands satisfaction encounters an internal contradiction. Almost all analysts in their community presently take the summit and acme of the subject's happy attainment of what they call genital maturity to be access to 'oblativity' – namely, access to recognition of the other's desire as such. I gave an example of this, in a passage by the author I have been examining, with the profound satisfaction brought by the satisfaction given to the other's demand, which is commonly known as altruism. It's precisely missing what is effectively to be resolved in the problem of desire.

When all is said and done, I think the term 'oblativity', as it's presented to us from this moralizing perspective, is, and one can say this without any distortion of terms, an obsessional fantasy. It's quite certain that in analysis, as things present themselves – for reasons that are very easy to understand, I am talking of temperaments that our practice theorizes – hysterical temperaments are much rarer than obsessional natures. One part of the indoctrination of analysis is constructed along the lines and according to the pathways of obsessional wishes. Now, the illusion, the very fantasy that is within reach of the obsessional is ultimately that the Other as such gives his consent to his desire.

In itself this carries extreme difficulties, since if it's necessary that he give his consent, it's necessary that it be given in a way that is completely different from a response to just any satisfaction, different from a response to a demand. But, all things considered, that is preferable to eluding the problem and giving him a short-circuited solution by thinking that ultimately it's sufficient to come to an agreement – that to find happiness in life it's enough not to inflict on others the frustrations that one has been the object of oneself.

417 Some of the unfortunate and utterly confusing outcomes of analysis find their origins in a number of presuppositions concerning what constitutes a good termination of analytic treatment, presuppositions whose effect is to exalt the obsessional subject via the perspective of his good intentions, which then become rapidly established and incite him to give himself over to one of the most common of these tendencies, which is expressed more or less as follows – 'Do not do to others what you would not like to be done to yourself.' This categorical imperative, structuring in morals, does not always lend itself to practical employment in existence, and it's completely beside the mark when it's a question of performing something like sexual intercourse.

The order of the relationship with the Other that consists in putting oneself in his place is a tempting slippage, and all the more so if the analyst, being precisely in an aggressive relationship vis-à-vis the little other, his semblable, is quite naturally tempted to occupy the position of sparing him, as it were. Sparing the other is what lies at the heart of an entire series of ceremonials, precautions and detours – in short, all the tricks of the obsessional. If the aim is to generalize what was manifesting itself in his symptoms – not without reason no doubt, and in a much more complicated manner – if the aim is to turn it into a moralizing extrapolation and propose to him what one calls the oblative outcome, that is, submission to the Other's demands, as the aim and outcome of his problems: well then, this detour is really not worth the effort. As experience shows, this is only substituting one symptom for another, and a very serious symptom, because it doesn't fail to engender the re-emergence – in other more or less problematic forms – of the question of desire, which has never been and can in no way be resolved by going down this path.

From this perspective, it can be said that the paths the obsessional finds for himself, and down which he seeks the solution to the problem of his desire, are otherwise adequate – even if they are not adapted – because at least the problem can be clearly read in them. Amongst the modes of solution, there are some for example that are located at the level of an effective relationship with the other. The manner in which the obsessional conducts himself with his semblable when he is still capable of doing so and not submerged by his symptoms – and it's rare that he is entirely – is in itself sufficiently indicative. This no doubt leads down a dead-end path but still gives what is not such a bad indication for the direction.

For example, I have spoken to you about the exploits of obsessionals. What are these exploits? For there to be an exploit, there 418 have to be at least three people, because one does not carry out one's exploits all alone. There have to be at least two of you, there must be something like that for there to be a winning performance, a sprint. Then, there also has to be someone who records and is the witness. What the obsessional is striving to obtain in an exploit is very precisely what earlier I called the Other's permission, in the name of something that is very polyvalent. One can say – he earned what he strived to achieve. But the satisfaction he strives to obtain is not at all to be classified on the terrain on which he earned it.

Observe the structure of our obsessionals. What does what one calls 'an effect of the superego' mean? It means that they inflict upon themselves all kinds of particularly hard, punishing tasks, that they succeed at them, moreover, and that they succeed at them all the more easily because it's what they want to do – but there, they succeed very, very brilliantly, in the name of which they would have the right to a little holiday where you could do whatever you wanted, hence the well-known dialectic of work and holidays. For the obsessional, work is powerful, being done so as to free up the time for sailing, which will be holiday time – and the holidays habitually turn out to be more or less wasted. Why? Because what it was about was obtaining the Other's permission. Now, the other – I'm speaking now of the actual other, the other that exists – has absolutely nothing to do with all this dialectic, for the simple reason that the real other is far too preoccupied with his own Other and has no reason to fulfil this mission of giving the obsessional's exploit its little crown – namely, what would be precisely the realization of his desire, insofar as this desire has nothing to do with the terrain on which the subject has demonstrated all his abilities.

This is all a very tangible phase, one whose humorous aspect is well worth making the effort to display. But it's not limited to that. The interest of concepts such as the big Other and the little other is to structure the lived relationships in many more than one direction. One may also say, from a certain angle, that in his exploit the subject dominates, tames and even domesticates a fundamental anxiety – this has been said by other people than me. But there again, one misrecognizes a dimension of the phenomenon, namely, that what's essential is not in the skill or in the risk taken, which for the obsessional is always a risk taken within very strict limits – a skilful economy strictly differentiates everything that the obsessional risks in his exploit from anything that resembles the risk of death in the Hegelian dialectic.

419 In the obsessional's exploit there is something that always remains irremediably fictitious, for the reason that death, I mean there where the real danger is, does not reside in the adversary he appears to be defying, but completely elsewhere. It's precisely on the side of this invisible witness, this Other who is there as the spectator, the onlooker, and who is going to say about the subject, 'Decidedly,' as it's expressed somewhere in Schreber's delusion, 'he's a horny bastard!' We re-encounter this exclamation, this way of feeling the effects, as implicit, latent and wished for throughout the dialectic of exploits. Here the obsessional is in a particular relationship to the other's existence as his semblable, as the one in whose place he can put himself, but it's precisely because he can put himself in his place that in reality there is no kind of essential risk in what he demonstrates in his effects of presence, sports and the risks more or less taken. Ultimately, this other with whom he is playing is only ever an other who is he himself and who, already, will in any case leave him with the laurels, from whichever side he approaches things.

But the important one is the Other before whom all of this takes place. He's the one that has to be preserved at any cost, the locus in which the exploits are registered and his history inscribed. This place has to be maintained at any cost. This is what makes the obsessional cling to everything that belongs to the verbal order, the order of the computus, recapitulation, inscription and falsification, too. What the obsessional wants to maintain above all without giving the appearance of doing so, giving the appearance of aiming at something else, is this Other where things are articulated in terms of signifiers.

That, then, is an initial approach to the question. Beyond all demands, beyond everything that this subject desires, there is the question of seeing what on the whole the obsessional's conduct aims at. It's quite certain that the essential aim is to maintain the Other. This is the primary, preliminary aim, solely inside of which the so difficult validation of his desire can be accomplished. What can, what will this validation be? This is what we will have to spell out subsequently. But first we needed to fix the four points of his conduct so that the trees didn't hide the forest from us.

The satisfaction of surprising one or other of the little mechanisms of his conduct, with its own style, must not fascinate and stop us. Obviously, stopping at any particular detail of an organism always produces satisfaction that is not entirely illegitimate, since, at least in the domain of natural phenomena, the detail always effectively reflects something of the totality. But in a matter which is about an organization that is as little natural as that of a subject's relations to signifiers, we can't totally trust the reconstruction of the 420 entire obsessional organization on the basis of one mechanism of defence or another – if it's at all possible to enter all of that in the catalogue of mechanisms of defence.

I'm trying to do something different. I'm trying to get you to find the four cardinal points around which each of the subject's defences is orientated and polarized. Here we already have two today. We first addressed the role of fantasy. We can now see, with respect to the exploit, that the Other's presence as such is fundamental. There is a further point, which I would at least like to introduce you to.

Hearing me speak about exploits, you have no doubt been thinking about all sorts of behaviour by your obsessionals. There is one exploit that perhaps does not completely deserve to be pinned down by this same name. It's what in analysis is called 'acting out'.

On this, I undertook – I hope you will undertake it too, at my example, even if it would only be to confirm what I am advancing – some investigations in the literature. It's surprising to see how difficult it is to extract oneself from it. The best article on the subject is the one by Phyllis Greenacre, called 'General Problems of Acting Out', published in the Psychoanalytic Quarterly in 1950 – a completely remarkable article in that it shows that till now nothing valuable has been formulated on this.

I believe that we have to limit the problem of acting out, and that it's impossible to do this if one holds on to the general notion that it's a symptom, a compromise, that it has a double meaning or that it's an active repetition, for this is to drown it in compulsions to repeat in their most general forms. If the term has any meaning, it's insofar as it designates a kind of act that arises out of an attempt at a solution to the problem of demand and desire. That's why it's produced in a specific manner in the course of an analysis, because, whatever one effectively does with it outside analysis, it's an attempt to solve the problem of the relationship between desire and demand.

Acting out is certainly produced on the way to the analytic realization of unconscious desire. It's extremely instructive, because if we look carefully for what characterizes the effect of acting out, we will find there are all kinds of absolutely necessary components, and for example what absolutely distinguishes them from what is called a bungled action, or what I more correctly call a successful action – I mean a symptom, inasmuch as it clearly reveals a tendency. Acting 421 out always comprises an element that is highly significant, and precisely because it's enigmatic. We will only ever call acting out an act that presents with a particularly unmotivated character. That doesn't mean that it doesn't have a cause, but that psychologically it lacks motivation, for it's an act that is always signified.

Moreover, an object always plays a role in acting out – an object in the material sense of the word, which I will be led to come back to next time to show you, actually, the limited function that the role of the object should be granted in this entire dialectic. There is almost an equivalence between fantasy and acting out. Acting out is in general structured in a way that comes very close to that of a scenario. In its own way, it's at the same level as fantasy.

One thing distinguishes it from fantasy and also from an exploit. Whereas an exploit is an exercise, a tour de force or a sleight of hand designed to give pleasure to the Other, who, as I've said, couldn't give a damn about it, acting out is different. It's always a message, and it's for that reason that we are interested in it when it occurs in an analysis. It's always addressed to the analyst in that the latter is not, in brief, all that badly placed, but not completely in his place either. It's in general a hint that the subject is giving us and this can sometimes go a long way and sometimes be very serious. If the acting out occurs outside the confines of the treatment, I mean afterwards, it's obvious that the analyst can hardly benefit from it.

Whenever we are led to designate, in a precise way, this paradoxical act that we try to circumscribe under the name 'acting out', we see that it's a question of bringing out into the open, along this line, the subject's relations with demand, which reveals that every relationship to this demand is fundamentally incapable of making it possible for the subject to gain access to the effective reality of the effect signifiers have upon him, that is, for him to place himself at the level of the castration complex.

It's possible to miss this – I will try to show it to you next time – inasmuch as, in this interval, this intermediary space in which one sees all these opaque acts that go from exploit to fantasy, and from fantasy to a passionate and indeed partial love – Abraham never spoke of part object, he spoke of partial love of the object – the subject has obtained illusory solutions concerning the object and, in particular, this solution that appears in the form of what one calls the homosexual transference in obsessional neurosis.

That's what I call the illusory solution. I hope next time to show you in detail why it's an illusory solution.

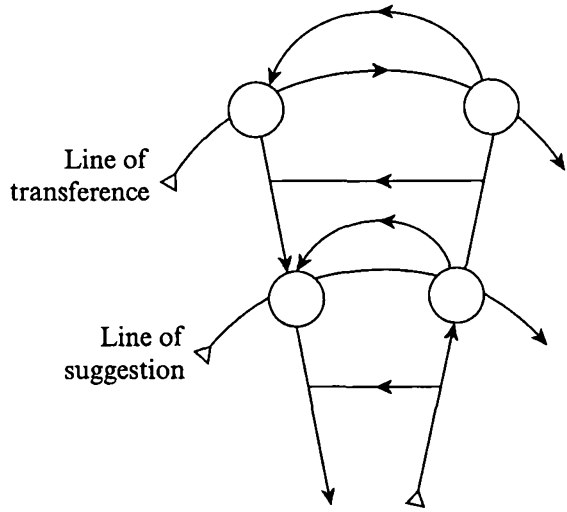
TRANSFERENCE AND SUGGESTION

Three forms of identifications
On two lines
Regression and resistance
Significance of an action
Technique – theirs and ours



In the few remaining seminars we have left this year, we are going to move into the field that Freud opened up after the Second World War, during the 1920s – the field described as the second topography. Effectively, only the path we have taken this year, giving formations of the unconscious their full scope, makes it possible for us not to lose our way concerning the meaning of this topography.

We will, then, be led to indicate what this model means and, in particular, why the function of the ego in it has moved into the foreground. It has quite another meaning, so much more complex, than the one that it's customary to give it and which inspires the use that has been made of it since. That's the direction.

I will start by pointing out that Freud devotes a chapter to 424 identification in Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego. You have to read this chapter to see the relevance of transferring the three types of identification distinguished by Freud onto this schema here. For us, at the point at which we find ourselves, this schema has to have the value of a mediation – it gives you a formulation or even an interpretation of what, on the one hand, the structure of the unconscious is insofar as it's fundamentally structured as speech and, on the other, the structure of the topography that emerges from it.

The various organs, as it were, of the Freudian model originate in a schema also – this famous schema in the shape of an egg, where you imagine you can intuit the relations between the id, the ego and the superego. In it you see an eye and a sort of pipette entering into the substance that is supposed to represent the superego. It's a very useful schema, and has precisely the inconvenience of representing topological things through spatial schemes. There is, however, a necessity here that I myself do not escape, since I too represent the schema by a spatial schema, but I have tried to do it with the least inconvenience possible. Thus, imagine that you take my little network, crumple it up, make it into a little ball and put it in your pocket. Well then, in principle, the relations still remain the same, inasmuch as they are relations of order.

It's obviously more difficult to do this with the schema of the egg, since it's entirely oriented towards spatial projection. Consequently, you imagine that Freud wants the id to designate an organ that exists somewhere and on which there is a protuberance representing the ego, which appears here like an eye. But read the text – no allusion is made to anything that might have this substantial character or that might authorize representing these instances as differentiated organs. The Freudian differentiations are of a different kind and are placed in a completely different order from the development of bodily organs precisely in that they are supported by identifications.

It's important to bear this in mind, even if only because it can be far-reaching. There are people who imagine that when they carry out a lobotomy they are taking out a slice of the superego. Not only do they believe it, but they write as much and they do it with this in mind.

Freud distinguishes three types of identification. This tripartition is spelt out clearly, and one finds it summarized in a single paragraph in the text.

The first type of identification is 'die ursprünglichste Form der Gefühlsbindung an ein Objekt', 'the original form of emotional tie with an object' [SE 18: 107–8].

The second form is one that Freud particularly dwelt on at length in this chapter, which is the concrete basis of all his reflection on identification and is fundamentally linked to everything on the topic – 'sie auf regressivem Wege zum Ersatz für eine libidinöse Objektbindung wird, gleichsam durch Introjektion des Objekts ins Ich.' The second form of identification occurs 'in a regressive way [and] it becomes a substitute for a libidinal object-tie, as it were by means of introjection of the object into the ego' [SE 18: 107–8]. This second form of identification is the one that throughout Freud's discourse in Group Psychology, but also in The Ego and the Id, presents him with the most problems, by virtue of its ambiguous relation to the object. It's here also that all the problems of analysis gather, in particular that of the inverted Oedipus complex. Why, at a particular moment, in certain cases, and in the form of the inverted Oedipus complex, does the object, which is an object of libidinal attachment, become an object of identification?

Sometimes it's more important to keep open the problem raised than to solve it. There is absolutely no obligation for us to represent to ourselves a possible solution to the question raised. This question is perhaps the central question, the question that we will always be condemned to fall short of, the one that forms the pivotal point. There must be such a point somewhere, because, wherever we place ourselves and consider every question solved, there will always remain the question why we are there – how did we get to the point where everything is clear?

Still, in the present case, it's clear that there must be a point that keeps us, precisely, immersed in the question. I'm not saying that this is the point in question, but Freud, in any case, circles around it and in no way claims to have solved it. What is important, on the other hand, is to see how the coordinates of this zero point vary.

426 I repeat, the essential question is that of the passage, attested in experience, of the love for an object to the ensuing identification.

The distinction Freud introduces here between libidinal erotic attachment to the loved object and the identification with the same is no different from the one I alluded to at the end of one of our recent seminars concerning the relation to the phallus, namely, the opposition between being and having. But added to this is what Freud says his experience gives him – this identification is always regressive in nature. The coordinates of the transformation of a libidinal attachment into an identification indicate that there is regression.

I think you know enough about this for there to be no need for me to dot the i's. At least I've already spelt out in previous sessions what regression confirms. There is still the question of how to articulate it. I articulate it by suggesting that it's the choice of signifiers that gives an indication of regression. Regression to the anal stage, with all its nuances and varieties, even to the oral stage, is always the presence of regressive signifiers in the subject's discourse.

There is no other regression in analysis. That the subject starts to whimper like a baby on your couch or even act like one – it sometimes happens, but in this sort of play-acting we are not accustomed to seeing the true regression that is observed in analysis. When that does happen, it generally doesn't augur very well.

From where we are now, we are going to try to see what these two forms of identification mean on our schema. Let's place ourselves here, at the level of the subject's need – the term is used in Freud.

I would point out to you in passing that Freud, and precisely in connection with the advent of identification in relation to investment in the object, tells us that it has to be admitted that investment in the object stems from the id which perceives the promptings, pressures and erotic tensions as needs, which clearly shows that the id puts itself forward as being quite ambiguous.

I also point out to you in passing that the French translation of these chapters renders them unintelligible and sometimes makes them say exactly the opposite of Freud's text. The term 'Objektbindung', 'object-tie', investment in the object, is translated as concentration on the object, which is incredibly obscure.

However that may be from the perspective of need, these lines give us the two horizons of demand. Here we find demand as articulated demand, insofar as the demand for the satisfaction of a need must pass via the defiles of the articulation that language renders obligatory. Moreover, by virtue of the sole fact that it passes over to 427 the level of the signifier, as it were, in its existence and no longer in its articulation, there is an unconditional demand for love, and, as a result, at the level of the one to whom demand is addressed, that is, the Other, it is itself symbolized – which means that it appears present against the background of absence and can be made present as absence. Note that even before an object is loved in the erotic sense of the term – in the sense in which the eros of the loved object can be perceived as a need – the position of demand, as such, creates the horizon of the demand for love.

On this schema, the two lines on which the subject's need is articulated as signifiers – that of demand as demand for the satisfaction of a need and that of the demand for love – are separated by reason of topological necessity, but the earlier comments apply. The separation does not mean that they are not one single, unique line on which what the child articulates for the mother is inscribed. There is an ongoing superimposition of the unfolding of what takes place on each of these lines.

You can see an immediate application of this. This ambiguity is very precisely that which, over the length of Freud's work, is maintained in a constant manner between the notion of transference – I mean, the action of transference in analysis – and the notion of suggestion.

Freud is always telling us that, after all, transference is suggestion and that we make use of it under that name – except, he adds, we do something completely different with it, since we interpret this suggestion. Now, if we are able to interpret suggestion, it's clearly because it has a background. The transference exists there potentially. We know very well that it exists, and I will immediately give you an example of it.

Transference is already potentially the analysis of suggestion, it's itself the possibility of the analysis of suggestion, a second articulation of what in suggestion simply imposes itself upon the subject. In other words, the horizon on which suggestion is based is there at the level of demand, the demand that the subject makes of the analyst simply by virtue of the fact that he is there.

This demand does not lack variety. What are these demands? How are we to situate them? It's interesting to take stock of them at the start, for there is enormous variation. There really are people for whom the demand to be cured is there, insistent at every moment. Others, more informed, know that it's to be deferred till tomorrow. There are others who are there for something other than for the demand to be cured, they are there to find out. There are those who are there to become analysts. But what is the importance 428 of knowing the place of demand, given that the analyst, even if he does not respond to demand, responds to it simply by virtue of the fact that he is instituted, which is constitutive of all the effects of suggestion?

The idea one normally has is that the transference is that thanks to which suggestion works. Freud himself writes that if it's appropriate to allow the transference to establish itself, it's because it's legitimate to use the power of – what? Of the suggestion that the transference gives rise to. Transference is here thought of as the analyst's seizing power over the subject, as the affective tie that makes the subject dependent on him, and which it's legitimate for us to make use of for an interpretation to work. What does that mean, if not to declare in the clearest of manners that we use suggestion? To call things by their name, it's because the patient has come to love us that our interpretations are ingested. We're on the plane of suggestion. Now, of course, Freud does not intend to limit himself to that.

We are told, 'Yes, it's simple, we are going to analyse the transference. As you will see, this makes the transference completely disappear.' I stress these terms because they are not mine but those that are implicit in all discussions about the transference as an affective capture of the subject. To think that what differentiates one from someone who uses his power as the support for getting the patient to accept an interpretation, and who is therefore suggesting, is the fact that one is going to analyse this effect of power, is nothing other than an infinite deferral of the question – since it's still on the basis of the transference that one is going to analyse the fact that the subject has accepted the interpretation. There is no possibility of exiting the infernal circle of suggestion by that route. Now, we suppose, precisely, that something else is possible, which is, then, that the transference is something different from the use of power.

The transference is already in itself an open field, the possibility of a signifying articulation other than and different from the one that imprisons the subject in demand. This is why it's legitimate, whatever its contents might be, to place this line on the horizon. I will call it the line of transference. It's something articulated which exists potentially, beyond what is articulated on the plane of demand where you find the line of suggestion.

Now, there on the horizon is what demand as such produces, namely, the symbolization of the Other and the unconditional demand for love. This is where the object will subsequently come to be lodged, but as an erotic object that becomes the subject's aim. When Freud tells us that the identification that succeeds and replaces this aimed-at love object is regression, what that is about is the ambiguity between the line of transference and the line of suggestion.

I formulated this a long time ago, right at the outset – it's along 429
the line of suggestion that identification in its primary form occurs, the one we are so familiar with, which is identification with the insignia of the Other as the subject of demand, he who has the power to satisfy it or not satisfy it and marks this satisfaction at every moment with something that is in the foreground – his language, his speech.

I have stressed the essential importance of spoken relations with the child. All other signs, the mother's entire miming, as they were saying last night, are articulated in signifying terms that crystallize themselves into the conventional character of this so-called emotional mimicry by which the mother communicates with the child. Every type of expression of the emotions in man has a conventional character. You don't need to be Freudian to know that the supposedly spontaneous expression of the emotions turns out on examination to be not only problematic but massively variable. What in one particular area of signifying articulation signifies a given emotion may have a completely different expressive value in another.

Therefore, if identification is regressive, it's precisely insofar as the ambiguity between the line of transference and the line of suggestion remains permanent. In other words, in the developments and detours of analysis, we shouldn't be astonished to see regressions punctuated by a series of correlated identifications which mark their rhythm and tempo. They are different, moreover – there can't be both regression and identification at the same time. One is the halts and stops of the other. But it remains the case that if there is transference, it's precisely so that the upper line can be maintained on another plane than the plane of suggestion – that is, it is held in view, not as something to which no satisfaction of demand corresponds, but as a signifying articulation as such. That's what distinguishes one from the other.

You will say to me, 'What is the operation by which we keep them distinct?' Our operation is precisely abstinent or abstentionist. It consists in never ratifying demand as such. We know that, but although this abstention is essential, it isn't sufficient on its own.

But this is stating the obvious – these two lines can remain distinct because it's in the nature of things for them to remain distinct. In other words, they can remain distinct because for the subject they are distinct and because between the two there is this entire field which, thank goodness, is not slim, and which is never abolished. It's called the field of desire.

430 Henceforth, all that is asked of us is not to encourage this confusion by our presence there as Other. Now, by virtue of the simple fact that we are there to listen as Other, that is difficult – and all the more so if, in the way we enter into it, we accentuate the feature of analysis described as permissive. It's permissive purely on the level of verbal play, but that is sufficient. It's sufficient that things are permissive on the verbal plane for the patient to be satisfied, not, of course, on the real plane, but on the verbal plane. And it's enough that he be satisfied on the plane of demand for the confusion between the line of transference and the line of suggestion to be irremediably established. This means that, by virtue of our presence, and insofar as we listen to the patient, we have a tendency to confuse the line of transference with the line of demand. We are therefore, in principle, harmful.

If regression is our path, it's a receding path. It doesn't designate the aim of our action, but its detour. We must keep this constantly in mind. There is an entire technique of analysis which has no other aim than to establish this confusion, and this is why it results in a transference neurosis. You will then see it in writing in a journal called La revue française de psychanalyse that, as to resolving the question of the transference, there is only one thing to do – sit the patient down, say nice things to him, show him how nice things are outside, tell him to go on his way and leave quietly so as not to disturb the flies. And that's from a great practitioner.

Thank goodness that there is something between the two lines that stops this irremediable confusion from becoming established. And it's obvious that the hypnotists, or simply those who have become interested in hypnosis, know full well that no suggestion, however successful it may be, will take hold of the subject completely.

Let's ask this question here – what resists?

It's desire that resists.

I won't even say this or that of the subject's desires, since this is obvious – but essentially the desire to have one's desire. This is even more obvious, but that is no reason not to say it.

What the schema enumerates and organizes are the forms necessary for maintaining desire, owing to which the subject remains a divided subject, which is in the very nature of the human subject. If 431 he is no longer a divided subject, he is mad. He remains a divided subject because there is a desire, the field of which can't be so easy to maintain either, since I am explaining to you that a neurosis is constructed in the way it's constructed so as to maintain something articulated called desire.

That's the right definition. Effectively, neurosis is not a greater or lesser force or weakness of desire, nor is fixation to be imagined as the fact that at some point the subject has put his foot in a pot of glue. If fixation resembles anything, it's more like pickets that are designed to keep something in that would otherwise escape.

The force of desire in neurotics, what is called the quantitative element, is very variable. This variation constitutes one of the most convincing arguments for establishing the autonomy of what one calls the structural modification in neurosis. It's blatantly obvious in experience that neurotics who have the same form of neurosis are diversely gifted people with respect to what one of the authors in question calls somewhere, concerning an obsessional neurosis, 'the exuberant and precocious sexuality' of one of his patients.

In the event, this involves a subject of whom it's said that when he masturbated he would lightly pinch the outside part of his foreskin. Convinced that he would cause irreparable lesions, he didn't dare wash his penis, and he had to consult a doctor given the repeated failure of his attempts at coitus. We know very well that these are only symptoms and that the subject will show himself to be, in the midst of his analysis, very capable of fulfilling his duties as a husband and satisfying his wife. But in the end, whatever force we suppose his symptoms to be supported by, we are nevertheless not going to describe as 'exuberant' a sexuality that lets itself languish and be deceived to the point where one can give a similar description of a subject who is already at an advanced age. This does not mean that another obsessional neurotic will not show you a different picture, justifying one in describing his sexuality as exuberant, even as precocious.

This altogether tangible difference between clinical cases doesn't prevent us from recognizing that it's one and the same obsessional neurosis in every case. This is why an obsessional neurosis is situated somewhere else entirely than in the quantitative element of desire. If this does enter into play, it's solely insofar as it will have to pass through the defiles of structure, for what characterizes neurosis is structure.

In the case of the obsessional, whether his desire is strong or weak, whether the subject is in the midst of puberty or comes to us when he is forty or fifty years old – that is, at a time at which 432 his desire is nevertheless in decline and he desires to get some idea about what's happened, that is, something he has never understood anything about in his existence till then – in every case it will emerge that he has been preoccupied during the whole of his existence with placing his desire in a strong position and constituting a stronghold for his desire, doing it on the plane of essentially signifying relations. In this stronghold there dwells either a weak or a strong desire, that's not the question. One thing is certain, it's that strongholds are always double-edged. Those that are built to protect one from the outside are even more annoying for those that are inside, and that's the problem.

The first form of identification is, then, defined for us as the original tie with an object. It is, to schematize things, the identification with the mother. The other form of identification is the regressive identification with the love object, that is, identification insofar as it should occur somewhere else, at a point on the horizon that is not easy to reach because the demand is precisely unconditional or, more exactly, submitted to the one condition of the existence of signifiers inasmuch as, without the existence of signifiers, there is no possible opening for the dimension of love as such. The latter is therefore entirely dependent upon the existence of signifiers, but, within this existence, it isn't dependent on any particular articulation. It's for this reason that it isn't easy to formulate since nothing can complete it or fulfil it, not even the totality of my discourse throughout my entire existence, since it is, in addition, the horizon of my discourses.

This raises precisely the question of what the barred S means at this level. In other words, what subject is in question?

There is no reason to be astonished that this only ever forms a horizon. The entire problem is that of knowing what will be constructed in this interval. The neurotic lives the paradox of desire exactly like everybody else, for no human inserted into the human condition ever escapes it. The only difference that characterizes the neurotic with respect to desire is that he is open to the existence of this paradox as such, which of course doesn't simplify existence for him, but doesn't place him in such a bad position either from a certain point of view.

We might directly formulate the philosopher's point of view some time and call him into question in the same way. The neurotic is effectively on a path that has some kinship with what the philosopher formulates, or at the very least with what he should formulate, since, to be honest, have you ever seen this problem of desire well and truly carefully, correctly and powerfully articulated in the philosopher's approach? Until now, what appears to me to be one of 433 the most characteristic things about philosophy is that this is one of the most carefully avoided things in its field.

That would encourage me to make another aside about the philosophy of action, which would end with the same conclusions, namely that what's said about it is nonsense. One sees in it some kind of intrusion of spontaneity or originality by man, insofar as he transforms the givens of the problem or the world, as we say. It's odd that no one ever highlights what, for me, is a truth of experience, namely the profoundly paradoxical character of action completely akin to the paradox of desire. I was beginning to introduce its traits and contours to you last time when alluding to the character of exploit, performance, demonstration and indeed even desperate outcome in an action.

The terms I am using are not my own, because Freud uses the term 'vergreifen' ['to make a mistake'] to designate paradoxical, generalized action, human action. Human action is particularly present when one claims to designate it as concordant with history. My friend Kojève speaks of crossing the Rubicon as a point of concordance, a harmonious solution between Caesar's present, past and future, although the last time I crossed the Rubicon, I only saw it dry. It was immense when Caesar crossed it, but it wasn't the same season. Even if Caesar crossed the Rubicon with the genius of Caesar, there is always in the fact of crossing the Rubicon something that involves jumping into the water, since it's a river.

In other words, human action is not as harmonious as all that. For us other analysts, it's the most astonishing thing in the world that no one in psychoanalysis has proposed to formulate what pertains to action from this paradoxical perspective from which we constantly view it. Moreover, we never see anything but this, which makes it quite difficult to define acting out clearly. In a certain sense, it's an action just like any other, but one that stands out because it's brought about by our use of the transference – that is, we are doing something extremely dangerous, and all the more so since, as you can see from what I am suggesting to you, we do not have a very precise idea of what this is.

Perhaps a word, in passing, on resistance will clarify what I mean. In some cases, the subject does not accept the interpretations that we present to him on the plane of regression. It seems to us that it 434 fits, and to him it doesn't seem to fit at all. So one says to oneself that the subject is resisting and that in the end he will give way if we insist, seeing that we are always ready to play the card of suggestion. Now, this resistance may not be without its value. What value does it have? Inasmuch as it expresses the necessity to articulate desire in some other way, namely on the plane of desire, it has the very precise value that Freud gives it in some of his texts. He calls it Übertragungswiderstand, transference-resistance, because it's the same thing as transference. It involves transference in the sense I am talking to you about at the moment. Resistance aims to maintain the other line, that of transference, where the articulation has another requirement than the one we give it when we respond to demand immediately. This reminder only corresponds to things that are self-evident, but self-evident things that needed to be articulated, nevertheless.

To conclude on the second identification, at what point do we judge that what happens is regressive? It's the fact that the transference is an appeal that makes possible this disruption by signifiers that we call regression, but it mustn't stop there. On the contrary, it must take us further. That's what we are trying to set our sights on for the moment, namely, how are we to operate with the transference? The transference quite naturally tends to deteriorate into something we can always satisfy in some way at its regressive level, hence the fascination with the notion of frustration, hence the various formulations that are expressed in a thousand ways in object relations and the conception of analysis that follows.

Every way of articulating analysis always tends to deteriorate, which does not prevent analysis from being something else, nevertheless.

Freud formulates the third form of identification for us as one that may arise with any new perception of a common quality shared with a person who is not at all an object of the sexual drive, 'sie drittens bei jeder neu wahrgenommenen Gemeinsamkeit mit einer Person, die nicht Objekt der Sexualtriebe ist' [SE 18: 108]. Where is this third identification located?

Freud illustrates this for us in a manner that leaves no ambiguity over how it is to be recorded on the schema. As I have been telling you lately, in Freud it's always said in the clearest of fashions. He takes hysterical identification as an example. For the hysteric, her problem is focusing her desire somewhere, in the sense in which an optical instrument makes it possible to focus on a point. This desire comes to present special difficulties for her. Let's attempt to spell 435 them out more precisely.

For her, her desire is destined to some sort of impasse since she can only actually focus it on the condition that she identify with something, a small trait, it doesn't matter what. Where I say 'an insignia', Freud speaks of a trait, a single trait, einziger Zug, it doesn't matter what, of someone else, someone with whom she can sense that there is the same problem of desire. This means that for the hysteric her impasse opens wide the doors to the other – at least, the doors to all the others, that is, to all possible hysterics, even to all hysterical moments of all others, insofar as for an instant she can sense in them the same problem, which is that of the question about desire.

For the obsessional, although the question is articulated a little differently, it's exactly the same from the point of view of the relation, the topology – and with reason. The identification in question is placed here, at [$$ \lozenge a$], which, as I pointed out to you last time, is where fantasy is. There is a point at which the subject has to establish a certain imaginary relationship with the other, not in itself, as it were, but insofar as this relationship brings him satisfaction. Freud makes quite clear that it's a question here of a person who has no relationship with any sort of Sexualtrieb. This is something else – he is a support for, a puppet of fantasy.

Here, give the word 'fantasy' as large an extension as you like. This is fantasy such as I formulated it last time, insofar as it can be an unconscious fantasy. The only use for the other, which is not insignificant, is this – to enable the subject to maintain a particular position that avoids the collapse of desire, that is, that avoids the problem of the neurotic.

That's the third form of identification, which is essential.

It would take too long now to start reading Bouvet's article published in La revue française de psychanalyse, in which my paper 'L'agressivité en psychanalyse', 'Aggressiveness in Psychoanalysis', also appears. This article is titled 'Importance de l'aspect homosexuel du transfert', 'Importance of the Homosexual Aspect of the Transference', and I ask you to read it, as I will be returning to it. Today I would just like to spell out the precise point at which I indicate the error in the analytic technique in question.

What happens in analysis, insofar as the phallic object, and especially the analyst's phallus, appears in fantasies happens at a point of proliferation that has already been instituted, but which can always be stimulated. This is the point at which, through his fantasy, the subject as obsessional maintains the possibility of sustaining himself in the face of his desire – a possibility that is much more difficult and dangerous than for the hysteric. It's here, therefore, that 436 ø, the fantasmatic phallus, appears. It's in this technique that I am referring to that the analyst becomes pressing and insistent through his interpretations, so that the subject agrees to enter into communion with, swallow and fantasmatically incorporate this part object into himself.

I am saying this is mistaking levels. It's moving the plane of demand, which is called into question here, onto the plane of suggestive identification. It's favouring a certain imaginary identification by the subject through benefiting, as it were, from the hold that the openly suggestive position gives the analyst on the basis of the transference. It's giving a false, diverted solution to what is being questioned – I am not saying in his fantasies, but in the material that he effectively brings to the analyst. This is visible in the observations themselves, upon which one intends to construct an entire theory about the part object, the distance from the object, the introjection of the object and all that follows. I will give you an example.

It's palpable at every moment in this observation that the solution to the analysis of the obsessional is that he come to discover castration for what it is, that is, as the law of the Other. This Other that is castrated. For reasons that have to do with his mistaken implication in this problem, the subject feels that he himself is threatened by this castration at a level that is so acute that he can't come near his own desire without feeling its effects. What I am saying is that the horizon of the Other, the big Other as such, distinct from the little other, is tangible in this observation at every turn.

The following memories come back to him – the first time he approaches a young girl, he flees in anxiety, goes and confides in his mother and feels completely reassured as soon as he says to her, 'I will tell you everything' [p. 432]. One can only take this material literally. His virtual subjective support immediately passes via a distraught reference to the Other as the locus of verbalization. This is where, henceforth, the subject will be entirely invested. It is his one possible refuge when confronted with the panic he experiences on approaching his desire. It's already inscribed and it's a matter of finding out what is going on underneath.

Once certain fantasies have come to light after all sorts of solicitations from the analyst, we come to a dream that the analyst interprets as the fact that the subject's passive homosexual tendency is becoming apparent. Here is the dream. 'I accompany you home. In your bedroom there is a big bed. I lie down on it. I feel extremely awkward. There is a bidet in the corner of the bedroom. I am happy, although I feel uneasy' [435]. We are told that following the subject's preparation over the earlier period of his analysis, he does not experience much difficulty in admitting the passive homosexual meaning of the dream.

Is this sufficient for this formulation, in your opinion? Without 437 even returning to the observation – where all the indications are there to demonstrate that this is not sufficient – if we limit ourselves to the text of the dream, one thing is certain, which is that the subject comes and puts himself, so to speak, in the Other's place: 'I am in your home. I am lying on your bed.'

Passive homosexual? Why? Until evidence arises to the contrary, nothing appears there that in this particular case makes the Other an object of desire. On the contrary, what I clearly see designated here, in a third position, and in the corner, is something that is fully articulated and that nobody seems to have paid attention to, whereas it is, however, not there for no reason. It's the bidet.

One can say about this object both that it presentifies the phallus and does not show it, since I do not see any indication in the dream that anybody is engaged in using it. The bidet is there, indicating what is problematic. It's not for nothing that this famous part object enters. It's the phallus, but, as it were, as a question – does the Other have it or does he not? This is the moment to show it. Is the Other it or is he not it? That's what's in the background. In short, it's a question of castration.

This obsessional is, moreover, prey to all sorts of obsessions of cleanliness, which clearly show that this instrument is a possible source of danger. The bidet has presentified the phallus for him, at least his own, for a long time. What is problematic for this subject is the question concerning the phallus.

[It is the question concerning the phallus] insofar as the latter enters into play as the object of this symbolic operation which, in the Other, at the level of signifiers, makes it the signifier of what has been struck by the action of signifiers, of what is subject to castration. The aim is not to know whether in the end the subject feels comforted by taking a higher power inside himself, by assimilating himself to one who is stronger than he, but to know how he will have effectively resolved the question implicit on the horizon, in line with what the structure of neurosis indicates, namely, the acceptance or not of the castration complex, insofar as castration can only be realized as a function of signifiers.

This is where the two techniques differ, independently of the legitimacy linked to the structure and very meaning of obsessional desire.

Merely on the plane of the therapeutic solution obtained, by simply considering the resulting knot, closure or, let's say, scar, 438 there is no doubt that a certain technique is unfavourable to a correct outcome and doesn't correspond to what one may call a cure, nor even to any form of orthopaedics, not even one that limps.

Only the other one is capable of giving, not just the correct, but the effective solution.

THE SIGNIFICATION OF THE PHALLUS IN THE TREATMENT

Reading the schema
The reduction to demand
From fantasy to message
The treatment of a female obsessional neurosis
Beyond the castration complex

I am going to return to my comments, still with the help of our little schema.

Some of you are wondering about the little lozenge sign that is being used when, for example, I write $ opposite little a. This doesn't seem extremely complicated to me, but well, since some of you are wondering about it, I will give a response.

I remind you that the lozenge in question is the same thing as the square in a much older fundamental schema that I reproduced in a simplified form for you here in January [see p. 142], and on which I inscribed the subject's relationship to the Other as the locus of speech and message. I gave this as a first approximation of what comes from the Other and encounters the barrier of the a–a' relationship, which is the imaginary relation.

The lozenge expresses the subject's relationship – whether barred or not barred, according to the case, that is, according to whether it's marked by the effect of signifiers or whether we are simply considering it as a still indeterminate subject, not split by the Spaltung that results from the action of signifiers – this subject's relationship, then, with what is determined by this quadratic relationship. When I write it like that [$ ◊ a], the subject's relationship to the little other – that is, to the semblable or the imaginary other – the other vertices of this framework are not otherwise determined. If I write $ in relation to demand, namely [$ ◊ D], it's the same, this doesn't prejudge the corner of this little square where demand intervenes as such, that is, the articulation of a need in the form of signifiers.

On this year's schema [see Appendix A] we have a line at the upper level, which is a signifying and articulated line. Since it's produced on the horizon of every signifying articulation, it's the fundamental background to every formulation of a demand. At the lower level, this is articulated in general, however poorly. We have a precise articulation, a succession of signifiers, of phonemes.

Let's comment on the upper line, which lies beyond all signifying articulation.

This line corresponds to the effect of the signifying articulation taken as a whole, insofar as, through its mere presence it makes the symbolic appear in the real. It makes this horizon or possibility of demand, this power of demand which is essentially and by nature – place as much ambiguity on that as you like – a demand for love, a demand for presence, appear in its totality and insofar as it's articulated.

The reason I'm talking about love here is to pin something down. Hatred happens to have the same place. The ambivalence of love and hate can only be conceptualized within this horizon. It's also within this horizon that we are able to see this third term, ignorance, a homologue of love and hate in relation to the subject, come to the same spot.

On the upper line on the left, we have the signifier of the Other as marked by the action of the signifier, that is, the barred A – S(Ⱥ). This precise point is the homologue of the point at which, on the line of demand, the return from demand's passage through the Other, which is called the message, s(A), appears in the fundamental schema of every demand. If you like, what has to be produced at the point of the message on the second line is precisely the message of a signifier that signifies that the Other is marked by this signifier. That doesn't mean that this message is produced. It's there as the possibility of being produced.

This is, moreover, also the homologue of this point at which the demand arrives at the Other, that is, where it's subjected to the code's existence in the Other, the locus of speech. Also, on this horizon you have what can arise in the form of what is called conscious awareness. But it's not simply conscious awareness, it's the formulation by the subject as speaking subject of his demand as such, in relation to which he situates himself – [$ ◊ D]. That this has to be able to occur is the fundamental presupposition of analysis itself. It's what occurs in the first steps in an analysis. In the foreground, but not essentially, is the subject's renewal of his demands. Of course, in a certain way it is a renewal, but it's an articulated renewal. It's in his discourse that, through the form and nature of his demand, the subject reveals the signifiers in which his demand is formulated, either directly or implicitly in his discourse – and it's surely always much more important for us when it's implicit. It's insofar as this demand is formulated in archaic signifiers that we speak, for example, of anal or oral regression.

Last time I wanted to introduce the fact that everything that arises in the nature of transference is suspended from the existence of the upper line. We can mark its beginning with a Φ and its end with a Δ, the meaning of which I will speak about later. This line is the foundation of the effect of signifiers in subjective economy.

Transference, strictly speaking, is situated relative to this line. Everything that is of the order of transference, in accordance with the analyst's action or his non-action, in accordance with his abstention or his non-abstention, always tends to get played out in this intermediary zone, but, equally, can always be brought back to the articulation of demand. Even more, it's in the nature of verbal formulation in analysis that something is being articulated on the plane of demand at every moment. But if the analytic law is that none of the subject's demands are to be satisfied, it's for no other reason than that we speculate on the fact that demand will always tend to be played out elsewhere than on the plane of precise, formulated demands, ones that are susceptible to being satisfied or not satisfied. Everybody is in agreement – what is being played out isn't that we frustrate the subject of what he can ask us on a particular occasion, whether it be simply to answer him or, in the extreme case, to hold his hand. What is being played out is a more profound frustration, one that stems from the very essence of speech insofar as it makes the horizon of demand appear, which I have quite simply called, to focus the mind, the demand for love, and which can also be the demand for something else. For example, a particular demand concerning the recognition of his being, with all the conflicts that that brings out if the analyst, through his presence, and as a semblable, denies it – the Hegelian negation in the relationship between consciousnesses looms here, if needs be. Or again, a demand to know, which, naturally, is also on the horizon of the analytic relation.

What does that have to do with symptoms? In what way can it be used for the resolution of neuroses? This is where we have to introduce the intermediary zone. 442

The four vertices of that other locus of the subject's reference to the Other, which is the imaginary locus of reference inasmuch as here it's only a false vertex, are situated in a topological relationship with these two lines insofar as they are formed by speech whenever it is articulated in speech in analysis.

The ego's narcissistic or specular relationship to the other's image is prior, lies on this, the near side and is entirely implicated in the first relation to demand. This relationship lies along the line m–a.

Beyond, the intermediary zone, the zone of all articulations, extends from the [lower] line of articulated demand to the [upper] line of its essential horizon. The upper line is also articulated, of course, since what supports it is articulated, but this doesn't mean that it's articulable, since nothing suffices to formulate what is here on the horizon – the final term, properly speaking – in any completely satisfactory manner, except by the indefinite continuation of the development of speech.

What is called desire, indicated by the small d, is located in this intermediary zone. It's desire that is properly called into question in the subject's entire economy and that is involved in what is revealed in analysis, that is, in what starts to budge in speech in a game of oscillation between the signifiers at the level of need, as it were, and what results, beyond the articulation of signifiers, from the constant presence of signifiers in the unconscious, insofar as signifiers have already moulded, formed and structured the subject. Desire, man's desire insofar as it's the Other's desire, is located in this intermediary zone. It lies beyond need, beyond the articulation of need that the subject is led to by the necessity to declare it for the Other, beyond all satisfaction of a need. It's present in the form of an absolute condition and is produced in the margin between the demand for the satisfaction of needs and the demand for love. Man's desire is always, for him, to be sought in the locus of the Other as the locus of speech, which means that desire is a desire structured in this locus of the Other.

That is the entire problematic of desire. It's what makes it subject to the dialectic and the formations of the unconscious. That is why we are involved with it and are able to have an influence on it, according to whether it is or is not articulated in speech in analysis. There would be no analysis if it weren't for this fundamental situation.

We have here, in [$$ \lozenge a$], the guarantor and support of desire, the point at which it attaches itself to its object, which, far from being 443 natural, is always formed by a particular position the subject takes in relation to the Other. Helped by this fantasmatic relation, man finds his bearings and situates his desire. Hence the importance of fantasies. Hence the rarity of the term 'instinct' in Freud – it's always a question of the drive, Trieb, the technical term we give to this desire insofar as speech isolates it, fragments it and places it in this problematic and disjointed relationship to its aim that one calls the direction of the tendency, and whose object is, moreover, subject to substitution and displacement or, indeed, to all forms of transformation and equivalents, but is also offered to love, which makes it a subject of speech.

Last time we got to the point of focusing on some studies of an obsessional neurosis which I have several times invited you to read carefully, and which have to be relevant to what is being said here, even if only because some of the terms involved – 'distance from the object', 'phallic object', 'object relation' – can't fail to invite retrospective evaluation in the light of what I am bringing you here.

I took, then, the account of the treatment of two cases of obsessional neurosis drawn from the article 'Importance de l'aspect homosexuel du transfert', ['Importance of the Homosexual Aspect of the Transference'] and I pointed out to you the problematic character of the result of this or that suggestion, let's say direction, or even interpretation. In reference to one dream in particular, I stressed how much certain presuppositions and certain simplifications of the system led to missing certain prominent elements and therefore the dream itself.

He speaks of a homosexual transference dream, as if that could have a meaning where the dream itself gives the image of what it is about, that is, a relation that is far from being dyadic. The subject, then, was transported into the analyst's bed, both at ease and in an attitude that one could describe as one of expectation, according to the manifest content, on the condition that one not neglect the explicit and essential presence of this bed. I showed you the presence of an object in the striking form of the famous bidet. One is even more astonished that the analyst doesn't dwell on this, since another text by the same author shows that he is far from ignoring the properly phallic signification of what some analysts have called the hollowed out or cuplike penis, inasmuch as it's one of the forms in which the phallus signifier can be presented at the level of the adoption of the phallic image by the female subject. This kind of Grail was at least likely to capture the attention and even give rise to some caution in one who interprets in terms of a two-person relationship.

I have read this second article again. I have also read the earlier one, which isn't the most interesting to critique, since matters there are brought to the level of the self-evident. Let's randomly choose this intervention. One similar in nature had already been given previously, but he returns to it because the subject had been pulled so far in the direction of deepening the homosexual transference that the transference situation was becoming clearer and clearer, frankly homosexual, and so he had to insist to overcome a number of silences.

> I therefore alluded to the fact that if between men there exist affective relations that are referred to by the name 'friendship' and by which nobody feels humiliated, these relations always take on a certain character of passivity for one of the partners when he finds it necessary to receive teaching, directives or some encouragement from the other. At this difficult moment the idea came to me of using an analogy that would be able to be felt de plano by this former officer. Why do men get themselves killed in combat for a leader that they love, unless it's precisely because they accept his instructions and his orders with a total absence of resistance, that is, with total passivity? They thus embrace the sentiments and thoughts of the leader to the point of identifying with him, and they sacrifice their lives as he himself would if he were to find himself in their place. [p. 425]

You can see that an intervention of this kind has to require a fairly large chunk of silence, above all when one is aware that the analyst chooses this example because his patient is an officer.

> They can only act in this way because they passively love their leader. This remark did not make all the subject's reservations disappear immediately, but it enabled him to continue to be objective when he was going to revive other homosexual situations with me, ones that were more specific. [p. 426].

And this is effectively what happens.

It's perfectly clear that the orientation of the treatment opens the door to an entire imaginary collaboration in the two-person relation between the analysand and the analyst and proceeds in a way that, as the observation itself bears out, isn't only systematic, but truly insistent. On the two planes of remembering and the analytic situation, it chooses everything in the material that goes in the simplifying direction of elaborating the two-person relation insofar as it has a homosexual signification.

Whereas the interpretation must essentially bear upon the han-445 dling of signifiers, whereas this requires that it be brief, and whereas later I will insist upon the mark that the introduction of a signifier must give it, we have here an intervention whose significant, understandable and persuasive character is manifest and which consists in inducing the subject precisely to live the analytic situation as a simple two-person relation. One does not need to be an analyst to point out that such an intervention is akin to suggestion, if only by virtue of the sole fact that it chooses one signification that it returns to three times.

This study of approximately six pages shows us the stages of the analysand's relationship to the analyst in the form of facilitating an understanding of the two-person situation in terms of homosexual relations. To be sure, homosexuality is classically presented to us in Freudian doctrine as a libidinal relationship underlying all relations considered from the social angle, but this is announced in a highly ambiguous form that doesn't enable it to be distinguished from what is strictly speaking the homosexual drive, insofar as the latter is characterized by this choice of erotic object of the sex opposite the one that the norm may wish for – which is different in nature from the libidinal underpinnings of social relations.

Whatever the theoretical difficulties thus raised, the use of this reference in this observation, and I am not saying that it's illegitimate in itself, appears in a systematic form within the therapeutics as a veritable indoctrination, and this raises the problem of the direction of the treatment overall. We can clearly see to what extent this indoctrination can have certain effects, but do you not also see, by the same token, that there is a choice here over the type of intervention with respect to obsessional neurosis? All that you know, moreover, about this subject's relationship to himself, his existence and the world, which is called an obsessional neurosis, is infinitely more complex than a relationship of libidinal attachment to the subject of his own sex, at whatever level it happens to be articulated.

From Freud's first observations, we all know the role played by the destructive drive directed at one's semblable and consequently turned back upon the subject, and we all know that many other elements are involved – elements of regression and fixation in the libidinal evolution, which are far from being as simple as one makes the famous link between the sadistic and the anal, a link that can in no way be taken as simple, or even as having been elucidated.

In short, the fact that such a direction of the treatment is full of effects turns out to be articulated into a much fuller perspective on what is going on. I am not saying that what I am contributing 446 is completely sufficient, but it already makes it possible to arrange better the different registers into which things can be put. We can situate here, in [$ ◊ a], what, in short, is a detail in the economy of the obsessional, namely the role that is played in it at one point by identification with another who is a little a, an imaginary other. This is one of the modes thanks to which the subject somehow more or less balances his obsessional economy.

It may have some therapeutic effect to go along with this, to give the subject the satisfaction of validating his relationship – which appears with regularity in the history of obsessionals – with another who is his point of reference, whose approval and criticisms he demands, and with whom he identifies as someone who is stronger than he, as the author in question says, and on whom, one can truly say, he relies as in a dream, to endorse this mechanism, which is surely a defence mechanism by which the subject balances the problematic of his relationship to the Other's desire. This may have some therapeutic effect, but it's far from having any just by itself.

Equally, the evolution of the author's work shows that things have been pushed by him in a direction that places more and more emphasis on what he calls distance from the object, which ends up being quite especially centred on the elaboration of a fantasy, the fantasy of fellatio, and not with just any phallus, but with the phallus that is a part of the imagined body of the analyst. The imaginary support derived from the semblable, the homosexual other, is embodied, materialized in this experience that is given to us as being comparable to Catholic Communion, to the ingestion of the host.

We can thus see here an elaboration of the fantasy being pursued along the same lines, this time taken further, and we can see what it produces. What it's about can be located on the schema. The relationship [$$ \lozenge a$] at the level of fantasy, that is, the level of the original fantasmatic production that makes it possible for the subject to place himself and come to terms with his desire, moves onto the level of a response to a demand, which is the level of the message. It's not for nothing that in this observation you now see the image of the good mother appear, the benevolent mother, or that he speaks of the creation of the infantile female superego. Ratifying the subject's fantasmatic production at the level of the signified of the Other, $s(A)$, reduces the complex formations of desire in the subject to the demand articulated in the subject's immediate relationship to the analyst.

'But what if it works?' you will say to me. Effectively, why not?
447 Isn't this an idea one can have of analysis? I reply that not only is it not sufficient, but that these observations themselves enable us to see that, while this orientation doesn't fail to have certain effects, what is produced is very far from the cure-effect that we might expect, like the supposed genital satisfaction that is said to be attained. How can one not see the paradox of representing it by the fact that the subject lets himself be loved by his analyst? On the contrary, we very obviously see the opposite in it. The subjective reduction of symptoms is achieved via a regressive process, not in the purely temporal sense, but in the topical sense as well, insofar as there is a reduction of everything in the order of desire – its production, organization and maintenance – onto the plane of demand. The stages of the treatment, very far from being interpretable in the sense of an amelioration and normalization of relations with the other, are marked by sudden outbursts which take various forms, including acting out.

I showed you one last year in the case of a subject strongly marked by perverse tendencies. The outcome of things was a true acting out by the subject who went to look through the door of the lavatories on the Champs-Élysées at women urinating – that is, who went in search of the woman as phallus, literally. This was the abrupt outbreak of something which was excluded under the influence of demand and made its re-entry here in the form of an isolated act in the life of the subject which had the compulsive form of an acting out and assured the presentification of a signifier as such. Further testimonies show us still other forms – for example a problematic and paradoxical infatuation in subjects for whom there are no grounds for considering them in themselves to be so-called latent homosexuals ignorant of the fact. They have what they have that is homosexual, and they have precisely no more of it than what one can see in the abrupt infatuation for a semblable when it's merely the forced production of the relationship to a – induced by this way of directing the analysis. This truly is the artificial product of the analyst's interventions. At this level, the practice lacks all critique and finesse, to a degree that discourages commentary.

This is also why I would like to take another example that issues from the work of the same author, and which, it seems to me, would have been much more interesting, and suited to showing the development that his elaborations on these subjects might have taken, had they been given a different orientation.

I have in mind the 1950 article entitled 'Incidences thérapeutiques de la prise de conscience de l'envie du pénis dans la névrose obsessionnelle féminine' ['Therapeutic Effects of Becoming Aware of Penis Envy in Obsessional Neurosis in Women'].

This observation is of great interest because we do not have all that many analyses of obsessional neurosis in women and also because it contributes to painting a picture of the problem of the sexual specificity of the neuroses. Those who might think that it's for reasons that have to do with their sex that subjects choose this or that inclination in neuroses will see on this occasion how much what is in the order of structure in neurosis leaves very little place to being determined by the position of sex, in the biological sense. Effectively, here one rediscovers, and in a very interesting manner, the famous prevalence of the phallic object that we see at play in masculine obsessional neuroses.

This is how the author conceives and articulates the progress of the analysis.

> Like the male obsessional, the woman has a need to identify with man in a regressive manner so as to be able to free herself of the anxieties of early childhood; but whereas the former will rely upon this identification to transform the infantile love object into an object of genital love . . .

This corresponds closely to what I pointed out to you earlier in the paradox of identification in the male subject – with the analyst as it happens – since she effects the passage from infantile love object to genital love object on her own, which at the very least poses a problem.

> . . . she, the woman, basing herself at first on this same identification, tends to abandon this initial object and orientate herself towards a heterosexual fixation, as if she were able to proceed to a new feminine identification, this time with the person of the analyst. [pp. 215–16]

It's said with a striking, but necessary, ambiguity that the identification with the analyst, specified as such here, and which bears upon an analyst of the male sex, ensures by itself, quite simply, as if it were self-evident, access to genitality. It's an assumption. Not imprudently, there are no great claims of extraordinary improvement in this case.

Concerning the identification with the analyst, one observes, not without a certain embarrassment, or even a certain surprise, that it occurs in two successive modes. The first is initially conflictual, that is, one of revendication and hostility with respect to the man. Then, to the extent that this relationship, as we are told, 'becomes more relaxed', a very unusual problematic present itself. The need to think of the progress of the treatment on the basis of identification obliges one to accept that the female identification with the analyst person of the analyst'. This is, surely, not an explanation we're likely to be satisfied with.

> It goes without saying that the interpretation of the transference phenomena is here particularly delicate. If the personality of the male analyst is initially apprehended as that of a man, with all the prohibitions, fears and aggressiveness that that comprises, shortly after the desire to possess the analyst's phallus . . .

This is something we will have to evaluate.

> . . . and the correlative desire to castrate him are brought to light, and if by virtue of this fact the effects of the pre-cited detente have been obtained, this personality of the male analyst is assimilated to that of a benevolent mother. Does not this assimilation demonstrate that the essential force of the anti-male aggressiveness is to be found in the initial destructive drive of which the mother was the object?

Here a Kleinian horizon will always provide some support.

> Becoming conscious of one brings with it the right to the free exercise of the other, and the liberating power of this becoming conscious of the desire to possess the phallus then becomes manifestly understandable, even as the passage from one identification to the other as a function of a fundamental ambiguity . . .

Here we reencounter the phrase mentioned earlier.

> . . . of the person of the analyst whose male aspect is initially only apparent to the patient. [p. 216]

That effectively says it all. The direction of the treatment rests upon the interpretation that it's about a desire for phallic possession and, correlatively, a desire for the castration of the analyst. On closer inspection, this is far from representing what is effectively present in the observation. I will take things in the order in which they are presented to us.

She is a woman, fifty years of age, in good health, mother of two children, practising in a paramedical profession. She comes for a series of obsessional phenomena that are of a common kind – an obsession with having contracted syphilis, and she sees in it some kind of prohibition bearing upon the marriage of her children, which moreover she was unable to prevent concerning her oldest, an obsession with infanticide, an obsession with poisoning – in short, a whole series of common obsessions in obsessional manifestations in a woman.

Even before he lists them, the author tells us about the prevailing manner of obsessions with a religious theme. As with all obsessions with a religious theme, there are all kinds of insulting, scatological phrases that impose themselves on the subject in strict contradiction with her own convictions. One of the elements that the author stresses in the subject's relationship – she is a Catholic – to religious reality is the presence of Christ's body in the host. In place of the host, she represents to herself in her imagination the masculine genital organs, without there being any question of hallucinatory 450 phenomena, as is made clear to us. Several lines further on, an important detail is pointed out concerning the principal religious theme of this obsessional woman, which is that her mother alone was responsible for her Catholic education, which only ever had the character of obligation and constraint. Her conflict with her managed to be referred onto the spiritual plane, we are told. We won't dispute that. It's a fact that has its significance.

Before we come to the type of interpretation that will be given subsequently, I would like to stop you for a moment at this symptom, which is in itself very apt to persuade me to make several remarks. The genital organs, we are told, are present there in the place of the host, and out front. What can that mean for us? I mean, for us analysts. Here, indeed, is a case where we must give this superimposition its value, if we are analysts. What do we call repression, and above all the return of the repressed, if not something that seems to influence one from below and rises to the surface, as Scripture characterizes it, or like a stain that with time floats to the surface?

Here, then, is a case in which, if we want to grant things their textual importance, as it's our position as analysts to do, we can try to articulate what it is that it's returning from.

This woman who has received a religious education must at least have, like anyone in the Christian religion, a religious sense of what Christ is. Christ is the Word, the Logos – this has been drummed into us by our Catholic education. That he is the Word made flesh isn't in doubt in the slightest, it's the most abridged form of the Credo. He is the totality of the Word. Now, what we see appearing and substituting itself for him is, in a manner that converges with all our efforts to formulate the analytic experience, what we have been led to call the privileged, unique signifier, insofar as it designates the effect of the signifier, as such, upon the signified. What is produced, then, in this symptom is the substitution, for the subject's relationship to the Word made flesh or even for the totality of the Word, of a privileged signifier which serves to designate the effect, mark, imprint or wound of signifiers as a totality, insofar as they bear upon the human subject and insofar as, via the instance of the signifier, there are things in it that come to be signified.

Let's continue with the case. What do we find further on? The subject says that she has dreamed that she was stomping on the head of Christ and crushing it, and this head, she adds, 'looked like yours'. Her associations – 'Each morning on my way to work I go past a funeral parlour in which four Christs are on display. When I look at them, I have the sensation of stepping on their penises. I feel 451 a kind of intense pleasure and anxiety' [p. 225]. We find here, once again, the identification of Christ with the Other as locus of speech. The subject crushes the figure of Christ with her heel – let's not forget that Christ is here materialized in an object, namely the crucifix, and that it's possible that in this case he is, in his totality, the phallus. We can't fail to be struck by this, above all if we continue to spell out the details that the observation provides us with.

The reproaches that she will make to her analyst about the inconvenience that through her treatment he brings into her existence are going to be materialized in the fact that she is unable to buy herself shoes. The analyst doesn't fail to recognize here the phallic value of the shoe and, in particular, of the heel that she made good use of for crushing the head of Christ. Notice in this respect that fetishism, especially shoe fetishism, is almost never observed in women. Hence, the significance of the appearance of the phallic signification of shoes at this point in the analysis. Let's try to understand it.

One doesn't have to go very far to understand it, while the analyst does everything at this moment to suggest to the subject that there is in her a desire to possess the phallus. In itself, this is perhaps not, my goodness, the worst thing he could say, if it were not for the fact that for him that means that the subject has the desire to be a man. Which she doesn't stop contradicting and protests with the greatest energy, right to the end, that she has never had the desire to be a man. Effectively, perhaps desiring to possess the phallus and desiring to be a man are not the same thing, since analytic theory itself supposes that things can resolve themselves in a very natural manner, and who wouldn't inform themselves about it?

But let's see how the analysand replies at this point. 'When I am well dressed' – that is, when I'm wearing pretty shoes – 'men desire me, and I tell myself, with very real joy, "And now they too will get their comeuppance. I am happy imagining that they will suffer as a result"' [p. 223]. In short, she brings the analyst back to solid, economical ground, namely – if there is a relationship to the phallus in her relations with man, what is it?

Let's try to spell this out ourselves.

There are several elements here, and first off the relationship with the mother, which we are told is profound, essential and truly coherent with the real subject. We are told about the mother's relations with the father, which have manifested themselves in several ways, in particular that the father had not been able to overcome the wife's attachment to a first, incidentally platonic, love. If such a thing is indicated in the observation, it must have occupied a certain place.

452 The subject's relations with her mother are presented to us thus – she judges her in the most favourable manner in every respect, more intelligent than her father, she is fascinated by her energy and so on.

> The rare moments when her mother relaxed filled her with an unspeakable joy . . .. She always considered that her younger sister was preferred over her . . .. Also, moreover, anybody who interfered in this union with her mother became the object of death wishes, as is shown by important material, either oneiric or infantile, relative to the desire for the death of her sister. [p. 219]

Is this not sufficient to show that what is in question is, as I have stressed to you, what the subject's relationship to her mother's desire is? The problem of desire is introduced into the subject's life early, is particularly manifest in the history of obsessionals and results in the fact that the subject envisages her end for herself, not as having this or that, but as first being the object of the mother's desire, with what that entails – that is, deducing what is, but is unknown. Everything that, for the subject, henceforth binds approaching her own desire to an effect of destruction and, at the same time, defines this desire's approach as such to the phallus, insofar as in itself it is the signifier of the effect of desire in the subject's life, will depend on the object of the mother's desire.

For the subject in question, the problem is not, as in the phobic, for example, whether the mother has the phallus or not, it's what the effect in the Other is of this x that is desire, in other words, what he himself will be – whether he is or isn't what the Other's desire is. This is what we see coming into the foreground here. It's quite nice that it's with respect to the Logos made flesh, namely the Other as marked by the word, that the substitution of the phallus signifier occurs at this point and at this level.

I will formulate my thoughts further. Freud saw and designated the frontier of analysis as stopping at a point that in certain cases, he says, prove to be irreducible, leaving this sort of wound that for the subject is the castration complex. Its prevailing manifestation can be summarized, in short, as this – man, the male, can only have the phallus against the background of the fact that he doesn't have it, and that the same thing exactly is present in woman, namely that she doesn't have the phallus against the background of the fact that she has it, for otherwise how would it be possible for her to be enraged by this irreducible Penisneid? Don't forget that Neid doesn't simply mean a wish but means that that renders me literally enraged. All the underpinnings of aggressiveness and anger are indeed in this original Neid, both in modern German and, even more so, in old 453 forms of German and even Anglo-Saxon.

If on one occasion Freud recorded there the unendlich, infinite, projected to infinity, which was poorly translated as 'interminable', character of what can happen in an analysis, it's undoubtedly, after all, because there were things that he did not see or that he had not had the opportunity to encounter or articulate, although many indications in his work go in this direction, and specially his final article on the Spaltung of the ego, which I shall come back to. He doesn't see that the solution to the problem of castration in both man and woman doesn't revolve around the dilemma of having or not having the phallus, for the solution is only found when the subject perceives that there is one thing that is in any case to be recognized, which is that he isn't the phallus. It's from the moment of realization in analysis that the subject isn't the phallus that he is capable of normalizing his natural position, and that he either has it or doesn't have it. That's the final term, the ultimate signifying relationship around which it's possible to resolve the imaginary dead-end created by the function that the image of the phallus comes to adopt at the level of the signifying plane.

This is exactly what happens in the case of our subject under the effect of the first manifestations of her being caught in the mechanism of the transference, which is a more elaborate articulation of symptomatic effects. In a way that is completely recognizable in what I have just quoted to you today, she presents the shoe fantasy to herself.

It's a question of the possession or non-possession of feminine or phallic shoes, the shoes that in this particular case we will call fetishistic. What function does the shoe adopt for a masculine subject, inasmuch as what he rejects in his perversion is that the woman is castrated? The fetishist's perversion in the masculine subject consists in affirming that the woman has it against the background of not having it. Without that, there would be no need of an object to represent it – an object which, on top of everything else, is manifestly independent of the woman's body. Well then, as the transference is developing, the subject goes about fomenting the following, which in appearance is the same thing, namely that she has it. She stresses that she wants to have it in the form of clothing, in the form of these clothes that will excite men's desire, and owing to which, as she expresses it, she will be able to disappoint them in their desire. In appearance it's the same thing, but it's completely different according to whether it's posed by the subject herself, that is, by the woman, or by the man opposite. Also, what she demonstrates when the occasion arises is that by wanting to present herself as having 454 what she knows perfectly well she doesn't have, at issue is something that for her has a completely different value, which I have called the value of masquerade. She makes a mask of her femininity.

On the basis of the fact that the phallus is for her the signifier of desire, the issue is that she presents the appearance of it, appears to be it. The issue for her is being the object of a desire, and a desire that she herself knows full well she can only disappoint. She expresses it explicitly when the analyst interprets it for her as being about a desire to possess the phallus, which shows us once again the divergence that is established between being the object of the Other's desire and having or not having the organ that bears its mark.

We come, then, to a formula, which is the following – the original desire is, 'I want to be what she, the mother, desires.' In order to be it, I must destroy what at present is the object of her desire.

The subject wishes to be what the mother's desire is. What she needs to be brought to see in the treatment is that man isn't the object of this desire in himself, that man is no more the phallus than woman is, whereas what constitutes her aggressiveness with respect to her husband as a man – I will show this to you even more clearly next time – is that she considers that he is, I'm not saying that he has, that he is the phallus, and it's in the name of this that he is her rival and that her relations with him are marked by the sign of obsessional destruction.

According to the essential form of obsessional economy, this desire for destruction turns back against her. The aim of the treatment is to bring to her awareness that 'you are yourself that which you want to destroy, insofar as you, too, wish to be the phallus'. In a certain way of pursuing the treatment, the 'You are this that you wish to destroy' is replaced by a desire for the destruction of the analyst's phallus, captured in improbable and fleeting fantasies. 'You want to destroy my phallus, the phallus of your analyst,' the analyst says, 'and so, I give it to you.' In other words, the conception of the treatment is that the analyst fantasmatically gives the phallus and consents to a desire of phallic possession. Now, this isn't what is at issue, and one of the proofs of this is that at the almost final point to which the analysis seems to have been pursued, we are told that the patient retains all her obsessions except that they no longer cause her anxiety. They have all been ratified by the analysis, and they jam up. The fact that they still exist is of some importance.

What does the patient do? The observation states this in total innocence – she intervenes with her oldest son with all her force, a son of whom she has always been scared stiff, because in fact he is the only one whose masculine reactions she has never been able to 455 master very well, by telling him that he urgently needs to go and do an analysis himself. What does that mean, if not that she hands back this phallus that the analyst thinks is the solution to the situation, insofar as he himself, taking the position of the benevolent mother, gives it to the patient. At the one point at which she effectively has the phallus, she returns it to him. Give-and-take.

The analyst has oriented the entire analysis around this, which is that the patient wishes to be a man. Right to the end, she is not entirely convinced of this. However, it's true that possessing or not possessing this phallus brought her some appeasement. But the heart of the matter, the essential, isn't resolved – the signification of the phallus as the signifier of desire.

Today is the 18th June. The part the signifier plays in politics – the signifier 'no' when everybody is sliding towards dreadful consent – hasn't ever been studied to date. The 18th June is also the anniversary of the foundation of the French Society of Psychoanalysis. We also said 'No' at one moment.

Last time I began commenting on the case of an obsessional woman treated by one of our colleagues, and I started to outline several of the principles that can be deduced from the way we formulate things and that make it possible to form an opinion as to the well or poorly directed way in which a treatment is conducted when centred on a phenomenon that obviously exists in the material brought by the analysis, namely, the coming to consciousness of penis envy.

Although overall I think you see the value of the use we make of our schema and categories, there are naturally always some who are a little behind. Certain schemas that you have pondered and conceptual oppositions that you found easy to retain find themselves a little shaken up and put back in question by developments as we progress – and this disconcerts you.

Someone was wondering, for example, whether one wasn't compelled to see a contradiction between what I contributed last time and a principle that it was thought we could settle on. In summary, I am supposed to have said – at least this is what was heard – that the sexual development of women was obliged to go via this, which was that she has to be the phallus against the background of not being it, and that for the man, the castration complex can be formulated as this, that he has the phallus against the background of 458 not having it, or of being threatened with not having it. These are obviously schemas to which, from a certain angle, one can oppose this or that phase of sexual development. It's completely insufficient to remain there, since the dialectic of being and having also applies to them both.

The man must also realize that he isn't it. This is even the direction in which we can situate a portion of the problems implicated in the solution to the castration complex and Penisneid. We shall see this in more detail, which will enable you, I hope, to reposition statements that are not false in themselves, but which constitute partial views.

With this aim in mind, we will start again from our schema today.

It's exceedingly important to suitably articulate the different lines along which psychoanalysis develops. An article that I advise you to read on the matter is one by Glover called 'Therapeutic Effects of Inexact Interpretation', which appeared in October 1931 in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis.

This is one of the most remarkable and intelligent articles that could be written on such a subject. It truly clarifies the starting point from which to examine the question of interpretation.

At the time Glover is writing Freud is still alive, but he has already produced the great turning point in analytic technique around the analysis of resistances and aggressiveness. Glover claims that this orientation in analysis implies the path or the covering, one might say, in the sense in which one has to cover ground, of the sum of phantasy systems,* that we have learnt to recognize in analysis owing to the accumulation of experience and the development of acquired notions.

It's clear that we know a lot more about it now than right at the start of analysis, and the question arises regarding the worth of our therapeutics at the time at which we didn't know the whole range of these fantasy systems. Were incomplete therapeutic treatments less valuable than those we undertake today? It's a very interesting question, and it leads Glover to draw up a general situation about all the positions taken by whoever finds himself in the position of consultant in relation to every kind of disorder. Having done this, he generalizes and extends the notion of interpretation to every 459 formulated position taken by whomever one consults and draws up a scale of the different positions of the doctor in relation to the patient.

There is here an anticipation of the doctor–patient relation, as we say today, but articulated in a manner which has not been developed along these lines, and which I regret, because it poses a sort of general law, namely, that insofar as we misrecognize the truth included in a symptom, we find ourselves complicit in symptomatic formations.

This begins with the general practitioner who says to the patient, 'Get a grip on yourself, go to the country, get a new pastime.' He resolutely places himself in a position of misrecognition, and by virtue of this fact immediately occupies a certain place, that isn't ineffective, since it can be very well recognized as the very place in which certain symptoms are formed. His function in relation to the patient can be situated using the very terms of analytic topography. I'll say no more.

Glover observes at one point that the tendency of the modern therapeutic analysis* of his time is to bring all interpretation to bear on sadistic systems and guilt reactions, and that till recently none of that had been emphasized. There's no doubt that one alleviated the patient's anxiety, but one left this famous sadistic system unresolved, unsuppressed and consequently repressed.

That's an example of the direction in which he takes his remarks, and it's indeed something it would be interesting to return to today.

What does it mean, for example, when one speaks of the advent of the analysis of aggressiveness? For a time, analysts were so impressed by the discovery they had made that it had become a standing joke. Analysts in training would greet one another by saying, 'And so, have you analysed your aggressiveness?' We can locate what this discovery represented, effectively, on our fundamental schema. It's what I was trying to do earlier, for in the end we can also wonder about this. When I was teaching you that the narcissistic system was fundamental to the formation of aggressive reactions, I would often observe how much our use of the term 'aggressiveness' was marked by ambiguity. The aggressiveness provoked in the imaginary relationship with the little other can't be confused with the sum of aggressive power.

To recall things that are self-evident, violence is essential to aggression, at least on the human plane. It isn't speech, it's even the 460 exact contrary. What can be produced in any relationship between humans is violence or speech. If violence, in its essence, is differentiated from speech, the question arises of the extent to which violence as such – to differentiate it from the use we make of the term 'aggressiveness' – can be repressed, since we have made it a principle that, in principle, only what reveals itself to have attained the structure of speech, that is, a signifying articulation, can be repressed. If what belongs to the order of aggressiveness comes to be symbolized and captured in the mechanism of what is repression, unconsciousness, what is analysable, and even, let's say, as a general rule, what is interpretable, it's from the angle of the murder of the semblable, who is latent in the imaginary relationship.

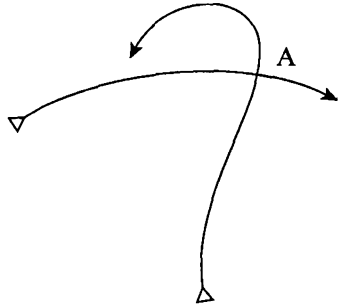
Let's again spell out our little schema in its simplest form, which shows us the intersection of the tendency – the drive, if you wish, insofar as it represents an individualized need – with the signifying chain into which it has to be articulated. This already makes it possible for us to make several remarks.



Let's make a supposition. Let's suppose that for the human being there is only reality, this famous reality that we make use of willy-nilly. Suppose that that's all there is. It isn't unthinkable that something signifying articulates this reality. To focus your mind, let's suppose that, as some schools say, a signifier is simply a kind of conditioning – I won't say of reflexes, but of something that is reducible to reflexes.

The fact that language belongs to another order than that which we artificially create in animals in the laboratory by teaching them to secrete gastric juices at the sound of a bell does not prevent the sound of the bell from being a signifier. One may therefore suppose a human world completely organized around a coalescence of each of the needs that are to be satisfied, with a number of predetermined signs. If these signs are valid for everyone, this 461 must in principle make an ideally functioning society. Every expression of the drive commensurate with needs will be associated with a diverse and varied sound of the bell, which will function in such a way that he who hears it will immediately satisfy the said need.

This is how we arrive at the ideal society. What I am depicting is what has always been dreamt of by utopians, namely a perfectly functioning society, and it culminates in the satisfaction of each according to his needs. One adds, to be honest, that everyone participates according to their merits, and that's where the problems start.

In short, if this schema remains at the level of the intersection of the signifiers and the thrust or tendency of need, where does it end? In the subject's identification with the Other, insofar as the latter articulates the distribution of the resources that are capable of responding to need. This isn't how it is, thanks to the sole fact that it is necessary to take the background of demand into account, even if it is only to explain the subject's articulation into an order that exists beyond the order of the real, which we call the symbolic order, and which complicates it, superimposes itself on it, but does not adhere to it.

However, already at this level, something of a natural, organic order intervenes, as soon as this simple state of the schema exists, and complicates it, at least in man.

The subject is here, the mythical child who acts as the background to our psychoanalytic speculations. He starts expressing his needs in the presence of his mother. It's here, in A, that he encounters the mother as a speaking subject, and it's here, in $s(A)$, that the message ends, at the point at which the mother satisfies him. As I have already pointed out, it's not at the point at which the mother does not satisfy him, frustrates him, that the problems begin. That would be too simple, although one always comes back to this, precisely because it is simple.

The interesting problem did not go undetected by a Winnicott, for example, whose mind and practice, as we know, cover the entire range of the current development and techniques of psychoanalysis up to and including an extremely precise consideration on the fantasmatic systems that are in the field bordering on psychosis. In his article on transitional objects, which I have mentioned to you, Winnicott shows with the greatest precision that the essential problem is to know how the child emerges from satisfaction, and not from frustration, to construct a world for himself.

462 Inasmuch as a world that comprises something beyond demand is articulated for a human subject, it's when demand is satisfied, and not when it's frustrated, that what Winnicott calls transitional objects appear, that is, these little objects that very early on we see assuming an extreme importance in the relationship with the mother – a piece of nappy that the child pulls at jealously, a scrap of anything, a rattle. It's essential to appreciate how early this transitional object is in the child's system of development.

That said, let's pause at frustration, that is, at what happens when the message does not arrive.

The relationship with the mother, where the mother imposes, more than her law, what I have called her omnipotence or capriciousness, is complicated by the fact that, as experience shows, the child – the human child and not just any young – is open to an imaginary-order relationship with the image of one's own body and the image of the other, and at a date we tried to determine three years ago when we were interested in the mirror stage.

The mirror stage hasn't just evaporated since. I am very fond of those of you who say that every year brings something different and that the system changes. It doesn't change, but I am simply trying to get you to cover the field. On our schema, we can see that the mirror stage is placed prior to what occurs on the line of the return from need, whether satisfied or not. The subject experiences, for example, reactions of disappointment, unease or dizziness in his own body in relation to the ideal image he has of it and which assumes a predominant value in him because of a feature of his organization that we have tied, with more or less justification, to the prematurity of his birth.

In short, from the outset we can see two circuits interfering with one another. The first is the symbolic circuit in which – let's say, so as to give you an idea, something familiar for you to hang your hat on – the subject's relationship with the infantile female superego is inscribed. There is, on the other hand, the imaginary relationship with the ideal self-image that finds itself more or less affected, even damaged, by frustrations or disappointments. Thus, it turns out that the circuit is being played out on two planes from the outset, a symbolic plane and an imaginary plane. On the one hand, the relationship to the primordial object – the mother or the Other as locus where the possibility of formulating need in signifiers is located. On the other, the image of the other, little a, where the subject has a kind of link to himself, to an image that represents the line of his 463 own completion – imaginary completion, of course.

Everything that we have said since the beginning of the year, when we started to take things at the level of wit, has shown us the relevance of what this schema indicates, namely that nothing in mental life corresponding to what analytic experience gives us can be organized unless there exists, beyond the Other placed primordially in the position of omnipotence by its power – not of frustration, for that's insufficient, but of Versagung, with the ambiguity of promise and refusal that this word contains – the Other of this Other, as it were, that is, what makes it possible for the subject to become aware of this Other, the locus of speech, as itself symbolized.

You get the sense that the system of the familial Oedipal triangle comprises something more radical than anything that this social experiment of the family gives us, and indeed it is this that gives this Oedipal triangle and the Freudian discovery their permanence. This is why I told you that there the Father, with a capital F, is never just a father, but rather the dead father, the father as the vehicle of a signifier, a second-order signifier that authorizes and founds the entire system of signifiers and makes it possible for the first Other, that is, the first subject to whom the speaking subject addresses himself, itself to be symbolized.

The articulated, human world is able to assume its proper dimension solely at the level of this Other, the Other of the law properly so called, a law – I am going to insist on this – that is embodied. Experience shows us the extent to which an Other in the background in relation to the Other is indispensable and without which the universe of language cannot be articulated, this universe such as it shows itself to be effective in the structuration, not only of needs, but also of this thing called desire whose original dimensions I am trying to demonstrate to you this year.

If the Other qua locus of speech were able to be simply the locus of the sound of the bell I was talking about before, it would not be an Other strictly speaking, but only the organized locus of the system of signifiers that introduced order and regularity into the vital exchanges within a particular species.

It's difficult to see who could have organized this. It's possible to envisage that in a given society men full of benevolence spend their time planning it and getting it to work. It's even possible to say that this is one of the ideals of modern politics. It's just that that isn't what the Other is.

The Other isn't purely and simply the locus of this perfectly organized and fixed system. It is itself a symbolized Other, and this 464 is what gives it its appearance of freedom. The Other, potentially the Father, the locus in which the law is articulated, is itself subject to the signifying articulation and, even more than subject to signifying articulation, it's marked by it, with the denaturing effect that the presence of signifiers entails.

What this is about is still far from having come to a state of perfect conceptualization, but, in the name of a working hypothesis to illustrate my thought, I would say that the effect of signifiers upon the Other, the mark that it suffers at this level, represents castration as such.

With respect to the triad of castration–frustration–privation, I have previously emphasized that in castration the agent is real, it's a real father that one needs, that the action is symbolic, and that it bears upon an imaginary object. Here again we find that this is necessary. As soon as something real happens at the level of the law, and it matters not whether the father is more or less deficient here or whether something replaces him, takes his place, the following occurs – its background is reflected in the system of demand in which the subject is instated. Far from the system of demand being perfect, fully productive or in full use, it introduces into itself, in the background, the effect of signifiers on the subject, the mark of signifiers on the subject and the dimension of lack these signifiers introduce into the subject.

This introduced lack is symbolized as such in the system of signifiers as the effect of signifiers on the subject, that is, the signified. Strictly speaking, the signified does not arise so much from the depths, as if life lived on significations, but from language and signifiers, and this imprints this sort of effect that is called the signified upon life. This symbolization is primitive, as indicated by what I have contributed on castration.

What acts as a support for the symbolic action called castration is an image chosen from the imaginary system as its support. The symbolic action of castration chooses its sign, which is borrowed from the imaginary domain. Something in the image of the other is chosen to carry the mark of a lack, which is this very lack by which the living thing, because it's human – that is, has a relationship to language – sees itself as excluded from the omnitude of desires, as something limited, as local, as a creature, sometimes as a link in the lineage of life, one of those through whom life passes. Each animal is effectively only one of the individuals that realize the type, and in the name of this, in relation to the type, each individual may be considered already dead. We, too, we are already dead in relation to the movement of life. But through language, and by contrast with animals, we are capable of projecting this move- 465 ment in its totality, and even more, in its totality as having arrived at its end.

This is exactly what Freud articulates in the notion of the death instinct. He means that for man life is already projected as having arrived at its conclusion, that is, at the point at which it returns to death. Man is this animal-being captured and articulated in a signifying system that makes it possible for him to dominate his immanence as a living thing and perceive himself as already dead. And he only does it in an imaginary, virtual or even speculative manner.

There is, of course, no corresponding experience of death, which is why it's symbolized in another way. It's symbolized by the specific organ where the thrust of life appears in its most tangible form. That is why it's the phallus, insofar as it represents the rise of vital power, that takes its place in the order of signifiers and represents what is marked by signifiers – that which signifiers strike with the essential decline where this lack-in-being [manque-à-être], the scale of which signifiers introduce into the life of a subject, can be articulated.

This is what makes it possible for us to understand the order in which things presented themselves to us for analysis, once one has not simply gone from the School to the phenomenon, but starts with the phenomena as one sees them appear in the neuroses. They were the ground chosen to manifest that articulation in its essence, because it is here that it appears in its disorder. Our experience has proven to us that it has always been in disorder that we could more easily learn to uncover the inner workings and articulations of order.

What initially revealed itself, through Freud, to an experience that immediately made the underpinnings of the castration complex evident was the apprehension of subjects' symptoms.

What does 'symptom' mean? Where is it located on this schema?

It's located at the level of signification. This is what Freud contributed – a symptom is a signification, it's a signified. Far from involving solely the subject, his history and his entire anamnesis are implicated. That is why one can legitimately symbolize it in this place by a small $s(\mathrm{A})$, signified of the Other coming from the locus of speech.

466 But what Freud also taught us is that a symptom is never simple and that it's always overdetermined. There is no symptom whose signifier has not been provided by a prior experience. This experience is always located at the level involving what is suppressed. Now, the heart of everything that is suppressed in the subject is the castration complex. It's the signifier of barred A that is articulated in the castration complex but neither necessarily nor always totally articulated therein.

What is the famous traumatism we began with, the famous primal scene that enters into the subject's economy, which is in play at the heart and on the horizon of the discovery of the unconscious? What is it, if not a signifier whose impact on life I began describing to you earlier? The living being is grasped as living, as alive, but with this gap or distance that is precisely what constitutes both the signifying dimension's autonomy and the trauma or primitive scene. What is this, then, if it's not this life that grasps itself in a horrible apperception of itself, in its total foreignness and opaque brutality as the pure signifier of an intolerable existence for life itself as soon as it moves away from it to see the trauma and the primal scene? This is how life sees itself as a signifier in a pure state, which can in no way be articulated or resolved. When Freud begins to formulate what a symptom is, the signifiers in the background in relation to the signified are implicated by him in the formation of every symptom.

What we have been studying recently in the hysteric makes it possible for us to locate where the problem of neurosis is to be found. It stems from the relationship signifiers have with the position of the subject dependent on demand. This is why the hysteric has to articulate something that we will provisionally call her desire and this desire's object insofar as it isn't the object of need. This is what led me to insist somewhat on the so-called dream by the butcher's beautiful wife.

It appears there in a completely clear fashion, and Freud says it at the very dawn of psychoanalysis – that for the hysteric the question is one of making the object of desire subsist as distinct from and independent of the object of all need. The relationship to desire, to its constitution and to its being maintained in an enigmatic form in the background in relation to all demand is the hysteric's problem.

What is my hysteric's desire? It's what opens up for her, I won't say the universe, but an entire world that is already quite vast indeed, by virtue of what one can call the dimension of hysteria latent in every kind of human being in the world. The hysteric finds 467 herself initially going straight to the point by means of anything that can pose as a question about her own desire, what I have called the x, the inexpressible desire, with whatever might happen in this order to all her hysterical brothers and sisters – and it's on that, as Freud formulates it, that hysterical identification is based. All hysterics respond to everything in the order of questions about desire as they currently arise for others, above all for hysterical others, but also for others who may be hysterical only occasionally, even in a latent manner, inasmuch as a hysterical way of posing the question is apparent in them.

For the hysteric, this question about her desire opens up the world to her, a world of identifications that place her in a special relationship with the mask, I mean with anything that in any way is able to fix and symbolize, according to a certain type, the question about desire. This question, which allies her to other hysterics and which is an appeal to hysterics as such, has essentially identified her with a sort of general mask under which every possible mode of lack is active.

We now come to the obsessional. The obsessional's structure, such as I am trying to make progress into it, is also indicated by a particular relationship to desire. This isn't the relationship d_x, but another, which today I will call d_o.

The obsessional's relationship to his desire is subject to the fact, which we are long familiar with thanks to Freud, that an early role is played therein by what is called the Entbindung, the unbinding of the drives, the isolation of destruction. The entire structure of the obsessional is, as such, determined by the fact that the initial access to his desire is through the Other's desire, as it is for every subject, and by the fact that the Other's desire is initially destroyed and annulled. In saying this, I am not saying anything terribly new, I am simply articulating it in a new way.

Those who already have an obsessional in hand may know that it's an essential trait of his condition that his own desire decreases, blinks, wavers and disappears the closer he gets to it. Desire shows itself here to bear the mark of the fact that desire has initially been encountered by the subject as something that destroys itself, inasmuch as it presented itself to him as that of his rival, and he responded to it in the style of this reaction of destruction that is subjacent to his relationship to the image of the other insofar as it dispossesses and ruins him. The obsessional's approach to his desire remains, therefore, struck by this mark such that every time he approaches it, it disappears.

468 This is what the author I am talking about and have been critiquing for several lessons perceives in the form of what he calls distance from the object, which he initially confuses with what he calls the object's destruction. He has the idea about the psychology of the obsessional that he is someone who has to perpetually defend himself from madness, defined as the object's destruction. That is only a projection which stems from the inadequacies of the said author's thought on the theoretical plan, but where personal factors also enter, for it's only a fantasy, a fantasy in some ways required by the imaginary perspective from which he engages with the solution to the problem of desire for the obsessional. Moreover, it's common experience that there isn't the slightest danger of psychosis for the typical obsessional, wherever you lead him – and I will tell you, when the moment comes, to what extent an obsessional differs in structure from a psychotic.

On the other hand, what has been perceived therein, although poorly translated, is that the obsessional only maintains a possible relationship with his desire from a distance. What has to be maintained for the obsessional is the distance from his desire and not the distance from the object. The object in this instance has quite a different function. What experience shows us in the clearest of manners is that he has to maintain himself at a certain distance from his desire for this desire to subsist.

But there is another facet that can be observed in the clinical setting, concretely, when the obsessional establishes a relationship with the other that is fully formulated at the level of demand, whether it concerns his mother, initially, or his spouse. What can this term 'spouse' mean for us analysts? It becomes fully articulated at the level at which we are trying to situate things. He or she is the one with whom it's always necessary, one way or another, whether one likes it or not, to return to being in a relationship of demand. Even if one shuts up over a whole range of things, it's never painless. Demand demands to be pushed to the end.

What happens on the plane of the obsessional's relationships with his or her spouse? It's very exactly this, which is the most subtle thing to see, but you will observe it if you make the effort – the obsessional spends his time destroying the Other's desire. Entering into the obsessional's domain ends, in the normal case, if one gets taken in by it, with a muted attack or permanent erosion which tends to culminate in the abolition, devaluation and disparagement in the other of what is his own desire.

There are no doubt nuances. These are terms that require practice 469 at handling, but in the absence of these terms, nothing would make it possible for us even to perceive the true nature of what is happening. I have already highlighted elsewhere, in the obsessional's infancy, the quite special, accentuated character that the articulation of demand assumes for him early on.

You are beginning to be able to situate him on this schema. This small child is always demanding something, and the surprising thing is that of all children who effectively spend their time demanding something, he is the one whose demand is always experienced, and by those who have the best intentions, as being properly speaking unbearable. He is a pest, as we say. It's not that he asks for things that are more extraordinary than others do. It's in the way he demands them. The specific character of the formulation of demand for one who is already obsessional when it manifests itself at the time of the decline of the Oedipus complex or in the so-called latency period lies in the subject's relationship to demand.

As for our hysteric, we have seen that in order to sustain her enigmatic desire, the little a for her is employed as an artifice. We can represent it with two parallel tensions – one at the level of the idealizing formation, [$$ \lozenge a$], the other at the level of the identification with a little other, i(a). Think of Dora's feelings towards Herr

K. Incidentally, every hysteric has a comparable support in one or other phases of her history and comes to play the same role as a.

The hysteric's circuit

The obsessional does not take the same route. He is more centred on coming to terms with the problem of his desire. He starts from 470 a different place and with other elements. It's in a certain early and essential relationship with his demand, [$ ◊ D], that he is able to maintain the necessary distance for this desire – annulled in its essence, this blind desire whose position must be assured – to be possible for him somewhere, but from a distance. We are going to circumscribe the obsessional's relationship with his desire. The subject's specific relationship to his demand is one of its first traits. There are more.

What is an obsession? You know the importance that the verbal form has therein, to the point where one can say that an obsession is always verbalized. Freud is in no doubt about this. Even when dealing with latent obsessional behaviour, he only considers that it has revealed its structure when it adopts the form of a verbal obsession. He even goes so far as to say that in the treatment of an obsessional neurosis the first steps have been taken only when one has obtained the full development of the subject's symptoms, which can present itself as a worsening, clinically.

What is at question in all obsessional forms is well and truly articulated destruction. Is there a need to insist upon the verbal character of the formulas of undoing that are a part of the structure of the obsession itself? Everybody knows that what makes its essence and power phenomenologically anxiety-provoking for the subject is that it's about destruction through words and signifiers. The subject finds himself prey to what one calls magical – I don't know why, why not quite simply say 'verbal'? – destruction of the Other, which is given in the very structure of symptoms.

You have seen the hysteric's circuit which terminates on the two 471 planes – idealization or identification at the upper level is the symbolization paralleling what takes place on the imaginary plane. If I have allowed myself to use this schema to the end and inscribed the destructive schema of the relationship to the other on it, I would say that for the obsessional the circuit goes something like this.

The obsessional's circuit

The fear of harming the Other with one's thoughts, tantamount to saying with one's words, brings us to an entire phenomenology which it would be worth dwelling on for a good bit of time. I don't know if you've ever been interested in the theme of blasphemy. It makes a very good introduction to verbal obsessions. What is blasphemy? I'd very much like some theologian to give me an answer. Let's say that blasphemy diminishes a pre-eminent signifier, where it's a question of ascertaining at what level of signifying authorization, as it were, it is located. This signifier is related to the supreme signifier called the Father, with which it should not be completely confused, even if it plays a homologous role. That God has a relationship to signifying creation as such isn't in doubt, nor is the fact that blasphemy is situated solely in this dimension. Blasphemy diminishes this signifier to the rank of object. In a way, it identifies the Logos with its metonymic effect and brings it down a notch. This remark undoubtedly does not constitute a full response to the question of blasphemy, but it's surely an approach to the phenomenon of the verbal sacrilege that can be observed in obsessionals.

As always, it's again in Freud that we find the most colossally exemplary things. Recall the episode in the case of the Rat Man of this furious anger that grips him towards his father at the age of four, if my memory is correct. He starts rolling around on the ground, calling him, 'You towel, you plate, and so on.' There is a veritable collision and collusion between the essential 'you' of the Other and this diminished effect of the introduction of signifiers into the human world, which is called an object and especially an inert object, an object of exchange, of equivalences. The multitude of substantives summoned up in the child's rage indicate this well enough. It's not a question of knowing whether the father is a lamp, a plate or a towel. It's about bringing the Other down to the level of an object and destroying it.

Since we're obliged to leave it there for today, I would say that what is happening here, the structure of which we shall see next time, shows us that it is only with a particular articulation of signifiers that the obsessional subject manages to preserve the Other, so much so that the effect of destruction is also the means by which he aspires to sustain it by virtue of the articulation of signifiers.
472 You find here the very fabric of the world in which the obsessional lives. The obsessional is a man who lives amongst signifiers. He is very firmly installed amongst them. There is absolutely nothing to fear with respect to psychosis. This signifier suffices to preserve the dimension of the Other in him, but it is a dimension that in some way is idolized [idôlatrée]. French makes it possible to formulate this in a manner that I once introduced here – 'Thou art the one who will . . . '. That's what the subject formulates to the Other.

For the obsessional that is where it stops. Full speech in which the subject's engagement is articulated into a fundamental relationship with the Other can't be achieved, unless by this repetition that a comedian used to make use of. 'To be or not . . .', and the guy scratches his head before continuing, 'To be or not, to be or not', and so on. And it's in repeating it that he finds the end of the sentence, 'Tu es celui qui me, tu es celui qui me, tu es celui qui me tues', 'You are the one who, you are the one who, you are the one who kills me.'

Here the French language gives us a fundamental schema of the obsessional relationship with the Other. The formulation that founds it ends on the Other's destruction, but because this is a signifying articulation, it makes the Other subsist as a result.

Within this formulation we see what the place of the phallus signifier is with respect to being and having, which is where we stopped at the end of our last session. This will enable us to see the difference between a solution that enables the obsessional to show what really is his relationship to the phallus, as the signifier of the Other's desire, and one that consists in satisfying demand in a sort of imaginary mirage by granting him his object through the symbolization of an imaginary fantasy by the analyst. This is the dimension in which the entire observation that we have been critiquing unfolds. The illusory solution consists, in short, in saying to the woman, 'You envy the penis? Well then . . .'. This is what Casimir-Perier said to a guy who had him cornered up against a streetlamp: 'What do you want?' The guy replies, 'Freedom!' 'Well then, you have it,' Casimir says to him, slips through his legs and goes off, leaving him dumbstruck.

This may not be quite what we would expect from an analytic solution. The very termination of the case by a euphoric identification, intoxicating for the subject, the description of which completely matches a masculine ideal located in the analyst, perhaps brings a change in the subject's equilibrium, but this is surely not a genuine response to the obsessional's question.

EXITING VIA THE SYMPTOM

From the speech of the Other to the unconscious
The significance of regression
Why we are not monkeys
The psychotic and the Other's desire
The neurotic and the image of the other

We got to the point last time of starting to circle around the constellation of the obsessional's desire.

I spoke to you in this regard about the position of his demand, whose especially insistent character that renders it so difficult to tolerate is experienced very early by the Other, about his need to destroy the Other's desire, and about the function of some of his fantasies. My intention today is thus under way.

In the work I have chosen to make the object of a critique that stems less from a polemic than from a systematic analysis of all that emerges from what the author himself formulates, it isn't pointless that the phallic fantasy should present itself in the form of penis envy in the woman over the course of the analysis of an obsessional neurosis. This is not the work that will prove that I give an exaggerated importance to the phallus signifier. But the importance of the phallus signifier is not all I teach you. There's also the question of knowing how to make use of it – without, for all that, going in for a facile little game of criticizing and judging from the outside the outcome of a treatment that, in any case, is presented as unfinished and that we have not entered into. Let's simply say that none of what I give you as the significant elements in the direction of the treatment are not to be found. The general direction of the treatment is remarkable for its hesitations, even for a direction that is frankly opposed to the one that to us might seem logical.

My critique never starts just with the case considered as a factual report, but with the author's own questions, which you will always find expressed at the right moment, for it's one of the properties of the human mind that common sense in particular is, as has been said 474 with reason and not without irony, the most fairly distributed thing in the world. There is no doubt that what is an obstacle here for us was already an obstacle in the mind of authors, and in this case these obstacles are clearly articulated. There are questions, there are even remarks concerning the paradoxical outcome, the non-outcome of what one was looking for, and there are, finally, contradictions which the author does not perhaps give as much importance to as he might have, but which may be described as contradictions since they appear in black and white in his text.

I will first go straight to the heart of the matter and raise the difference between, on the one hand, what is represented as articulated, and not as articulable, and, on the other hand, what the aim was and what was actually achieved in this treatment.

Let's take as our point of departure our schema on which a number of positions he completes appear, positions that enable us to orientate ourselves in what we are more familiar with. These positions are represented there in a particular order and topology.

Let's once more ask ourselves what the line at the top of our schema is. It's a signifying line, in that it's structured like a language. Also, while it's structured like a language, it's a sort of phrase that the subject is unable to articulate, which we have to help him articulate and which in sum structures the neuroses overall.

A neurosis is not identical to an object, it's not a kind of parasite, foreign to the personality of the subject. It's an analytic structure which is in his acts and his conduct. Progress in our conception of neurosis has shown that it's not only made up of symptoms that are decomposable into their signifying elements and the signified effects of these signifiers – since this is how I have retranslated what Freud articulates – but that the entire personality of the subject bears the mark of these structural relationships. In the way it's employed here, the word 'personality' goes well beyond its primary acceptation, with what that comprises that is static and confluent with what is called character. It's not that. It's the personality in the sense in which it designates, in behaviour, in relationships with the Other and with others, a certain movement that is always found to be the same, a scansion, a certain way of moving from the other to the 475
Other and moreover to an Other that is always and endlessly being re-found and forming the very variations of obsessional action.

Obsessional or hysterical behaviour is overall structured like a language. What does that mean? It isn't enough to say that beyond articulated language, beyond discourse, all of a subject's acts would have this sort of equivalence to language that is there in what is called 'un geste', gesture, inasmuch as a gesture is not simply a well-defined movement, but is also actually a signifier. The expression that fits perfectly is 'une geste', a gest in the sense of a 'chanson de geste', a gest such as The Song of Roland – that is, the sum of one's history.

It's ultimately speech, if you will. The sum of the neurotic's behaviour presents itself like speech, and even like full speech, in the sense in which we saw its original mode in the engagement in the form of a discourse. It's full, but entirely cryptographic speech, unknown to the subject as to its sense, even though he pronounces it with all his being, in everything he manifests, everything he evokes and has ineluctably realized down a certain path of completion and incompletion, if nothing in this order of oscillation called analysis intervenes. It's speech pronounced by the barred subject, barred to himself, which we call the unconscious. It's what we represent in the form of a sign, $.

We have now come to the point of introducing a distinction at the level of the Other. We have defined the Other as the locus of speech. This Other is instituted and takes shape through the sole fact that the subject speaks. By virtue of this sole fact, the big Other is born as the locus of speech. That does not mean, though, that it is realized as a subject in its alterity. The Other is invoked whenever there is speech. I think that there is no need to go back over this as I have insisted on it enough. But this beyond that is articulated in the upper line of our schema is the Other of the Other.

This is speech that is articulated on the horizon of the Other. The Other of the Other is the locus in which the Other's speech takes shape as such. There is no reason for it to be closed off from us. That the Other as locus of speech is immediately and effectively given to us as a subject, a subject who thinks of us as his Other, is even the root of the intersubjective relation. This is the principle of all strategy. When you play chess with someone, you attribute to him as many calculations as you make yourself. Well then, whereas we can say that this Other of the Other should be the most transparent to us and given along with the very dimension of the Other, why do we claim that this Other of the Other is the locus in which the discourse of the unconscious is articulated – articulated but not articulable by 476 us? Why do we have to? By what right?

It's very simple. The conditions of human life mean that the latter is engaged in the conditions of speech, and we are subject to the Other by the conditions of demand, but without knowing what our demand is for the Other. Why don't we know this? What gives it this opacity? These things are self-evident, but they're still self-evident things whose coordinates are not the least useful things to spell out, for we are always happy to obscure them in the form of premature objectifications.

We don't know how this Other, which becomes unbewusst and assumes a paradoxical position in discourse, receives our demand or intervenes in our strategy. That's what I mean when I say that the unconscious is the Other's discourse. This happens virtually on the horizon of the Other of the Other, inasmuch as it's here that the speech of the Other is produced insofar as it becomes our unconscious, that is, what necessarily presents itself in us solely by virtue of the fact that in this locus of speech we bring to life an Other capable of responding to us. This is why it's opaque for us, it's that there is something in it that we are not aware of and that separates us from its response to our demand. This is nothing other than what is called his desire.

This remark, self-evident in appearance only, derives its value as a function from the fact that this desire is located between the Other as pure and simple locus of speech and the Other insofar as it's a being of flesh whom we are at the mercy of for the satisfaction of our demand. That this desire is located there conditions its relationship to this symbolization of the signifier's action which forms what we call a subject, and which we symbolize with our $.

The subject is something other than a soi-même, for which in English one uses the elegant word 'self'. The fact of saying it in English isolates it and makes it possible to clearly distinguish what it signifies, namely what is irreducible in the individual's presence in the world. This self* becomes a subject, properly speaking, and a barred subject in the sense in which we symbolize it, inasmuch as it's marked by the condition that subordinates it not only to the Other as locus of speech, but also to the Other as itself. This is not the subject of the relationship to the world, of the eye's relationship to the world or of the subject–object relationship which is that of knowledge [connaissance]. This is the subject who is born at the moment of the human individual's emergence in the conditions of speech, and insofar, therefore, as it's marked by the Other, itself conditioned and marked by the conditions of speech.

What do we see, then, on this horizon that is rendered opaque 477 by the obstacle of the Other's desire? Insofar as the Other no longer responds, the subject is referred back to his own demand, he is placed in a certain relationship to his own demand which is designated here by the symbol of the little lozenge that I explained to you last time. Here, 'big A is not answering' ['grand A ne répond plus'], a very famous sentence with different initials. At the level of the subject, what tends to be produced on the horizon is that the subject is referred to a confrontation with his own demand, in the forms of signifiers that are, as it were, encompassing in relation to the subject and that the subject himself becomes the sign of. It's the horizon of this non-response from the Other that we see delineated in an analysis, inasmuch as at the start the analyst initially comes to be nothing other than the locus of speech, than an ear that listens and does not respond.

This is what is going to push the subject to detach himself from these forms of demand that appear to us implicitly in his discourse in the form of what we call anal phase, oral phase and whatever kind of phase you like. What do we mean when we speak of these phases? Don't forget that our subject does not progressively return to the state of an infant before our eyes. We do not go in for a fakir-like operation that would see the subject going back over the course of time and being reduced at the end to the seed that created him. It's all about signifiers. What we call oral phase or anal phase is the manner in which the subject articulates his demand via the appearance in his discourse, in the broadest sense of the term, in the manner in which his neurosis presents itself before us, of signifiers that were formed at such-and-such a stage of his development and that he uses to formulate his demand in recent or older phases.

What is called fixation is the prevalence retained by this or that form of oral, anal or other signifier, with all the nuances that you have learnt to formulate. It is the special importance that certain systems of signifiers have retained. Regression is what occurs when these signifiers are returned to in the subject's discourse by virtue of the fact that speech, simply through being speech, without having anything in particular to demand, appears in the dimension of demand. This is how the entire perspective is retroactively opened up to this condition of demand in which the subject has lived since his early and most tender childhood.

The whole question is what we do with regression. We are there to respond to it, or to say what happens when we don't respond to it, and whatever else we can do. This is the aim that is worth achieving.

478 Regression is the regression of discourse. The signifiers involved belong to the structure of discourse, and that's where we will always discover them. This is what is represented by these two lines.

$$\Sigma$$

The upper line is the line of signifiers. Underneath we find significations, always produced according to the law of the signifying chain. These two things are equivalent – the anticipation of the signifying sequence, where the signifying chain opens out before it the horizon of its own completion, and at the same time its retroaction once the signifying term has arrived that, as it were, completes the sentence and brings it about that what is produced at the level of the signified always has a retroactive function. Here, S_2 is already taking shape by anticipation when S_1 starts and is only completed when S_2 retroacts upon S_1. A certain lag always exists between signifier and signification, and it's what makes all signification – insofar as it's not natural signification linked to a completely momentary beginning of the instance of need in a subject – an essentially metonymic factor related to what binds the signifying chain together and constitutes it as such. These links and knots are indicated, for the moment and so as to differentiate them, by a sigma, if you will, thus designating this [plane] beyond the signifying chain.

Confronting the subject with demand brings about a reduction in the discourse in which we implicitly discern these elementary signifiers in what forms the crux of our experience. This is the way we re-encounter the same structural laws in all the subject's conduct, in the manner in which he sometimes expresses it to us, down to the scansion or the motor articulation of his discourse, inasmuch as a stammering, a mumbling or any other speech difficulty, as I have expressed myself elsewhere, may be significant for us and refer to a signifier of demand as oral or anal lack.

The small group of studies directed by the friendliest of my colleagues, namely Lagache, made the discovery, with an astonishment that must have arisen from a permanent misunderstanding, that everywhere we encounter the word 'instinct' in the French translation of Freud, one never finds anything in the German text other than the term 'Trieb'. I translate it as 'pulsion', which, to be honest, rather obscures the thing. The English term is 'drive', 479 whereas we have nothing in French able to translate it. The scientific word would be 'tropisme', designating certain irresistible attractions considered as irreducible to physicochemical attraction, which supposedly operates in animal behaviour. This word is said to make it possible to exorcize the finalistic side that is always there in the term 'instinct'. What we encounter here in the Freudian notion of Trieb is also of this order. One could translate it by 'attirance', 'attraction', except that the human being is not this obscure subject that we encounter in gregarious forms of organic attraction towards an element of climate, for example, or of any other nature.

It's obvious that this is not where our interest develops, we in the field that we are called to explore in analysis, where we are led to speak of these various oral, anal, genital and other phases. In analytic theory, effectively, a certain necessity places the subject in a relationship of subordination, dependence, organization and attraction – in relation to what? To signifiers borrowed from the array of a certain number of his own organs.

This is to say nothing other than that an oral or anal fixation that survives in an adult subject depends on a certain imaginary relation. But what I am also articulating is that the latter is brought to the function of a signifier. If [this relation] were not isolated as such, mortified, it could not have the economic action that it has in the subject, and for a very simple reason, which is that the images are only ever tied to the arousal and satisfaction of need. Now, no one ever neglects to say that in analysis the subject remains attached to oral images there where there is no question of food, anal images there where there is no question of excrement. It's therefore the case that these images exist outside their text, that it's not purely and simply a question of need and that they have assumed another function. It's the signifying function that is involved. The drive, as such, is precisely the manipulable expression of concepts that are valid for us, and which express the subject's dependence in relation to a certain signifier.

What's important is that the subject's desire, encountered as beyond demand, renders it opaque to our demand and installs its own discourse as something that, even though necessary to our structure, is in certain respects impenetrable to us, which makes it an unconscious discourse. This desire, which is its condition, is therefore itself subject to the existence of a certain signifier effect, which I explained to you starting in January under the name of the paternal metaphor.

This metaphor is established on the mother's original, opaque and obscure desire, initially completely closed off to the subject, whereas, on the horizon, the Name-of-the-Father appears as the support of the order instituted by the signifying chain. I have already symbolized it for you in the relationship between two signifiers, one being in two different positions – the Name-of-the-Father over the Mother's Desire and the Mother's Desire over its symbolization.

What it determined as a signified is produced through a metaphoric effect.

Where the Name-of-the-Father is lacking, the metaphorical effect is not produced and I cannot manage to bring to the light of day what makes the x designate the phallus signifier. This is what occurs in psychosis, insofar as the Name-of-the-Father is rejected, is the object of an original Verwerfung and does not enter into the cycle of signifiers, and this is also why the Other's desire, namely the mother's desire, is not symbolized there.

If we had to represent the place of psychosis on the schema, we would say that this desire as such – I don't mean as existing, for everyone knows that even the mothers of psychotics have a desire, though this is not always certain – is not symbolized in the system of the psychotic subject, and, as a consequence, the speech of the Other does not pass into his unconscious at all, but the Other as the locus of speech speaks to him incessantly. This does not necessarily mean you or me, but more or less the totality of what is offered to him as the field of perception.

This field speaks to him of us, naturally, and also, to take the first example that comes to mind, the well-known one that was recounted to us last night, a red car may mean for the delusional subject that he is immortal. Everything addresses him because nothing in the order of the symbolic organization intended to send the Other there where he should be, that is, into his unconscious, is achieved. The Other speaks to him in a manner homogeneous with the first and original speech, which is the speech of demand. This is why everything is in voices, and why the 'it speaks' that is in the unconscious for the neurotic subject is on the outside for the psychotic subject. There are no grounds for astonishment that it speaks and that it speaks out loud in the most natural manner. If the Other is the locus of speech, that's where it speaks, and that's where it resounds in all directions.

We find an extreme case of this at the height of the outbreak of 481 psychosis, where, as I have always formulated it for you, what is verworfen, or rejected from the symbolic, reappears in the real. The real in question here consists of the hallucinations, that is, the Other insofar as it speaks. It's always in the Other that it speaks, but here it takes the form of the real. The psychotic subject is in no doubt that it's the Other who speaks to him, and who speaks to him with all the signifiers that one can collect by the bucketful in the human world, since everything we are surrounded by has the character of being marked by signifiers. Think of all the posters around our streets.

The qualities of desertion and dissolution will be more or less pronounced according to the state of the psychosis. As we see it, and as Freud articulates it for us, what psychosis articulates into is designed precisely to supplete this absence at its organized point, I mean dependent upon the signifying structure of the Other's desire. The forms of psychosis from the most benign to the extreme state of dissolution present us with a pure and simple discourse of the Other, scanded here, in $s(A)$, in the form of a signification.

Two years ago, I showed you some very curious cases of the decomposition of speech, which via the structure presented to us on this graph – I couldn't show you at the time – turn out to have arisen from a code of messages about the code. What is sent from A is everything that the subject possesses for bringing the Other's discourse to life. Schreber's 'fundamental language', each word of which itself comprises a kind of definition which comes with the issuing of the word itself, is a code of messages about the code. Conversely, these phrases, 'How is it . . .', 'You have only to . . . me', 'Perhaps he would like . . .' – and even the 'He would like' is too much – are a series of messages that only aim at what in the code refers to the message. The particles, personal pronouns and auxiliary verbs designate the place of the messenger. This can be precisely recorded on the graph, but as I do not want to linger too long, I refer you to my article on the psychoses that is going to be published, in which I synthesize my course from two years ago and what I am doing for you this year.

Take the delusion of jealousy. Freud formulates it as the subject's negation of a fundamental 'I love him' concerning less the homosexual subject than the semblable subject, which is, of course, thereby homosexual. Freud says, 'It is not me he loves, it's her.' What does that mean, if not that, in order to create an obstacle to the pure and simple outbreak of the speech of interpretation, the delusion of jealousy attempts to restore, to restitute the Other's desire. The 482 structure of the delusion of jealousy consists precisely in attributing to the Other a desire – a kind of desire in outline, roughed out in the imaginary – that is the subject's desire. It's attributed to the Other – 'It is not me he loves, it's my spouse, he is my rival.' As a psychotic I try to establish in the Other this desire that is not given to me because I am psychotic, because this essential metaphor that gives the Other's desire its primordial signifier, the phallus signifier, has not been produced anywhere.

This phallus signifier nevertheless remains something fairly obscure to be acknowledged as essential, and in some way preferentially so in relation to all sorts of other objects that we occasionally see playing a homologous role. The phallus signifier is open to all sorts of equivalences, with the excremental signifier, for example, or the breast signifier, specifically the extremity of the breast, every infant's object. It can be very difficult for you to perceive what gives the phallus its privilege – it's obviously through being in a certain place in what has the highest functions in the individual's relationship to the species, namely what one calls the genital phase.

It's for this reason that it's more especially dependent than any other on a function of significance. Other objects – the maternal breast or this part of the body which, in the form of excreta, present themselves as able to be an occasion of loss for the subject – are, to a certain degree, given to the outside as objects, whereas the phallus is currency in the love transaction and needs to pass to the state of a signifier in order to serve as a means in the way scoria or shells serve as objects of exchange in certain remote tribes. That's already in the natural order.

However, it's not quite the same for the phallus. In its real, organic form, that of the penis or of what corresponds to it in the woman, for it to become a detachable object, fantasmatically or otherwise, there has to be a lot more than for the aforementioned objects which are predetermined for this. One cannot insist too much on the enigma contained in the castration complex or Penisneid, inasmuch as what is involved here really is very much attached to the body, and that, after all, is under no greater threat than any member, arm, leg or even nose or ears.

This element is only a point of sensuality on the body, and this is how the subject discovers it in the first place. Masturbatory autoerotism, which effectively plays such a big role in the subject's history, is not at all in itself liable to trigger such catastrophes as those we know about through experience, so long as the organ is not captured in the play of signifiers, in the paternal metaphor, in the maternal or 483 paternal prohibition. This organ is for the subject originally nothing but a point of sensuality on his own body, in his organic relationship to himself, and much less subject to obsolescence than any of the other elements that have assumed the significance of a signifier in earlier demands. It's precisely for this reason that the grasp of the metaphorical chain must be playing its role, more for it than for any other, in making it a signifier, which as a result becomes the privileged signifier of the relationship to the Other of the Other, and this makes it a central signifier of the unconscious.

We can also grasp here how the dimension that analysis opened up for us on this subject was completely unexpected in comparison to everything that had been formulated previously, if one thinks that it's only an organ with which a living being maintains innocent relations. Let's not forget how it is in our fraternal species, the monkeys. It suffices to visit the Vincennes Zoo around the little trenches circling a particular platform to appreciate with what calmness this brave and brazen tribe of baboons and others, into which we would be wrong to project our own anxieties, pass their days engaged in florid sex, without the slightest concern in the world for what the neighbours think, except to help them from time to time with their collective festivities. There is a world between the relationship that this animal species, more or less erect in its posture, maintains with what hangs down below its belly and the relationship that man maintains with the same. Originally and signage-wise, this relationship makes the phallus the object of a cult. From the beginning of time, the erection as such has been a signifier, and it's not for nothing, we can sense it, that in our very ancient cultures the raised stone has such an impact as a signifier in the grouping of the human collectivity.

The emergence of the phallus in this essential role is certainly not primordial, but depends on something else, namely on its metaphorical passage to the rank of signifier, on which will depend, in turn, all possibility of situating the Other's desire, insofar as the subject has to find the place of his own desire therein and has to find out how to signify it. The encounter between the subject's desire and the Other's desire is subject to accidents, and this is where, quite naturally, we see the phallus signifier functioning for a subject who is placed in typical, abnormal, deficient or pathological conditions with respect to the four cardinal points of the definition of desire.

This constellation remains complete in the neurotic. It's incomplete for the psychotic.

As I've said, the obsessional is someone who, in this relationship to the Other's desire, finds himself primordially, originally marked by the defusion of instincts. Its first outcome, the result at the beginning, the one that is going to condition all later difficulties, will be to undo the Other's desire. What does that mean, if we give what I have just been formulating here its full meaning?

Undoing the Other's desire is not the same thing as having been unable to grasp the Other's desire owing to the inadequacies or deficiencies of the metaphorical act, of the Name-of-the-Father. Moreover, if in a real that is more or less delusional the Other's desire, instituted and symbolized by the phallus, is negated as such, the subject's original relationship to his own desire will be founded on the disavowal of the Other's desire. The term 'Verneinung' applies here in the sense in which Freud shows us its two sides – that it's articulated, symbolized, but carries the sign 'No'. That's what the obsessional finds himself confronted with as the very basis of his position, and to which he responds with formulas of suppletion, of compensation.

I'm not saying anything new here, I am only rearticulating the triad emphasized by every author with respect to the obsessional – undoing, isolation, defence reaction. Observe simply that for us to be able to speak about undoing, it must involve signifiers, because one doesn't undo anything that is not a signifier. There is not the slightest conceivable undoing at the animal level, and if we did find something that resembles it, we would say that it's the beginnings of symbolic formation. Undoing is not simply the effacement of the trace, which I have spoken to you about, but on the contrary it's placing an elementary signifier in parentheses to say, 'That's not it' – but having said this, it's still posed as a signifier. It's still a matter of signifiers.

If the obsessional is led to undo so many things, it's because they are things that can be formulated. Namely, a demand, as we know. Except it's a demand for death. This demand for death, above all when it's premature, results in the Other's destruction, first and foremost the Other's desire and, along with the Other, equally, whatever the subject may have to articulate himself into. As a consequence, it's all the more necessary to isolate the parts of discourse to be retained in comparison with those that absolutely must be effaced and undone so that the subject himself is not thereby destroyed. It's a perpetual game of yes and no, of separating and sorting, of what 485 in his speech and in his very demand destroys him, in contrast with what can preserve him and is also necessary for the preservation of the Other, for the Other only exists as such at the level of signifying articulation.

The obsessional subject is caught in this contradiction. He is constantly occupied in maintaining the Other and making him subsist through imaginary formulations which occupy him more than anyone. They are established to support the Other who is perpetually in danger of falling, of succumbing to the demand for death, for this Other is the essential condition for him to maintain himself as a subject. He could not subsist as a subject were this Other effectively undone.

What most particularly presents itself at the signifying level as having been undone is what marks the place of the Other's desire as such, namely the phallus. The d_0 I spoke about last time, which situates the obsessional's desire, is equivalent to the undoing of the phallus. Everything in analysis revolves around something that has the closest of relationships with the signifier. The resulting method is one that takes the function of the phallus as a signifier into account, while the other, for having failed to elucidate it, is thereby reduced to groping around in the dark.

What does this difference consist in? You will find the golden rule for it if you make the effort to read the article that I referred you to, at the risk of creating a gigantic demand of the publisher. But perhaps this risk is not so great. This rule of demarcation demands that one respond to the question of the basis on which, on what premises, the subject is liable to enter into a completed and complete relationship with his own desire. My response is that the subject, insofar as he must assume his genital desire as a human subject and not just as an animal, must make the phallus signifier function as an essential signifier of this desire. It's because the phallus signifier is there in the circuit of the subject's unconscious articulation that the human subject can be human, even when he fucks.

That doesn't mean that the human subject can't occasionally fuck like an animal. It's even an ideal fidgeting away in the very depths of the hopes of human subjects. I don't know whether the thing is often achieved, though some people have boasted that they have got to that point, and one does not see why one would not believe them, but what does it matter? For us, experience shows us that it's subject to much greater difficulties, which are signifier difficulties.

The endless ambiguities that surface with respect to the genital stage and the phallic stage – has either been attained? does the child 486 attain the genital stage before the latency period? or is this simply a phallic stage? and so on – would perhaps be less obscure if one were to appreciate that 'phallic stage' simply means access to genital desire at the level of signification. The two things are different. On a first approach, it was possible to say that the child manages to accede to the phallic stage only, and this is very probably true, even though one can debate the point whether autoerotic activity is genital – which, ultimately, is also true. But that's not what is important for us. It's not a matter of genital desire that seems to appear, effectively, as representing the first spurt of physiological evolution, but of its structuration on the phallic plane, and this is what is subsequently decisive for neurosis.

It's a question of realizing something at the level of the unconscious, which is equivalent to what, at the lower level [of the graph], is full speech, there where the discourse articulated in the locus of the Other returns to the subject as a signified, involving the ego that the subject has concretely located in relation to the image of the other. At the upper level, attaining unconscious articulation assumes that the circuit, which starts from the subject's confrontation with his completed demand, is formulated in a desire that is articulated as such and satisfies the subject, to which the subject is identical, and terminates in the place of the Other, who, here, is a human being marked by language and the drama of the castration complex, in other words, another me. What is formulated here is not 'I am the phallus', but, on the contrary, 'I am there in the very place that the phallus occupies in the articulation of signifiers.' This is the full meaning of 'Wo Es war, soll Ich werden.'

The subject caught in the movement of signifiers must come to think, not that he is what he was confronted with as a child, the signifier of desire that took the total object, the mother, this phallus, away from him, but that he is merely subject to the requirement that this phallus occupy a certain place. It's only on the basis of the realization that he is not it that the subject is able to accept what over the entire process has been profoundly called into question, namely, to accept having it when he has it and not having it when he does not have it. This locates him in this place, S(Ⱥ), in the articulation of the upper signifying chain. Only the elucidation of the subject's relationship to the phallus, insofar as he is not it but must come to its place, is properly suited to make it possible to conceptualize the ideal achievement that Freud formulates with his Wo Es war soll Ich werden.

That is the necessary condition for orientating our interventions and technique. How do we get to this point? This will be the aim of my Seminar next year, which I will call 'Desire and Its Interpretation'. What are the directions and directives that give us 487 access to this final message designated by the Freudian formula with its pithy, pre-Socratic turn? We'll try to spell this out. In the absence of such access, what is produced is very precisely what neurosis, or any other anomalous form of evolution, spontaneously realizes.

For the hysteric, the place of desire is located in a deep incertitude which obliges him or her to take a detour and which she or he takes following the model of what makes it possible for him or her to situate his or her ego. Like all subjects, the hysteric fixes the place of his ego by detouring via the image of the other. It's characteristic of the hysteric to obtain the place for desire in exactly the same way at the upper level. The hysteric separates herself from and turns away from the Other and from the signified of the Other so as to come to locate herself in a certain ideal type by means of an image with which she identifies. It's by an analogous detour, as I have explained to you, that Dora identifies with Herr K. in order to locate the point on which the question of her desire bears, namely – how is it possible to desire a woman when one is impotent?

For the obsessional, the procedure is the same, with one small difference. Whereas the hysteric tries to locate the difficulties of her position at the level of the ideal, of the mask of identification, the obsessional, on the contrary, places himself at what can be called the stronghold of his ego in an attempt to find the place of his desire. Hence these famous Vauban-like fortifications which I have spoken about elsewhere, these fortresses inside which a desire always under the threat of destruction barricades itself, and which are constructed on the model of his ego and in relation to the image of the other.

The obsessional's relationship to the image of the other consists very precisely in the signifier phallus insofar as it is always under the threat of destruction because it is caught in the negation of rediscovering it in the relationship with the Other. For every obsessional, man or woman, at some moment in their history you will always see appearing the essential role of identification with the other, a semblable, a friend, a brother scarcely older, a friend the same age, who, in every case, has for him the prestige of being more virile and of having the power. The phallus appears here in a form that is not symbolic but imaginary. We can say that the subject complements himself with an image stronger than himself, an image of power.

It's not I who formulate this, you will see it in its place in the article that I was quoting from, for functionally it is essential enough for it to be recognized by those who have been inspired by their own experience of these subjects. The emphasis is put on the image of the other as a phallic form, this time in the imaginary sense.
488 That is what here takes on the value and function, no longer as the symbolization of the Other's desire, but as an imaginary formation of prestige, presence and precedence. I've already pointed out its function at the level of the narcissistic relation. This is what is produced as such in obsessional symptoms, in all the obsessional's history, and it's where the special function assumed by the subject's fantasmatic relationship to the imaginary other who is his semblable is marked.

The distinction between the presence of the Other with a big O and the presence of the other with a little o is tangible in the development of the case, if you read it carefully. You will note, for example, a very curious evolution between the beginning of the treatment when she cannot speak and later on when she does not wish to speak, because it's at the level of speech that the analysand's relationship with the analyst is instituted, and she denies herself at that level. Even if this is not how he expresses it, the analyst clearly perceives that she denies herself because her demand can only be a demand for death. Later, something else happens, and it's very amusing to see that the analyst clearly perceives that there is a difference, that relations have improved. Nevertheless, she is still not speaking, for now she does not want to speak. The difference between the two is that when one does not wish to speak it's because of the presence of the Other with a big O. However, what is disturbing is that, if she does not wish to speak, it's because what has come to the place of this Other is precisely the other with a little o that the analyst has done everything to present. Why? Because, following things closely as he does, he clearly sees that the content of what the subject brings indicates the place that the phallic fantasy plays in it. Of course, this is how the subject is defending herself, whereas her analyst spends his time drumming into her that she would like to be a man.

It depends on how one hears it. It's true that the subject, at the imaginary level, effectively makes this phallus a breast, and that the condition of man insofar as he is equipped with the phallus, and uniquely insofar as he is equipped with the phallus, represents an element of power for him. The question is why she has such a great need of the reference to this element of power that is the phallus.

From another angle, it's with complete authenticity that she absolutely denies having the slightest desire to be a man. However, on that, one does not let go of her, I mean that for example one interprets in summary terms of aggressiveness or, even, of a desire to castrate the man, things that are much more complex and that have to be articulated quite differently if we follow what I am outlining here. The entire evolution of the treatment, the manner in which it's directed – and this is the entire ambiguity that exists 489 between interpretation and suggestion – tends, on the other hand, towards the fact that an Other (not to employ any other term, for it is indeed the Other, and nobody is in any doubt, if I may say so, the author himself emphasizes it sufficiently in the manner in which he formulates his own action and in other ways as well), that an Other, a benevolent mother, a much more gentle Other than the one whom the subject had to contend with, intervenes to tell her, according to the very formula that the author uses somewhere else in terms that are more or less the following – 'This is my body, this is my blood, this phallus, you can trust me, a man, absorb it, I authorize you to have it, this phallus, it's what must give you force and vigour, and it will resolve all your obsessional difficulties.'

In fact, the result is that not a single one of the obsessions has yielded, they are simply undergone and experienced without guilt. That is strictly modelled on what I have been telling you, and it's what would normally be the result of such a mode of intervention.

Conversely, as I have said to you, it's striking to see at the end of the treatment, at the point at which one has let her go, the patient send her own son to the analyst. This action is rather astonishing, because, we are told, the subject has experienced a holy terror of this son all her life, and one clearly feels, from the context and the images of it that the analyst creates for himself, that there has always been a problem with this son, which is the least one can say.

. Wouldn't the fact that this son is offered to the analyst at the end be the acting out that marks precisely what has been missed? – at this point where the phallus is altogether something other than an accessory of power, where it's truly this signifying mediation by which what takes place between man and woman is symbolized. Didn't Freud show, in the woman's relations with the father, the equivalence between the desire for the symbolic gift of the phallus and the child that subsequently comes to be substituted for it? That is, the child occupies the very place that has not been worked through and elucidated in the treatment, that is, a symbolic place. The subject, despite herself, in a manner that is certainly unconscious and identical to an acting out when something has been missed in an analysis, shows that something else should have been realized.

The treatment effectively ends in a kind of intoxication of power and goodness, a quasi-manic intoxication, which is usual in and an indication of treatments that end with an imaginary identification. The fact is that the treatment has done nothing other than drive to its ultimate consequences and facilitate by way of suggestive approbation what was already to be found in the mechanisms of the 490 obsession, namely, the absorption or incorporation of the phallus at the imaginary level, which is one of the mechanisms of obsession. It's down this same path, chosen from the mechanisms of defence, that the solution, as it were, is given. Added to this is the approval of what is now a good mother, the mother who allows the phallus to be absorbed.

Should we be satisfied with having, as the solution to a neurosis, what is only one of its components merely pushed to its final stage – a symptom that is more successful, in sum, and disengaged from the others?

I don't think that we can consider ourselves to be entirely satisfied. Nor do I think I have said everything that I could say with respect to this treatment, whereas time has caught up with us once again.

Between now and next time I will choose the three or four points in the observation that will highlight even more what I have just articulated for you today.

Then I will make some concluding remarks on our 'formations of the unconscious', to sum up the circuit that we have taken this year, following which all that will be left for us to do is wait for next year to undertake a new stage.

YOU ARE THE ONE YOU HATE

From the demand for death to the death of demand
Commandment, guilt without law, superego
Avatars of the phallus signifier
Misery of the gendarme
Not legitimating penis envy

We have come to the end of this year's Seminar, which I called 'Formations of the Unconscious'. Perhaps now you can at least appreciate the appropriateness of the title. Formations, forms, relations, topology perhaps – I had my reasons for avoiding scaring you off at the outset.

If something is to remain as a step on which we can place a foot to climb up onto the following rung next year, it's this – one can't articulate anything that arises from these mechanisms of the unconscious, which are at the foundation of Freud's experience and discovery, merely by referring to tensions, by considering them as inserted into a kind of maturational progress, fanning out from the pre-genital to the genital. Moreover, one cannot only stress relations of identification such as they are apparently – and I say 'apparently' – given over the course of Freud's oeuvre, as if one wanted to reduce the experience to a collection of characters in the style of an Italian comedy, where first would come the mother, then the father, capped off by several others. It's impossible to articulate anything concerning the progress and fixation of desire, or concerning this intersubjectivity that effectively occupies the foreground of our experience and preoccupations, unless we situate it in relation to the necessary relations that impose themselves not only on man's desire, but on the subject as such, and which are the relations between signifiers.

This is why over the course of this year I have tried to familiarize you with this little graph that for some while it has seemed to me, I'm speaking for myself, timely to make use of to support my experiences. It makes it possible to discern the places where this 492 signifier manifests itself – this signifier encountered everywhere, and with reason, since it cannot fail to be involved directly or indirectly, whenever it's a question of not just any signification but signification insofar as explicitly engendered by the conditions imposed upon the living organism that has become the support, the prey or even the victim of speech, and which is called man. Today, I will place you at the edge of the pluripresence, I would say, of the phallus signifier, always the same, the one that we have been occupied with for several sessions. It's extremely important to clearly distinguish the places where this signifier makes its appearance in the subject in any given case.

That becoming conscious of penis envy is crucial in the analysis of a female obsessional neurosis goes without saying, for never to have encountered the phallus in the analysis of an obsessional neurosis, or any other kind of neurosis, female or not, would be really quite odd.

By dint of pushing the analysis in the sense indicated in the so-called La psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui, by dint of reducing fantasmatic products of the transference to what someone has called 'this so simple reality' of the analytic situation, namely that there are two people there who, of course, have nothing to do with these fantasies, it's perhaps possible that one can completely manage to do without the phallus in the interpretation of an analysis, but we're not there yet. In truth, no analysis ever takes place in the way outlined in this book.

We obviously have to do something with the phallus signifier. Saying that becoming conscious is the key to the solution of obsessional neurosis is not saying very much, for everything depends on the manner in which one interprets this signifier at the different points at which it appears and where the function it plays is not homologous. Not everything is reducible to penis envy in the sense in which it would concern rivalry with the male, as one ultimately ends up formulating it in this observation by lumping together the patient's relations with her husband, her analyst and others in general, which is falsified by the observation itself. That's obviously the angle from which the phallus appears. It appears at several points.

We are not going to claim to give an exhaustive analysis of an observation that is, moreover, given to us as an incomplete analysis and that we only have partial documentation for. But we have enough to get a good idea of it, nevertheless. I will start, then, by making some remarks about this observation which will introduce some other properties of the graph that we will make use of.

of guilt that accompanies the obsessions in the patient, for example, her religious obsessions. The appearance of such a marked sense of guilt in an obsessional neurosis presents a paradox, since surely the subject considers correlatively that the parasitic thoughts that are imposed on her are foreign to her, and that she is more the victim of them than responsible for them. This will make it possible, perhaps, to formulate something about the sense of guilt.

For some time now, hardly anyone ever speaks about anything but the term 'superego', which seems to cover everything here. One can't really say that it has thrown much light on things. The idea has been put about that the superego is a much older formation, more archaic, than what one had initially thought, namely that the superego could be considered as the creation corresponding to the decline of the Oedipus complex and to the introjection of the Oedipal figure considered to be eminently prohibitive, the paternal figure. You are aware that experience has forced us to admit that there is an older superego. What imposed this older origin upon us was not without relationship to, on the one hand, the effects of introjection and, on the other, the effects of prohibition. Still, let's try to get a closer look at these things.

Here is an obsessional neurosis and, as in all neuroses, what we have to make apparent initially, precisely insofar as we are not hypnotists and do not work through suggestion, is a dimension beyond, where, in some way, we offer to meet the subject at one point. This is what is represented here by the upper line, the horizon of signifying articulation. There, the subject, as I explained to you at length last time, is confronted with his demand. This is what is involved when we speak of an alternating process of successive regressions and identifications. The two alternate to the extent that when the subject encounters an identification when regressing he stops along the path of this regression. Regression is entirely inscribed, as I have shown you, in this retroactive opening that is presented to the subject as soon as he speaks, inasmuch as speech makes the whole history of this demand, in which his entire life as a man who speaks has been inserted, emerge right down to its origins.

If we examine this closely, without doing anything but rediscover what has always been formulated, there is a fundamental form that 494 we find on the horizon of every demand by an obsessional subject, and it constitutes precisely the greatest obstacle to his formulating his demand. This is what experience teaches us to qualify as aggressiveness and which has increasingly led us to take into consideration what can be called a death wish.

This is the major, inaugural difficulty, faced with which the obsessional's demand shatters, fragments and disarticulates, and it motivates the undoing, the isolation and all the defences – and, very primordially for the grand obsessionals, this silence that is often so prolonged that you have all the difficulty in the world overcoming it in the course of an analysis. I mention it here because it's precisely what is present in the case on which I am basing myself. It's very much the case that this demand is a demand for death. It's striking to see how it spreads throughout the text of the observation without ever being formulated, as if it were some kind of natural expression of a tension. In reality, it's a matter of the relationship between the demand for death and the difficulty of articulation itself, which is implied in the same pages, with the exception of several lines, and absolutely never brought into focus. Isn't that, however, the phenomenon that warrants being paid attention to?

If this demand is a demand for death, it's because the obsessional's first relations with the Other, as Freud and analytic theory teach us, essentially consist of the contradiction that the demand that is addressed to the Other, on which everything depends, has the demand for death as its horizon, and this is for a reason that is attached to the hook of our question mark. Let's not be precipitate, we shall see why and how this can be conceptualized. It's not so simple to speak with Mrs Melanie Klein of primordial aggressive drives if we start from there. Let's leave there this kind of primordial badness where, if he could, the infant's first movement, as the Marquis de Sade emphasizes, would be to bite and tear at the mother's breast.

It is, however, not fruitless that articulating the problem of desire in its fundamental perversity takes us back to the divine marquis, who was not alone in his day to have raised the question of the relations between desire and nature in a very intense and pressing manner. Is there harmony or fundamental disharmony between the two? This is the crux of the passionate questioning that is inseparable from the entire philosophy of the Aufklärung and which has contributed an entire literature. In my very first Seminars I drew on this to show a kinship or an analogy – I'll return to this next year with respect to desire – between Freud's initial inquiry and the philosophical inquiry of the Aufklärung, accompanied by all the literary eroticism that is its indispensable correlate.

495 We do not know, then, where this demand for death comes from. Before saying that it emerges from the most primordial instincts or from a nature turned against itself, let's start by situating it there where it is, that is, at the level – I won't say at which it's articulated – but at which it prevents any articulation of the subject's demand, where it creates an obstacle to the obsessional's discourse, both when he is alone with himself and when he begins his analysis, and finds himself in this disarray that our analyst occasionally describes from time to time. At the start of her analysis, the analysand effectively presents with an impossibility to speak that translates into reproaches, even insults, even listing everything that creates an obstacle to a patient speaking to a doctor – 'I know doctors well enough to know that they make fun of their patients amongst themselves. You are more knowledgeable than I am. It's impossible for a woman to speak to a man' [p. 221].

This is a deluge, which shows the emergence, in correlation with the activity of speech, of the difficulty of mere articulation. The crux of the demand that the simple fact of entering into the field of analytic therapeutics entails is immediately present. If the demand for death is located there where we placed it, that is, on the horizon of speech, implicated at the crux of all possible articulation of speech, and if it is what is creating an obstacle here, then this schema will perhaps show a little more clearly the logical articulation that supports it, not without some suspension of, or pauses in, thought.

For the obsessional subject, the demand for death represents a dead-end from which what one improperly calls ambivalence results, which is rather a seesaw or swinging movement where the subject is sent back and forth as if between the two buffers of a dead-end that she is unable to escape from. As the schema expresses, the demand for death necessarily has to be formulated in the locus of the Other, in the discourse of the Other, which means that the reason for it is not to be sought in any kind of history involving the mother, for example, as the object of this death wish over some particular frustration. The demand for death concerns the Other in an internal manner. The fact that this Other is the locus of demand effectively entails the death of demand.

The demand for death is unable to be sustained in the obsessional without itself bringing in this kind of destruction that here I am calling the death of demand. It's condemned to an endless to-and-fro, which means that as soon as it starts to be articulated, it dies out. This constitutes the crux of the difficulty of articulating the obsessional's position.

Between the obsessional subject's relationship to his demand [$ ◊ D], and the Other, A, which is so panic-inducingly necessary to him, sustains him and without which he would be something other than an obsessional, we find desire, d, annulled in him, but whose 496 place is maintained. We have described this desire as a Verneinung, for it is expressed but in a negative form. We see it appear, effectively, in this form when an analysand, after having said, 'It's not that I'm thinking about such a thing,' expresses to us an aggressive, disapproving or depreciative desire about us. He is effectively displaying his desire there, but he is only able to show it as disavowed. Now, how does it happen that this form of desire is still correlated with guilt feelings, when it has been disavowed?

This is where our schema makes it possible for us to move forward and make some distinctions that will be useful for us later.

The obscurities concerning the effects of the superego corresponding to the growth of our experience of this agency arise essentially from the absence of a fundamental distinction. We need to distinguish between guilt and the relationship to the law. There is a relationship between the subject and the law. As to guilt, it's born without any kind of reference to this law. This is the fact that analytic experience has contributed.

The naive move in the dialectic of the relationship between sin and the law was expressed in the words of St Paul, that is, that it's the law that makes the sin. From which it results, as in the sentence of old Karamazov on which I insisted at one time – 'If God does not exist, everything is permitted'.

One of the strangest things there is, and it required analysis to bring it to us, is that there is no need of any kind of reference, either to God or to his law, for man to be literally swimming in guilt. Experience shows us. It even seems that one is able to formulate the contrary expression, namely that 'if God is dead, nothing is permitted'. I have already spoken about this in its time.

How, then, do we formulate the appearance of guilt feelings in the life of the neurotic subject?

Let's go back to the first steps of analysis. In what respect did Freud initially show the sense of guilt to be fundamental, an essential subjective manifestation of the subject? It was with respect to the Oedipus complex. The contents of analysis revealed a desire that till then had been profoundly hidden, the desire for the mother, in her 497 relationship with the intervention of a character who is the father as he emerged from the initial observation of the Oedipus complex, a terrifying and destructive father. This is effectively what becomes apparent in the form of castration fantasies, a discovery of analysis that one did not have the slightest suspicion of before – and whose character, as I think I have spelt out for you this year, is necessarily unthinkable, unless we hold that the phallus is a privileged vital image raised to the signification of a signifier. It assumes here the function of castration as that which marks the impact of the prohibition that strikes desire. In fact, everything that refers to the superego in our experience has to be articulated in three stages which correspond strictly – one, two, three – to the three lines schematized here: the upper line, the line of desire and the line of demand.

For the neurotic, this line on the horizon is not formulated, and that's why he is neurotic. Here the command reigns supreme. Call it what you like, call it the Ten Commandments, why not? I have previously told you that the Ten Commandments were most likely the laws of speech, that is, that all disorders start to affect the way speech functions when they are not respected. Concerning the demand for death, it's obviously the 'Tu ne tueras point', 'Thou shalt not kill', that is on the horizon and makes it so dramatic. But punishment doesn't derive its impact from the response that comes to that place. The fact is that, for reasons that have to do with the structure of the Other for man, the demand for death is equivalent to the death of demand.

This is the level of the commandment. It exists – so much so that, in truth, it emerges on its own. If you read the notes Freud made on his case of the Rat Man – this is the very nice supplement published in the Standard Edition, where one finds certain chronological elements that are valuable to know – you will see that the first obsessional content the subject speaks to him about is that of the commands he receives: You will sit your examination before such and such a date, or what would happen if I received the command, 'You will slit your throat'?, and you know in what a state of panic he enters when the command comes to mind – 'You will slit the old lady's throat', since she is keeping his girlfriend away from him.

We also see these commands appear in the clearest of manners in another context, in psychotics. They receive these commands, and one of the key points of classification is to know to what extent they obey them. In a word, psychosis places the autonomy of this function of command on the horizon of the subject's relationship to speech, an experience that we can only take as fundamental. The command may remain veiled. For the obsessional, it's veiled and 498 fragmented and only appears in bits.

Where, and on what line, do we locate guilt?

Guilt, as M. de la Palice would say, is a demand experienced as prohibited. Everything is normally drowned in the term 'prohibition', the notion of demand remaining avoided, whereas it seems that the two go together – which is not certain either, as we shall see. Why is this demand experienced as prohibited? If it were simply experienced as prohibited because, as one says, it has been defended against, there would be no problem. At what level, at what point, do we see the phenomenon appear in clinical work that makes us say that guilt has emerged? What does neurotic guilt consist in? It's truly stupefying that no analyst, not even any phenomenologist, mentions this essential dimension, articulates it or makes a criterion of it – the sense of guilt appears in connection with approaching a demand experienced as forbidden because it kills desire, and this is precisely where it differs from diffuse anxiety, and you know to what extent that differs from the emergence of the sense of guilt.

Guilt is inscribed in the relationship between desire and demand. Everything that goes in the direction of a particular formulation of demand is accompanied by the disappearance of desire, and does so through a mechanism whose threads we can see on this little graph. Precisely because it is on this little graph, the subject can't perceive or determine it in its lived mainspring, inasmuch as the subject is always condemned to be in one of these places, but can't be in all of the places at the same time. That's what guilt is. That's where prohibition appears, but this time not insofar as it is formulated – insofar as the prohibited demand strikes desire down, makes it disappear, kills it.

That, then, is clear. It's insofar as the obsessional is condemned to carry out his battle to save his subjective autonomy, as they say, at the level of desire that everything that appears at this level, even in a disavowed form, is linked to this aura of guilt.

Underneath, in this instance, I will call the third level, unless someone disputes this way of situating it, that of the superego.

In the case we are following, I have no idea why but it's called the female superego, whereas it's ordinarily considered to be the maternal superego in all the other texts in the same register – an anomaly that is no doubt to be attributed to the theme of penis envy that concerns woman as such. The archaic, maternal superego, the one to which the effects of the primordial superego of which Melanie 499 Klein speaks are attached, is linked to the first Other as the support of the subject's first demands of the emerging, I would almost say innocent, demands at the level of the first vague articulations of his need and his first frustrations on which there is so much insistence these days. We can now understand how, through confusing these lines, this superego could be placed on the same line of sight as what is produced at the upper level, that of the command and guilt, which is linked to the Other of the Other.

What do we have here at the level of the first Other and its first demands? We have the phenomenon that has been called dependence. Everything about the maternal superego is articulated around this. What makes it possible for us to place them in the same register? Placing them in the same register is not to confuse them, as if at the outset there were only the infant and the mother and the relation was dual. If this were the case, it would be quite different from what we have articulated in the relationship of demand as well as in that of guilt. In reality, initially there is the two-tiered structure that we see here, because it has to be admitted at the outset that, solely by virtue of the fact that signifiers are involved, there are two horizons of demand. I explained this to you by telling you that behind even the most primitive demand – for the breast and the object that represents the maternal breast – there is this doubling-up created in demand by the fact that demand is a demand for love, an absolute demand, a demand that symbolizes the Other as such, which therefore differentiates the Other as a real object, capable of giving satisfaction, from the Other as symbolic object which gives or refuses presence or absence – a matrix in which those fundamental relationships on the horizon of all demand – love, hatred and ignorance – will crystallize.

The first relationship of dependence is threatened by the loss of love and not simply by the privation of maternal care, and this is why it's already in itself homogeneous with what will subsequently become organized according to the perspective of the laws of speech. The latter are already instant, virtual and preformed from the very first demand. Doubtless, they are not complete and formulated, and this is why an infant doesn't begin to be an obsessional from its first feed. But from its first feed, it can very well already start to create this gap, which will mean that it will be in the refusal to feed that he will find the evidence he requires of his maternal partner's love. In other words, we can see signs of anorexia appearing very early.

What is specific to the case of the obsessional? The case of the obsessional is suspended from the early formation, along this horizon of demand, of what I have been calling the demand for death. The demand for death is no pure and simple drive to kill. 500
It's an articulated demand, and solely by virtue of the fact that it's articulated, it's not produced at the level of the imaginary relationship with the other. This is not a dual relation. It looks beyond the imaginary other to the symbolized being of the other, and it's also for that reason that it's experienced and lived in the subject on its return. The fact is that the subject, because he is a speaking subject, and solely for this reason, is unable to harm the other without harming himself, so much so that the demand for death is the death of demand.

It's internal to this that what I will call the avatars of the phallus signifier are located.

How can one not fall about in astonishment and stupor when one sees, effectively, if one knows how to read, the phallus signifier re-emerging at all points of the obsessional's phenomenology? Nothing makes it possible to conceptualize this polypresence of the phallus in various symptoms if not its function as a signifier. This confirms the signifier's impact on the living being, which is destined by speech to fragment into all sorts of signifier effects.

We are told in this observation that the woman is possessed by Penisneid. That's all very good, but then why is the first of her obsessions to be cited the obsessive fear of having contracted syphilis? This will lead her, as he writes, to oppose, in vain moreover, the marriage of her oldest son, the one I have placed so much emphasis on for the signification he has throughout the observation.

We would always do well to pay attention to the miracles and sleights of hand that are performed on us in both observations and theory. We would do well from time to time to polish up and shine our capacity for being surprised. What do we see in the male obsessional subject? The fear of being contaminated and of contaminating, the widespread experience of which shows us how important it is for him. The male obsessional has in general been initiated fairly early on to the dangers of so-called venereal diseases, and everyone knows the place that, in a large number of cases, this fact can have in his psychology. I am not saying that it is a constant, but we are accustomed to interpret it as going well beyond the rationality of things. As always, this is in Hegel. Even though for some time things have been going so well owing to the use of medication, it nevertheless remains the case that the obsessed remains very obsessed about anything that can create impulsive acts in the libidinal order. As for us, we remain accustomed to seeing an aggressive impulse showing through the libidinal drive, which means that in some way the phallus is something dangerous.

If we hold to the idea that the subject has a relation of narcissistic demand to the phallus, it seems very difficult to explain this first obsession. Why? Precisely because at this level, the use this woman makes of the phallus is strictly equivalent to that of a man, that is, by the intermediary of her son, she takes herself to be dangerous.

When the occasion arises she gives it as her prolongation, which is to say that as a consequence no Penisneid stops her. She has the phallus in the form of this son, she actually does have this phallus, since it's on it that she crystallizes the same obsession as male patients do.

I won't go on endlessly about the obsessions of infanticide that follow, the obsessions of poisoning and the rest. I will limit myself to saying very quickly that the case, with all its significance, confirms what I have been putting forward on this topic. I will read this because it's worth it. 'The violence of her complaints against her mother were testimony to the immense affection that she had for her' [p. 219]. After having several times circled around the possibility or not of a truly Oedipal relation by introducing arguments foreign to the question, he writes, 'She considered her to be from a higher milieu than her father, judged her to be more intelligent and was above all fascinated by her energy, character, decisiveness and authority' [p. 219].

That's the start of a paragraph about getting us to see the imbalance in the parental relation, which undeniably exists, and stressing the oppressed, I would say even depressed, aspect of the father in the presence of a mother who may have been virile, since this is how one interprets the fact that the subject requires that the phallic attribute be linked, in one way or another, to the mother.

'The rare moments when the mother relaxed filled her with unspeakable joy' [p. 219]. But up to this point there had never been any question of a frankly sexualized desire to possess the mother. Effectively, there is no trace of anything like it. See how he expresses himself – the patient 'was tied to her', the mother, 'on an exclusively sadomasochistic plane. And then there came to light the mother–daughter alliance that operated extremely rigorously here, and any transgression of the pact produced a movement of extreme violence, which, up till recently, was never objectified. Every person who meddled in this union was the object of death wishes' [p. 219].

This is a truly important point, and you will come across it 502 again, and not only in obsessional neuroses. From whatever angle we look at the frequency of this in our analytic experience, these powerful daughter–mother links, this sort of knot, once again places us before a phenomenon that goes well beyond the bodily differences between beings. What is expressed there is exactly the ambiguity or ambivalence which makes the demand for death and the death of demand equivalent. This shows us moreover that the demand for death is really there. I'm not saying anything new here, for Freud sometimes very clearly saw this demand for death, which Mrs Melanie Klein tried to relate to the subject's primordial aggressive drives, whereas it's there in the link that binds the subject to the mother.

This observation shows us, however, that that is not all. The demand for death is the mother's own demand. The mother carries this demand for death within herself, and she exercises it upon the unfortunate paternal character, a corporal in the Gendarmerie, who, despite his goodness and gentleness which the patient initially speaks of, shows himself to be unhappy, depressed and taciturn throughout his life, never manages to overcome the mother's rigidity, nor to prevail over his wife's attachment to a first, incidentally platonic, love, is jealous, and breaks his silence only to explode in emotional outbursts which always end in his defeat. No one doubts that the mother played a part in this.

One glosses this in terms of what is called the castrating mother. Perhaps that is the place to examine things more closely and to see that here, much more than a question of castration for this man, it's a question of the privation of the loved object that the mother seems to have been for him and of the onset of this depressive position in him that Freud teaches us to recognize as determined by a death wish against oneself – and which is directed at what? What else, if not at a loved and lost object. In short, the demand for death was already present in the subject's previous generation. Is it the mother who embodies it?

At the level of the subject, the demand for death is mediated by an Oedipal horizon that makes it possible for it to appear on the horizon of speech and not in its immediacy. If it were not thus mediated, we would not have an obsessional, but a psychotic. On the other hand, in the relations between the father and the mother, this demand for death is not mediated for the subject by anything that would indicate any respect for the father, to his being placed by the mother in a position of authority and support of the law. The demand for death in question at the level at which the subject sees it involved in the relationship between the parents is a demand for death directly directed at the father, who turns 503 the aggression in against himself, hence the misery, the partial deafness and the depression. This is thus quite different from the demand for death always involved in all intersubjective dialectic, which finds expression in a court of law when the prosecutor says, 'I demand the death penalty.' He is not demanding it from the subject in question, he is demanding it from a third party who is the judge, which is the normal Oedipal position.

This, then, is the context in which the subject's Penisneid, or what one is calling such, is led to play its role. We see it here in the form of this dangerous weapon, which is there only as a signifier of the danger manifested by the emergence of desire in the context of this demand. We shall also see this characteristic of signifiers manifest itself in the detail of a number of the subject's obsessions.

One of her first obsessions is a very nice one. It's the fear of putting pins in her parents' bed. And why? To prick her mother, not her father. This is the first level of the appearance of the phallic signifier. Here it's the signifier of desire as dangerous and guilty. It doesn't have the same function at another moment, when it appears altogether clearly, but in the form of an image. Wherever I have shown it to you here, it's been veiled, it's been in the symptom, it has come from elsewhere, it has been fantasmatic interference. For us, as analysts, it suggests the place where it exists as a fantasy, but it's something different when it gets projected out before the image of the host.

I have already alluded to these profane obsessions the subject is obsessed by. To be sure, the religious life is present in the obsessional in a profoundly reworked form, one infiltrated by symptoms, but, by a curious sort of conformity, his religious life, and especially his sacramental life, shows itself to be perfectly suited to giving the obsessional's symptoms the groove, the mould into which he so easily flows, especially in the Christian religion. I do not have much experience of obsessions in Muslims, for example, but it would be worth the effort to see how they manage it, I mean how the horizon of their belief, such as it's structured in Islam, gets implicated in an obsessional phenomenology. Whenever Freud had an obsessional with a Christian background, whether the Rat Man or the Wolf Man, he clearly showed the importance of Christianity in their evolution and economy. One cannot fail to see that with its articles of faith the Christian religion places us before this astonishing, bold – to say the least – and cheeky solution, which consists in having this function of the signifier whose action marks life as such borne by an incarnated person, a god-man. The Christian Logos as incarnated Logos gives a precise solution to the system of the relations between 504 man and speech, and it's not for nothing that God incarnate was called the Word.

Also, we should not be astonished that in this observation it's at the level of the ever-renewed symbol of this incarnation that this subject conjures up the phallus signifier, which is substituted for her therein. Of course, this signifier doesn't form part of the religious context as such, but if what we say is true, it's no surprise to see it appear in this place.

In this place, it's clear that it plays quite a different role from where it was when we interpreted it at the beginning. When it appears again at a later point in the observation, it would be equally erroneous to interpret its function as homogeneous with the manner in which it intervenes here at the level of the symptom.

When, at a much later period of the observation, the subject communicates this fantasy to her analyst – 'I dreamt that I was crushing the head of Christ under my feet, and this head looked like yours' [p. 225], the function of the phallus is not, as one feels obliged to say, identified there with the analyst as the vehicle of the phallus. If the analyst is identified with the phallus, it's insofar as, at this moment in the history of the transference, he incarnates the effect of signifiers for the subject and the relationship to speech, whose horizon she then begins to project a little bit further owing to a number of the effects of the detente that has taken place in the treatment. To interpret this at the time in a homogeneous manner in terms of Penisneid was to miss the opportunity to relate the patient to what is more profound in her situation. Perhaps she would then have been able, effectively, to perceive the relationship that, in the distant past, she had formed between this x that fundamentally provoked the Other's demand as a demand for death and the very first perception that she would have had of the intolerable rivalry in the form of the mother's desire attached to this far-off love that distanced her from both her husband and her child. The phallus has to be situated here at the level of the signifier of the Other as barred, S(Ⱥ), as identical to the profoundest signification that the Other has attained for the subject.

The phallus appears again in the same place at a slightly later moment in the analysis, at a time when many dreams that have brought it to light from this angle have come under consideration. In one of these dreams that are the most commonly observed in the majority of neuroses, the patient sees herself as a phallic being, seeing one of her breasts replaced by a phallus, or a phallus located between her two breasts. That is one of the most frequent oneiric fantasies that one can encounter in any analysis.

505 Is this, as we are told, about a 'desire for a masculine identification with possession of the phallus'? [p. 224]. He has a go at speculating – 'If she sees her own breasts transformed into a penis, isn't she transferring the oral aggressiveness primitively directed against the maternal breast onto the man's penis?' [p. 224]. That is one kind of reasoning. But on the other hand he observes how extensive the phallus is in its given form. We well know that its presence can be polyphallic. As soon as there is more than one phallus, I would almost say that we find ourselves before the outline of this fundamental image that is quite well represented by Diana of the Ephesians, whose body consists of a cascade of breasts.

At a time when the analyst has already drawn an equivalence between shoes and the phallus, a dream immediately follows the two first attempts which, according to the analyst, confirms it. 'I get my shoe repaired at the shoemakers, then I climb onto a balcony decorated with blue, white and red paper lanterns, where there are only men – my mother is in the crowd, admiring me' [pp. 224–5]. Can we be satisfied here with speaking of Penisneid? Isn't it obvious that the relationship to the phallus is of a different order? The dream itself indicates that it's linked to a relationship of exhibition, and not in the presence of those who carry it, the other men there with her on the balcony – whose blue, white and red paper lanterns, this is almost too good to be true, evoke for us all sorts of variously obscene backgrounds – but in the presence of her mother.

We find here this compensatory fantasmatic relationship I was talking about last time, a relationship of power, no doubt, but in relation to a third party, who is her mother. The presence of the phallus in the subject's relationship to the image of her semblable, the little other, the image of the body, is precisely the image whose true function in the subject's equilibrium is to be studied, rather than interpreted and purely and simply assimilated to its function at the time of its other appearances. This is testimony here to a flagrant lack of criteria in the orientation of interpretation.

Finally, then, where are all the analyst's interventions in this observation going? Towards facilitating in the subject what he calls the becoming conscious of some sort of lack of or nostalgia for the penis, by facilitating her exit from her fantasies by centring her on a less powerful fantasy, whereas the majority of the facts go against this interpretation.

The analyst has changed the meaning of the phallus for the patient, he has rendered it legitimate for her. This comes down more or less to teaching her to love her obsessions. This is the evaluation of this therapeutics that we are given – the obsessions have not diminished, the patient simply no longer feels guilty about them. The result is brought about by an intervention essentially centred on 506 the fabric of her fantasies and their value as fantasies of rivalry with man, rivalry supposed to transpose some kind of aggressiveness towards the mother, the roots of which are never touched.

We end up with this. The analyst's operation of authorization disconnects the fabric of her obsessions from a fundamental demand for death. In operating in this way, he authorizes and ultimately legitimates her fantasy and, as one can only legitimate in a block, her abandonment of the genital relationship is, as such, consummated. When the subject learns to love her obsessions, inasmuch as they are invested with the full signification of what happens to her, we see at the end of the case all kinds of extremely euphoric intuitions develop.

I invite you to refer to it, since it's getting too late for me to read it out to you today. You will certainly find this style of narcissistic effusion – a phenomenon at the end of analyses that some people have emphasized. The author doesn't have too many illusions on this count. 'The positive transference', he writes, 'became clearer with these very strongly pregenitalized Oedipal characteristics' [p. 233]. And he concludes on a note of profound incompleteness, with very few illusions over the possibility of a truly genital solution, as one says.

What, it seems to me, has not at all been seen is the close correlation between this result and the very mode of interpretation, namely, that it targets the reduction of demand rather than its elucidation. It's all the more paradoxical since these days one is accustomed to stressing the importance of the interpretation of aggressiveness. Perhaps this term is just too vague for practitioners to be always able to use it to find their way around. The term 'demand for death' could be profitably substituted for it, as it is in German, to indicate the level of subjective articulation of demand that one can be required to achieve.

Since I alluded to the commandments earlier and also spoke of Christianity, I would like to finish by drawing your attention to what is not one of the least mysterious of the commandments. It's not a moral commandment, since it's founded on identification. It's the one that, on the horizon of all the commandments, is promoted in its Christian wording in the formula 'You will love your neighbour as yourself.'

507 I do not know if you have ever paused over what that entails. It entails all sorts of objections. First, the beautiful souls cry, '"As yourself!" But more! Why "as yourself"? That's so little!' The more experienced people say to themselves, 'But seriously, is it so certain that one loves oneself?' Experience effectively proves that we have the strangest and most contradictory feelings about ourselves. And then, this 'yourself' may seem, if we take it from a certain perspective, to place egoism at the heart of love. How is one to make it the measure, the model and the paragon of love? This is what surprises one most.

These objections are completely valid, in fact, and one can make them apparent by the impossibility of responding to this sort of interpellation in the first person. No one has ever suggested that 'I love my neighbour as myself' could be a reply, because then the weakness of the formulation of the commandment would become apparent to the eyes of all. If, however, it is worth dwelling on, it's because it illustrates what earlier I called the horizon of the words of the commandment.

If we formulate it where it has to begin, that is, in the locus of the Other, it reveals itself to be something quite different, namely a circle, symmetrical and parallel to the one that, as I showed you, is subjacent to the position taken by the Other at the simple level of the first demand, and which says, 'You are the one who kills me.' The 'as yourself' at the level at which the commandment is formulated in being completed by it can't be the expression of any kind of egoism, inasmuch as the 'you' leads us to recognize in this 'yourself' nothing other than the 'tu', thou. The Christian commandment henceforth reveals its value in being extended – '. . . as yourself you are, at the level of speech, the one you hate in the demand for death, because you are unaware of it'.

This is where it meets the point on the horizon at which Freud's counsel is formulated, his 'Wo Es war, soll Ich werden'.

It's also what another wise saying expresses in its 'You are that.'

This is what must in the end come to mark the subject's authentic and full assumption in his own speech.

This means that the subject must recognize where he is on this horizon of speech without which nothing in analysis can be formulated except the tracing out of false pathways and the production of misrecognition.

APPENDICES

THE GRAPH OF DESIRE

The definitive version of the major schema elaborated over the course of the Seminar, subsequently called 'The Graph of Desire', can be found on page 692 of Écrits. This 'complete graph' was preceded by several versions that represent the stages of its development (pp. 681, 684 and 690). The complete form is reproduced below.

EXPLANATION OF THE SCHEMAS

On 31 January 1958, between weeks eleven and twelve, Lacan met with a small group of participants who had asked him for further explanation of the schemas he had introduced at his Seminar. This discussion (perhaps in the form of a response to questions) was not taken down in full and the notes taken by Paul Lemoine, which consist of a summary plus some drawings, are the only record. These are reproduced below in expanded form, and should be read with the obvious caveat: this is not one of Lacan's written texts, nor is it a class from his Seminar.

1 The signifying chain

It is not possible to define the analytic field without establishing the structuring function of signifiers in relation to the subject and their constitutive value in the subject qua speaking subject. In a word, the human subject cannot be disconnected from discourse – more precisely, from the signifying chain.

Some authors have managed to avoid this fact in the name of mechanistic or biologistic prejudices, but the psychoanalytic experience is of the highest importance for showing that it is unavoidable. It shows, effectively, that at the level of the signifying chain as such, subjects are captured in the Other, that is, the unconscious, and no subject has access to the unconscious without the Other's intervention.

The theme of the father, which is one of the themes of social life, but which is also present in the unconscious closest to the primitive instincts, can only be identified on the condition that the Name-of-the-Father as a signifying knot be brought into play. A signification that stems from the signifying chain's relation to itself converges on this signifier. If this were not so, the Name-of-the-Father could not enter into any form of intersubjectivity whatsoever. It's effectively the signifying chain that differentiates the human subject from animal life. For the animal, there is, in a certain sense, a form of intersubjectivity, but it is completely different in kind. The same goes for identification: no system of identification is conceivable unless one brings into play something that is foreign to animal life, namely the signifying chain.

This has major consequences for [analytic] practice. For want of having understood this, a certain analyst (Bouvet) leaves himself open to deviations in technique by virtue of the prevailing importance he gives to the homosexual relationship between the analyst and the analysand, and to imaginary fellatio, a term that is ambiguous with 'imaginary filiation'. For him, everything takes place at the level of the imaginary relationship, the one that links the ego to the little other. On the contrary, Schema L [see Écrits, p. 53] is intended precisely to indicate that the question is whether, along the vector that goes from the Other to the subject, there is anything that traverses this imaginary relationship or not. 514

2 This year's schema

This year's schema is only a response to the quilting points that link the signifier to the signified.

The terms I have put there have a transformative role, in this respect. In themselves, their only originality is as signifiers. Our interest in them lies not so much in their meaning, which is necessarily ambiguous and even contradictory, but in their conjunction as signifiers.

This schema can be reduced to the following, which stands for the signifying chain.

$$\frac{S \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots}{s \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots}$$

I only have to bend the line you see there.

The retroactive effect of signifiers acts upon the signifieds. Whatever form we give this term 'signifying chain', as soon as there is a signifying chain, there is a sentence. And there is a sentence whenever something is complete at the level of signifiers, that is, all the signifiers that have been uttered, in their place, between the start and the punctuation. Meaning is formed when the final word of the sentence has been uttered. Consider my example of the line from Athaliah: 'Yes, I come into the temple to worship the Lord.' We can represent this retroaction of the signifier on the schema. When point p is attained, when it is produced, something is obtained at an earlier point, at p'.

What comes next represents the discourse's intention for you, which also has to be indicated inasmuch as the discourse is not 515 detached from the concrete individuality who is uttering it.

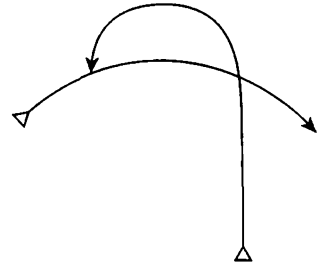
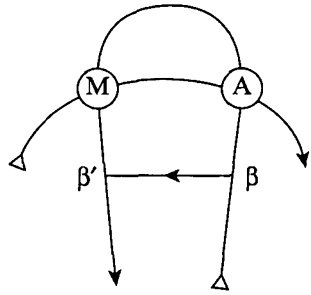
As analysts, we have at our disposal this middle term that enables discourse to be inserted into the human subject, namely, the term 'desire'. Desire's point of departure is at the same level as the point from which the signifying chain departs. Everything else is situated from there.

The duality of the subject operates in an 'intersubjective conjunction'. From its first cry, the newborn baby connects with the mother from whom it will acquire the use of the signifying chain. That's essentially the schema.



The encounter with the Other is projected onto that. The message is the result. For the message to be formed, it is sufficient that there be a receiver* and a sender*.

The support by desire is inscribed the length of the line of retroaction. The action of speaking has effects on the desire of the subject who articulated it, and these effects are produced retroactively. The result is inscribed at the end of the retrograde vector.



At the level of the short-circuit A, β, β′, M, the subject is an animal. Everything that happens at the animal level happens at β, β′. The specular imaginary confrontation $a - a'$ is located at this level. 516

3 Concerning the Oedipus complex

This schema thus shows the place of the imaginary mother–phallus–child triad introduced last year with respect to the most primitive perversions like fetishism. I didn't feel comfortable about giving it to you without first being able to situate it like this today. There are other relations, also in the neuroses, that can be established prior to the Oedipus complex, but the subject has to be structured Oedipally for it to be possible to formulate anything about them.

The relationship to the mother in masculine homosexuality is structured in a current drama that is being played out between S, a, a′, A. The notion of the phallic woman, which is usually brought into the account in such cases, is confused and doesn't fit what we learn from analysis. It's actually a question of the mother's relationship to the father's speech. The mother currently lays down the law.

Further verification of the significance of this schema reveals the meaning of the identification with the father that occurs at the end of the Oedipus complex. It makes it possible to situate the paradoxes of the subject's relations to the penis: the appendage required of the eroticized object, the threat of terror that is formed fantasmatically.

Inasmuch as I have been able to combine this schema and the schema where the code turns back upon the message – which introduces intersubjectivity and the relationship to the Other, not as present, but as produced by speech itself – we can start to give meaning to the term 'identification' by superimposing the two triangles.

Identification is Dante's condemned couple, who kiss on the mouth and each becomes the other.

EDITOR'S NOTE

The schema constructed over the course of this Seminar ('the graph of desire') acquired its definitive form in 'Subversion of the Subject and the Dialectic of Desire', written in 1962. See, in particular, Écrits, pp. 681–93.

For the first part of Formations of the Unconscious, Lacan refers to 'The instance of the Letter', a text from May 1957 (Écrits, pp. 412–41).

Following the first seven chapters of the Seminar, over December and January, Lacan wrote 'On a Question Prior to Any Possible Question of Psychosis' (Écrits, pp. 445–88).

Lacan wrote 'The Youth of Gide' (Écrits, pp. 623–44) over the February vacation and it was published in April. One finds an echo of it in Lesson XIV of the Seminar, the first lesson of the part, 'The Significance of the Phallus'.

The six lessons of this part, as well as the lesson of 7 May, are influenced by the prospect of the public lecture that Lacan was to give in Munich on 9 May called 'The Signification of the Phallus' (Écrits, pp. 575–84).

Finally, the last part coincides with 'The Direction of the Treatment and the Principles of its Power', a paper presented at Royaumont in July (Écrits, pp. 489–542).

I would like to express my gratitude to Judith Miller, the young girl of the 'Ahht!', who was the first reader of the manuscript and proofs, and made many useful suggestions.

I also express, once again, my gratitude to Gennie Lemoine, who placed at my disposal the totality of the notes taken at Lacan's Seminar by her husband, the late Paul Lemoine. I made use of his notes of this Seminar from January 1958 on. Paul does not seem to have attended the first trimester; he possessed a photocopy of the first seven lessons that had been typed up for Lacan.

Readers in a position to send me new information or offer corrections and improvements are kindly invited to write to me care of the publisher.

Chapter III The Miglionaire

(43, 3) See above, p. 36.

(43, 4) André Gide, Paludes (Paris: Gallimard, 1973) is a short novel originally published in 1895, translated as Marshlands. See Gide, Marshlands and Prometheus Misbound.

(43, 5) That is, he plays no part in choosing who will receive the gift.

(45, 6) See Jokes, SE 7: 140–2. Freud here speaks of the 'subjective determinants' of wit.

(47, 1) The reference is to Émile Littré, Dictionnaire de la langue française, first published by Hachette 1863–1872, and now available online at <http://littre.reverso.net/dictionnaire-francais/>.

(47, 2) See Charles Chassé, Lueurs sur Mallarmé (Paris: Editions de la Nouvelle revue critique, 1947) and Les clés de Mallarmé (Paris: Aubier, 1954).

(50, 3) See the graph, Ch. 1, p. 10, where the metonymic object is located at β'.

(54, 5) '. . . le comte ne la contente pas, à ceci près que le comte, s'il est, comme je le dis, aussi peu contentant, peut ne s'apercevoir de rien.'

(55, 1) The response is a meaningless one that plays on the standard response to being asked how one is, which is to say 'Et toi?' ('And you?') by instead giving a silly response, 'Et toile à matelas!', 'And a mattress-cover!' To respond, 'Et toile à édredon!', 'And an eiderdown-cover!', would ruin the effect.

Chapter IV The Golden Calf

(58, 1) What is 'a bit too swift' is this one-line summary of the philosophical enterprise that goes from the formal logic of Aristotle to the transcendental logic of Kant.

(61, 4) On metaphor, see Seminar III, Chs 17 and 18, esp. pp. 219ff, as well as 'The Instance of the Letter'.

(61, 5) See Jokes, SE 8: 88.

(63, 3) 'Le premier vol de l'Aigle' plays on the two meanings of 'vol', flight and theft. The expression 'the flight of the Eagle' refers to Napoleon I's successful return from exile on Elba in 1815 and reinstatement as Emperor.

(63, 4) See Jokes, SE 8: 37.

(64, 6) The reference is to Corneille, Le Cid, Act 4, Scene 3.

(65, 2) See Écrits, p. 422.

(66, 5) 'Un village de trente âmes' (a village of thirty souls) means a small village with few inhabitants.

(67, 1) 'Trente feux' (thirty fires) refers to there being thirty houses in a settlement or village.

(67, 3) 'Without Poland there'd be no Poles' are the last words of Jarry's play Ubu Roi. See Alfred Jarry, Ubu Roi, trans. Beverly Keith and G. Legman (New York: Dover, 2003).

(70, 2) See Félix Fénéon, Novels in Three Lines, trans. Luc Santé (New York: New York Review of Books Classics, 2007).

(71, 6) For this and the following three paragraphs, see the diagram on page 10.

(72, 6) In a footnote to Capital, Ch. 1, Sec. 3, Pt. A, 'Elementary or Accidental Form of Value', Marx writes: 'In a sort of way, it is with man as with commodities. Since he comes into the world neither with a looking glass in his hand, nor as a Fichtian philosopher, to whom "I am I" is sufficient, man first sees and recognizes himself in other men. Peter only establishes his own identity as a man by first comparing himself with Paul as being of like kind. And thereby Paul, just as he stands in his Pauline personality, becomes to Peter the type of the genus homo.' Das Kapital: A Critique of Political Economy (Washington, DC: Regnery, 2009), p. 18.

Chapter V A Bit-of-Sense and the Step-of-Sense

(76, 5) See, in particular, SE 8: 131.

(77, 6) Ernst Kris, 'Ego Psychology and Interpretation in Psychoanalytic Therapy', Psychoanalytic Quarterly 20/1 (1951): 15–29. Lacan mentions Kris's article in 'The Function and Field of Speech and Language in Psychoanalysis', Écrits, p. 244.

(78, 5) Act 3, Scene 2. The scene was censored after the second performance.

(80, 4) The delta is the small triangle at the lower right-hand side of the diagram.

(83, 1) The Interpretation of Dreams, SE, Vols. 4 and 5; The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, SE Vol. 6; and Jokes, Vol. 8.

(84, 4) See Octave Mannoni, Prospero and Caliban: The Psychology of Colonization, trans. Pamela Powesland, foreword by Maurice Bloch (Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1990). Originally published as Psychologie de la colonisation (Paris: Seuil, 1950).

(85, 2) The 'secondary circuit of need' refers to the level of pretext or invention mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

(85, 3) These are the three moments numbered I, II and III on the diagram.

(87, 3) 'Peu de sens' means 'little sense' as in 'Cela a peu de sens', 'That makes little sense', or even 'no sense', but Lacan is also drawing on the stand-alone meaning of the substantive as in 'un peu', 'a bit', 'a little', to form 'le peu de sens', 'the bit of sense'. 'Peu de sens' is translated as 'scant meaning' in Écrits.

(87, 4) An allusion to Albert Camus, who was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1957, and his novel The Outsider.

(87, 4) Lacan is playing on the homophony of 'veau', veal, and 'vaut', which is the third-person singular of 'valoir', to be worth.

(88, 2) See Jokes, SE 8: 143.

(89, 1) 'Pas' is an adverb of negation, as in the expression 'pas de sens', which occurs in expressions such as 'Ça n'a pas de sens', 'That makes no sense'. 'Pas' is also a substantive. In Lacan's examples, a 'pas de vis' is a screw thread, while a 'pas de quatre' is a dance in ballet for four dancers; it appears as a geographical term in 'Pas de Suse' which refers to Susa in Italy and in 'Pas de Calais' which is the French term for the Straits of Dover.

(90, 3) While 'motif' and 'mobile' mean roughly the same, namely motive, 'mobile' is usually restricted to the legal context of motive for a crime. Lacan is referring to Jokes, SE 8, Ch. 5, 'The Motives of Jokes – Jokes as a Social Process'.

Chapter VI Whoah, Neddy!

(92, 6) Lacan is referring to the 'subjective determinants' of the joke-work, SE 8: 142. Shortly after (144), Freud quotes Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, V.ii:

> A jest's prosperity lies in the ear
> Of him that hears it, never in the tongue
> Of him who makes it . . .

(95, 1) SE 8: 115. The example is discussed in 'The Instance of the Letter', Écrits, p. 436.

(96, 3) Freud refers to the expression 'psychical scene of action', which is likely to be a reference to Fechner. See Jokes, SE 8: 176.

(99, 1) Henri Bergson, Laughter: An Essay on the Meaning of the Comic, trans. Cloudesley Brereton and Fred Rothwell (London: Macmillan, 1935).

(107, 1) The Interpretation of Dreams, SE 4: 283.

(107, 3) Freud refers to the 'outer shell' of a joke in Jokes, SE 8: 55.

(107, 4) 'Être de la même paroisse' literally means coming from the same parish, but figuratively the expression indicates a shared perspective on things, having much in common, coming from the same background, thinking alike, and so forth.

Chapter VII Une Femme de Non-Recevoir, or: A Flat Refusal

(109, 1) 'En esprit'. 'Trait d'esprit' and 'mot d'esprit' are translated here as 'joke' or 'witticism'.

(113, 1) 'Rough breathing' refers to the diacritical mark in ancient Greek that is placed inter alia over the α to indicate that it is aspirate. It is represented here by an inverted comma.

(113, 3) See the 'optical model' in 'Remarks on Daniel Lagache's Presentation: "Psychoanalysis and Personality Structure"', in Écrits, pp. 543–74 and the discussion in Seminar I, Chs 10 and 11.

(114, 2) See Freud, Jokes, Ch. 7, 'Jokes and the Species of the Comic'.

(115, 2) The French here is untranslatable. The expression 'une fin de non-recevoir' is a legal expression meaning the rejection of a claim. In ordinary, somewhat elevated language it means a flat refusal, in the sense of dismissing out of hand. Lacan's patient unwittingly creates the new expression 'une femme [a woman] de non-recevoir', which sounds very similar to the original expression, but doesn't exist in French.

(121, 6) 'Die Kunst-Religion [Religion in the Form of Art]' is Ch. 7, Pt. B, of Hegel's Phenomenology of Mind.

(122, 2) Lacan has in mind Aristophanes' Assemblywomen. See Aristophanes, The Assemblywomen in The Birds and Other Plays, trans. David Barrett and Alan H. Sommerstein (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1978).

(122, 4) See The Assemblywomen, p. 127.

> Un air doux, et posé, parmi d'autres enfans,
> M'inspira de l'amour pour elle, dès quatre ans.
> (I. i. 28–9)

(124, 5) A reference to Colette's 1919 novella, Mitsou; or How Girls Grow Wise, trans. Jane Terry (London: Victor Gollancz, 1930).

(124, 6) 'Horace avec deux mots en ferait plus que vous' (V. iv. 1605).

(125, 2) The exchange takes place in Act 2, Scene 4.

Chapter VIII Foreclosure of the Name-of-the-Father

(129, 2) The 'earlier schema' is schema L. See Écrits, p. 40.

(130, 1) Gisela Pankow was at this time a colleague of Lacan's at the French Psychoanalytic Society. Her book, L'Etre-là du schizophrène: Contribution à la méthode de structuration dynamique dans les psychoses [Being-There of the Schizophrenic: A Contribution to the Method of Dynamic Structuration in the Psychoses] (Paris: Aubier, 1981), which presents her work on psychosis dating back to 1956. It was on a visit to the US in the 1950s that she met Gregory Bateson.

(135, 2) Une vérité de M. de la Palice is a truism or tautology.

(136, 3) 'Tu' is the second-person singular personal pronoun. It is homophonic with 'tue' and 'tues', present-tense singular forms of the verb 'tuer', to kill.

(160, 7) Friedrich Nietzsche, 'Before Sunrise', Thus Spake Zarathustra, trans. Thomas Common (New York: Start Publishing, 2012), pp. 244–8.

(161, 2) Possibly a reference to French humourist, Pierre Henri Cami.

Chapter X The Three Moments of the Oedipus Complex (I)

(163, line 2) Freud's 'Der Untergang des Ödipuskomplexes', translated as 'The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex' in SE 19, is translated into French as 'Le déclin du complexe d'Oedipe'.

(166, 4) The reference is to First Corinthians 3: 18, 'beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord'.

(170, 3) Ernest Hemingway's To Have and Have Not was translated into French as En avoir ou pas. The French literally means to have some or not.

(171, 2) See Sigmund Freud, Analysis of a Phobia in a Five-Year-Old Boy, SE 10: 5–149.

(177, 2) See the final session of Le séminaire IV, Ch. 24.

Chapter XI The Three Moments of the Oedipus Complex (II)

(183, 4) The 'ferret' is a reference to a children's song, 'Le jeu du furet', the opening lines of which are:

> Il court, il court, le furet
> Le furet du bois, mesdames,
> Il court, il court, le furet
> Le furet du bois joli.
> He runs, he runs, the wood ferret does,
> The wood ferret, my Ladies,
> He runs, he runs, the ferret does
> The pretty wood ferret.

(192, 3) This is most likely a reference to Freud's remark, added to the 1915 edition of The Three Essays on Sexuality SE 7: 146, n.1: 'The absence of a strong father in childhood not infrequently favours the occurrence of inversion.'

(203, 4) The 'Letter 52' Lacan refers to is a letter from Freud to Wilhelm Fliess dated 6 December 1896. It was published in The Origins of Psycho-Analysis: Letters to Wilhelm Fliess, Drafts and Notes, 1887–1902, ed. Marie Bonaparte, Anna Freud and Ernst Kris, trans. Eric Mosbacher and James Strachey (London: Imago, 1954), 173–81. It appeared in a new translation as the letter of 6 December 1896 in The Complete Letters of Sigmund Freud to Wilhelm Fliess, 1887–1904, ed. and trans. Chapter XIII Fantasy, Beyond the Pleasure Principle (216, 1) Lacan will refer to three papers by Ernest Jones on female sexuality: 'The Early Development of Female Sexuality', International Journal of Psychoanalysis 8 (1927): 459–72; 'The Phallic Phase', International Journal of Psychoanalysis, 14 (1933): 1–13; and 'Early Female Sexuality', International Journal of Psychoanalysis 16 (1935): 263–73. All three are reprinted in his collection, Papers on Psycho-Analysis, 5th edn (1948; repr. London: Karnac, 1977), while the first and the third are also reprinted in Russell Grigg, Dominique Hecq and Craig Smith (eds), Female Sexuality: The Early Psychoanalytic Controversies (London: Rebus, 1999; repr. London: Karnac, 2015). Hanns Sachs's article was published in English as 'On the Genesis of Perversions', trans. Ruth B. Goldberg, American Imago 48 (1991): 283–93.

(228, 4) See Freud, 'Economic Problem of Masochism', SE 19: 159; see also a footnote by James Strachey in 'Instincts and Their Vicissitudes', SE 14: 121.

> Not to be born is best
> When all is reckoned in, but once a man has seen the light
> The next best thing, by far, is to go back
> Where he came from. (lines 1388–91)

(229, 1) See Freud, 'Economic Problem of Masochism', SE 19: 160.

Chapter XIV Desire and Jouissance

(236, 7) The person in question would be either Jean Laplanche or Jean-Bertrand Pontalis whose joint publication, 'Fantasme originaire, fantasme des origines, origine du fantasme', appeared in Les temps modernes 215, in April 1964, and was published as a monograph by Hachette in 1985. It was published as 'Fantasy and the Origins of Sexuality' in International Journal of Psychoanalysis 49 (1968): 1–18, and reprinted in Formations of Fantasy, ed. Victor Burgin, James Donald and Cara Kaplan (London: Methuen, 1986).

(237, 4) Lacan had neglected to mention 'The Early Development of Female Sexuality' the previous week.

(242, 3) Jean Delay, La jeunesse d'André Gide (Paris: Gallimard, 1956); The Youth of André Gide, abridged and trans. June Guicharnaud (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963).

(242, 4) The story Gide refers to is actually mentioned in Georges Sand, Histoire du véritable Gribouille (1850).

> Gribouille throws himself into the water one day that it is raining very hard, not to avoid the rain, as his wicked brothers say, but to avoid his brothers, who are laughing at him. For some time, he struggles in the water and tries to swim; then he lets himself go and as soon as he lets himself go, he floats; then he feels himself becoming tiny, light, odd, vegetal; leaves sprout out of him all over his body; and soon Gribouille turns into a slender, graceful sprig of oak, which the water gently deposits on the bank of the stream . . . no schoolboy was ever troubled by any page of Aphrodite so much as I – ignorant little boy that I was – by the metamorphosis of Gribouille. (André Gide, If it Dies . . ., trans. Dorothy Bussy (London: Penguin, 1977), pp. 60–1)

Also see Lacan's detailed study of Gide in the article, published in 1958, 'The Youth of Gide, or the Letter and Desire', Écrits, pp. 623–44.

(244, 7) André Gide, Madeleine, trans. Justin O'Brien (Chicago, IL: Ivan R. Dee, 1989), pp. 30–1.

> Personne ne peut soupçonner ce qu'est l'amour d'un uraniste, dégagé de toutes le contingences sexuelles: quelque chose de si fort, de si bien préservé, quelque chose d'embaumé contre quoi le temps n'a plus prise. (No one has any idea what the love of a uranist is, devoid of all its sexual contingencies: something so strong, so well preserved, something embalmed against which time is powerless.) (Jean Schlumberger, Madeleine et André Gide (Paris: Gallimard, 1956), p. 193)

(245, 2) Harpagon is the protagonist of Molière's play, The Miser. When Madeleine Gide informed her husband that she had burnt all his letters, he wrote in his journal, 'I immediately felt ruined. I no longer have any heart for anything, and all the light in my heaven is extinguished' (Madeleine, p. 68).

(246, 5) Jean Genet, The Balcony, trans. Bernard Frechtman (New York: Grove Press, 1966). The play premiered in Paris in 1957.

Chapter XV The Girl and the Phallus

(256, 1) Melanie Klein introduced a distinction, not drawn by Freud, between largely unconscious 'phantasies' and 'fantasies' such as daydreams, reveries, imagined scenarios, and the like. Lacan is here using the term 'fantaisie' for the former.

(268, 4) Claude Lévi-Strauss (1949), Elementary Structures of Kinship revised edn (Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1969).

Chapter XVI Insignias of the Ideal

(274, 1) The term was introduced in 1917 by Johan H. W. van Ophuijsen. See his 'Contributions to the Masculinity Complex of Women', International Journal of Psychoanalysis 5 (1924): 39–49; repr. in Grigg et al. (eds), Female Sexuality.

Chapter XVII The Formulas of Desire

(286, 2) 'Ce que femme veut, Dieu veut' is a French saying which literally means 'What a woman wants, God wants'.

(291, 3) There is a passing simile in the Ethics, Pt. 1, Proposition 17, Corollary 2, where Spinoza contrasts the 'celestial' constellations Canis Major and Canis Minor with the 'terrestrial' barking animal.

Chapter XVIII Symptoms and Their Masks

(305, 3) Elisabeth von R. was one of Freud's early patients. Her case is discussed in Studies on Hysteria, SE 2: 135–81.

(308, 2) See 'On the Universal Tendency to Debasement in the Sphere of Love', SE 11: 177–90.

(308, 5) Donner et se donner. 'Aimer, c'est tout donner et se donner soi-même (to love is to give everything and to give oneself)' is a line from a French hymn, popular at the wedding Mass.

(311, 3) See René Spitz, The First Year of Life: A Psychoanalytic Study of Normal and Deviant Development of Object Relations, in collaboration with W. Godfrey Cobliner (New York: International Universities Press, 1965). The book is based on the author's 'Genèse des premières relations objectales (Genesis of the First Object Relations)', published in the Revue française de psychanalyse in 1954.

(314, 3) The French 'oblativité', here rendered as 'oblativity', means the propensity to give oneself to others or to God without an expectation of reciprocity, to dedicate oneself to a cause without expecting anything in return. In French psychoanalysis and psychology it has come to refer to something like authentic generosity and altruistic behaviour.

(334, 3) The reference is to Immanuel Kant. See his Critique of Pure Reason, trans. and ed. Paul Guyer and Allen W. Wood (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998).

(338, 4) Lacan is quoting from the French translation of Die Traumdeutung. This and following quotations are from The Interpretation of Dreams, Standard Edition 4: 147–50.

(351, 2) The phrase, 'la belle et bonne forme', is something of a fixed expression in French. It reflects the ancient Greeks' usage of the term 'kalokagathia' to indicate that which is beautiful-and-good, referring to Plato's identification of the two.

(351, 5) Claude Lévi-Strauss, Tristes Tropiques, trans. John and Doreen Weightman (London: Jonathan Cape, 1973).

(358, 2) 'En avoir ou pas' is also the French title of Ernest Hemingway's 1937 novel, To Have and Have Not.

Chapter XXVII Exiting via the Symptom

(449, 1) 'Common sense is the most fairly distributed thing in the world, for each one thinks he is so well-endowed with it that even those who are hardest to satisfy in all other matters are not in the habit of desiring more of it than they already have.' The opening words of René Descartes, Discourse on the Method for Rightly Conducting One's Reason.

(453, 3) This study group included Jean Laplanche and Jean-Bertrand Pontalis, the authors of The Language of Psycho-Analysis, trans. Donald Nicholson-Smith (London: The Hogarth Press, 1973).

(455, 1) Compare this diagram with the slightly different one in Lacan's 'Question', Écrits, p. 465.

(456, 2) For further discussion, see Lacan, 'Question', Écrits, p. 452.

Chapter XXVIII You Are the One You Hate

(456, ch. title) 'Tu es celui que tu hais', 'You are the one you hate', and 'Tu es celui que tu es', 'You are the one you are', are homophonic.

(471, 3) See Sigmund Freud, 'Notes Upon a Case of Obsessional Neurosis', SE 10: 187. '"If you received a command to take your examination this term at the first possible opportunity, you might manage to obey it. But if you were commanded to cut your throat with a razor, what then?" He had at once become aware that this command had already been given, and was hurrying to the cupboard to fetch his razor when he thought: "No, it's not so simple as that. You must go and kill the old woman."'

Desire and Its Interpretation

1958–1959

INTRODUCTION

CONSTRUCTING THE GRAPH

Reintroducing the word "desire"
Poets and philosophers
The three schemas
A defense against distress
Darwin and the Devil's shudder

This year we are going to talk about desire and its interpretation.

A psychoanalysis is a therapeutic process, as people are wont to say. Let us say that it is a treatment, a psychical treatment.

This treatment concerns different levels of the psyche, first and foremost what I will call marginal or residual phenomena, such as dreams, slips of the tongue, and witticisms. These were the first scientific objects of psychoanalytic experience and the ones I emphasized last year.

Examining the curative aspect of this treatment, we find that it also concerns symptoms, broadly speaking, insofar as they manifest themselves in subjects in the guise of inhibitions. The latter form symptoms and are sustained by symptoms.

Lastly, it is a treatment that modifies structures – namely, those that are known as neuroses or neuropsychoses – which Freud at first characterized as "neuropsychoses of defense."

In what way does psychoanalysis intervene so as to deal at various levels with these different phenomenal realities? It intervenes insofar as they involve desire.

The phenomena that I called residual or marginal were initially apprehended by Freud, in the symptoms that we see described from one end of his work to the other, under the heading of desire and as significant as regards desire.

Similarly, anxiety [angoisse], inasmuch as we consider it to be key to the determination of symptoms, arises only insofar as some activity that enters into the play of symptoms becomes eroticized – or, to put it better, is taken up in the mechanism of desire.

Finally, what does the very term "defense" mean when it is used regarding the neuropsychoses? What is there a defense against, if it is not desire itself?

To conclude this introduction, it will suffice to indicate that libido, a notion that lies at the heart of psychoanalytic theory, is nothing but the psychical energy of desire.

I previously indicated in passing – recall my metaphor of the factory – that in order for the notion of energy to hold up, certain conjunctions of the symbolic with the real are necessary. I cannot, however, go into this specific point right now.

Analytic theory is thus thoroughly based on the notion of libido – that is, on the energy of desire.

Yet, as we have been seeing for some time now, analytic theory is moving ever further in a different direction.

Those who champion this new orientation very consciously indicate its originality, at least those among them who are most conscious of what they are doing. Fairbairn, who is the most typical representative of this trend, has written on several occasions – because he never stops writing – and, specifically, in a collection entitled Psychoanalytic Studies of the Personality, that modern psychoanalytic theory has changed its axis somewhat compared to the one Freud initially gave it, inasmuch as it no longer considers libido to be "pleasure-seeking"* but, rather, to be "object-seeking."*

I have frequently discussed this trend, which views libido as correlated with an object that is supposed to be in some sense predestined for it. I have already shown you its impact on psychoanalytic theory and technique in a thousand ways. I believe that I have managed on several occasions to designate the deviations from analytic practice that this trend entails, several of which might well be characterized as dangerous.

In order for us to broach the problem we will be focusing on this year, I wish to point out the importance of simply reintroducing the 13 word "desire" into our vocabulary, a word that is manifestly veiled in all of current psychoanalytic experience. By reintroducing it, we produce a feeling, not of revitalization, but of disorientation. I mean that, if instead of speaking about "libido" or the "genital object," we speak about "genital desire," it may seem harder to take for granted that the development of this desire automatically implies the possibility of opening oneself up to love, or the possibility of a total actualization of love. The latter seems to have become a doctrinal tenet in a certain perspective regarding the maturing of libido over time.

This trend regarding the maturing of libido is all the more surprising in that it has arisen at the heart of a doctrine that was the first to not simply highlight but even to account for what Freud classified under the heading of debasement in our love lives. Freud argued that, whereas desire seems in fact to bring with it a certain quantum of love, it is very often a love that leads to conflict within oneself, a love that is not owned, a love that refuses to be owned.

On the other hand, the simple fact that we reintroduce the word "desire" – instead of currently used terms like "affectivity" and "positive" or "negative feeling" that stem from what I would call a disgraceful approach to the forces at work in the analytic relationship, especially regarding transference – creates a split that will in and of itself, it seems to me, have an enlightening effect.

Indeed, if – instead of considering transference to be constituted by affects or positive or negative feelings, given everything those terms bring with them that is vague and veiled – we name what is experienced here with the single term "desire," and speak of sexual desire and aggressive desire with respect to the analyst, it will become immediately visible that these desires do not constitute the whole of transference. It will become clear that transference must be defined by something other than more or less confused references to the notion of affect, whether positive or negative.

The final benefit of pronouncing the word "desire" and of using it in its fullest sense is that we will ask ourselves, "What is desire?"

This is not a question that we will be able to answer simply. Were 14
I not bound here by what I might call an urgent rendezvous with the needs of psychoanalytic practice, I would allow myself an investigation into the meaning of the word "desire" in the work of those who are the most qualified to highlight its usage – namely, poets and philosophers. But I will not do so.

We will see how the word "desire" is used, transmitted, and functions in poetry later, assuming we take our investigation far enough. If it is true, as all of my work this year will show you, that desire's position is profoundly marked by, moored to, and riveted to a certain linguistic function – that is, to a certain relationship between the subject and the signifier [or: system of signifiers, le signifiant] – psychoanalytic experience will take us far enough in this exploration (at least I hope it will) for there to be ample time to take advantage of the specifically poetic evocation of this term. This will also allow us, in the end, to better understand the relations between the nature of poetic creation and desire.

I will simply comment that the difficulties characteristic of the game of hide-and-go-seek that lies at the basis of what our experience reveals to us can already be seen in the fact, for example, that poetry clearly bridles, as it were, at the depiction of desire's object. In this respect, figurative poetry – the kind that I would say virtually paints beauty's "roses and lilies" – always expresses desire with a singular coldness. Curiously enough, the opposite is true in the type of poetry that is dubbed metaphysical. This is owing to the law that, strictly speaking, rules the evocation of desire. For those among you who read English, I will refer here only to the most eminent of the metaphysical poets of English literature, John Donne, inviting you to read a famous poem like "The Ecstasy," for example, in order to observe how impressively the question of the structure of our relation to desire is raised in it.

The very title of Donne's poem indicates the beginnings of the direction taken by the poetic approach to desire, on the lyrical level at least, when desire itself is targeted. To be sure, when the poet's play girds itself with dramatic action, it goes much further in rendering desire present to mind. For the time being, I will leave this dimension to one side. But I am mentioning it already because we broached it last year – it is the dimension of comedy. We will have to come back to it later.

Let us not dwell on poets any longer here. I mentioned them only as a preliminary pointer, and in order to indicate that we will return to them later, more or less sporadically. I would like to dwell for a moment, instead, on a position espoused by certain philosophers, for it is quite exemplary, I believe, as regards where the problem lies for us.

I have taken the trouble to write the following terms on the blackboard for you: "pleasure-seeking"* and "object-seeking."* Speculative thinkers and moralists have always broached the problem in just such terms. I am referring to theoretical morality, the morality that is enunciated in the form of precepts and rules and in the operations of philosophers – above all, those referred to as ethicists.

I have already pointed out to you the basis of all morality that one could call "physicalistic," in the sense in which, in medieval philosophy, people talked about the physical theory of love as opposed to the ecstatic theory of love. Up to a certain point, we could say that every theory of morality that has hitherto been expressed in the philosophical tradition has, in short, taken as its basis what one might call the hedonistic tradition. The latter involves establishing a sort of equivalence between two terms, pleasure and the object, in the sense in which the object is the libido's natural object insofar as it is a boon [bienfait]. Once one adopts this criterion, pleasure must be admitted into the ranks of the goods [biens] sought by the subject and even into the ranks of the Sovereign Good, even if one refuses oneself pleasure.

Once we enter into Scholastic debates, the hedonistic ethical tradition no longer surprises us and we no longer perceive its paradoxes. Yet, in the end, what could be more contrary to what I shall call the experience of practical reason than the supposed convergence of pleasure with the good?

If we look at it closely – if we look, for example, at how things are expressed in Aristotle's work – what do we see being developed? In Aristotle's work it is very clear, things are very pure: pleasure and the good can only be equated in what I will call the master's ethics. This flattering ideal awards itself the term "temperance," 16 as opposed to "intemperance," suggesting as it does the subject's mastery over his own habits. Yet the inconsistency of this theory is quite striking.

If you reread the famous passages [in Aristotle's Ethics, Book 7] concerning the use of pleasures, you will see that everything that enters into this moralizing perspective has to do with the register of mastery, with a master's morality, and with that over which the master can achieve mastery [discipliner]. He can achieve mastery over many things, primarily his behavior when it comes to his habits – in other words, when it comes to the handling and use of his ego. But as concerns desire, things are quite different.

Aristotle – who was quite lucid about and conscious of what results from this practical and theoretical conceptualization of ethics – himself recognizes that desires (epithumia) go beyond a certain limit, which is precisely that of mastery and the ego, and that they very quickly enter the realm of what he calls "brutishness" or "beastiality." Desires are exiled from the field proper to man, assuming man identifies with the master's reality. Brutishness is, in this case, akin to perversion. Aristotle has, moreover, in this regard a singularly modern conception that might be translated by saying that the master cannot be judged on this score. This is almost tantamount to saying, in our vocabulary, that he cannot be recognized as responsible [for his desires]. These texts are worth recalling to mind and will enlighten you if you reread them.

In the camp opposing this particular philosophical tradition, there is someone whom I should like to name. He is, in my view, the precursor of something that I believe to be new, that we must consider to be new in, let us say, the progress or meaning of a certain relationship of man to himself, which is that of psychoanalysis such as Freud developed it. This someone is Spinoza.

It is, after all, in his work that we read, at least with a rather exceptional stress, a formulation like the following: "Desire is the very essence of man." So as not to separate the beginning of his formulation from what follows, I will add: "inasmuch as it is understood to be based on one of his inclinations, understood as determined and dominated by one of his inclinations to do something."

We could already spell out in detail what in this formulation 17 remains unrevealed, as it were. I say "unrevealed" because, of course, one cannot translate Spinoza using Freud. But I am mentioning it here as a quite singular bit of evidence. I no doubt have a greater fondness for Spinoza's work than others do, owing to the fact that I spent a lot of time reading Spinoza a very long time ago. Yet I do not believe that this is the reason why, in rereading his work on the basis of my own experience, it seems to me that someone who is involved in Freudian practice can feel quite at home reading texts like De Servitute Humana, written by someone for whom all of human reality is structured and organized on the basis of the attributes of divine substance. But let us leave this introductory remark aside as well for the time being, with the understanding that we will return to it.

I would like to give you a far more accessible example, with which I will conclude my philosophical references to our topic. I selected it at the most accessible level, or even the most common you can find. Open the dictionary by the late, charming Lalande, his Vocabulaire technique et critique de la philosophie ["Technical and Critical Dictionary of Philosophy" (Paris: PUF, 1960)]. Attempts to establish such dictionaries are extremely perilous and yet simultaneously fruitful, language being crucial to every problem we examine. You can be sure that in putting together a dictionary, you will come up with something suggestive. Here we find the following: "Desire: Begehren, Begehrung." It is worth recalling what desire means in German philosophy; it is:

> A spontaneous and conscious need tending [tendance] toward a known or imagined end. Desire is thus based on need, of which it is a special and more complex case. It opposes the will (or willing in general) insofar as the will also presupposes: (1) at least temporary coordination of the needs; (2) opposition between the subject and the object; (3) consciousness of its own effectiveness; and (4) an idea of the means by which the wished-for end can be realized.

These reminders are extremely useful, except for the fact that, in an article designed to define desire, there are but two lines to situate it in relationship to the needs, while the rest is related to the will. This is what the discourse on desire in this dictionary comes down to, except that the following is added to it: "Lastly, according to 18 certain philosophers, there is a specific kind of fiat in the will that is irreducible to the needs and that constitutes freedom." There is an air of irony in that last line, which is quite striking on the part of this philosophical author.

In a footnote, Lalande adds, "Desire is the need to procure oneself an emotion that has already been experienced or imagined; it is the natural will to have a certain pleasure." He follows this with quotes from the work of Rauh and Revault d'Allonnes, the term "natural will" being of interest as a reference. To which Lalande personally adds the following:

> This definition strikes me as a bit too narrow in that it does not adequately take into account the fact that certain needs precede their corresponding emotions. Desire essentially seems to me to be the desire for an act or a state, without a [mental] representation of the affective character of this end being necessary in every case.

I think he is referring to the representation of pleasure or of something else. Whatever the case may be, it certainly does not fail to raise the question of what is at stake, whether it is the representation of pleasure or pleasure itself. I certainly do not believe that it is a simple task to home in on the signification of desire by means of such a dictionary, all the more so in that one cannot say that the way was paved for this task by the tradition to which the author refers.

Is desire a psychological reality that rebels against all organization? Would we manage, in the final analysis, to broach the reality of desire by subtracting the characteristics indicated [by Lalande], insofar as they are those of the will? We would then have the contrary: we would have a non-coordination of the needs, even if only temporary; and the opposition between the subject and the object would truly disappear. Similarly, we would be faced with a need lacking in consciousness of its own effectiveness, and without an idea of the words by which it would realize the desired end. In short, we would find ourselves in a field in which psychoanalysis has contributed more precise formulations.

In effect, within these negative determinations, psychoanalysis very precisely traces out different levels: the drive, inasmuch as it is the non-coordination of the needs, even if only temporary; and fantasy, inasmuch as it introduces an essential link [articulation] or, more precisely, an altogether blatant type of link within the vague determination that we designate as the non-opposition between the subject and the object. It will be our goal this year to try to define what fantasy is, perhaps even a bit more precisely than the psychoanalytic tradition has hitherto been able to.

As for what remains of Lalande's definition, which implies idealism and pragmatism, I will retain but one thing for the time being – namely, how difficult it seems to be to situate and analyze desire with reference to objects alone.

I am going to stop here, in order to turn more specifically to the terms with which I believe I can lay out the problem of our experience for you this year: the terms "desire" and its "interpretation."

The internal or connecting link between desire and its interpretation in psychoanalytic experience has a feature that habit alone stops us from seeing – namely, the degree to which the interpretation of desire is already, in and of itself, subjective [or: concerns the subject, subjective], being linked just as internally to the very manifestation of desire.

You are aware of the vantage point from which we, I won't say are starting out, but are making headway. We have been working together for quite some time. We have been trying to conceptualize the outlines of our experience for five years already. These outlines are converging this year on a problem – which may be where all these points, some of which are quite far flung, converge – a problem that I am trying to pave a way to broach for you.

Since we have marched side by side these last five years, I can immediately posit that psychoanalysis essentially shows us what I will call the taking up [prise] of man in the constituent [constituant] of the signifying chain. This taking up is undoubtedly linked to the existence of human beings, but it is not coextensive with it. Humans speak, and in order to speak they must enter into language and into a pre-existing discourse. The law of subjectivity that psychoanalysis forcefully brings out – namely, the fundamental dependence of subjectivity on language – is so essential that all of psychology literally hinges on it.

I will say that, at the very least, there is a form of psychology that is utterly subject to language, the psychology that we can define as the sum total of studies concerning what I might call sensory experience [sensibilité], in the broadest sense, insofar as that experience functions so as to maintain totality or homeostasis. What is involved are, in short, an organism's sensory functions. Here everything is included: not only all of the experimental data of psychophysics, but also everything that can be contributed, most broadly speaking, by employing the notion of form in grasping the means by which constancy is maintained in an organism. An entire field of psychology is inscribed therein; it is sustained by the experience that is characteristic of it and it gives rise to research that continues to be carried out.

Nevertheless, the subjectivity in question – insofar as man is caught up in language, whether he likes it or not, and insofar as he is caught up in it far beyond his knowledge of it – is not immanent in sensory experience, if we understand the latter in terms of the stimulus–response pair. This is because the stimulus is given [by a researcher] as a function of a code that imposes its own order on need [that of the subject involved in the experiment], which must express itself in that code.

From an experimental perspective, one can at least try to account for the workings of the stimulus–response cycle in terms of signs. One can say that a stimulus is a sign given by the external environment that requires an organism to respond or defend itself, and that the organism in turn gives a sign. If you tickle the soles of a frog's feet, the frog responds with a certain muscular relaxation. But when it comes to subjectivity that is caught up in language, it is not a sign that is given, but rather a signifier.

Keep in mind the following, which appears to be simple: in the theory of communication, people talk about the sign as something that addresses someone and concerns a third thing that the sign represents. Quite recently again, we have been told that three is the minimum number of terms. Without even bothering to include a sender, they claim that, apart from someone who hears, we need but a sign, which signifies the third thing that the sign simply represents.

Now, as regards signifiers, this construction is false because a signifier does not concern a third thing that it supposedly represents 21 but concerns another signifier that it is not.

I would like to show you, not the genesis, but rather the construction of the three schemas I just put up on the blackboard [Figures 1.1, 1.2, and 1.3]. Now don't go thinking that we are talking about "stages" [étapes] here, even if we do occasionally find something like stages that are in fact gone through by the subject. The subject must come to occupy his place therein, but don't think of these schemas as typical stages of development; what is at stake is rather a generation, or a logical anteriority of each schema with respect to the one that follows it.

What does capital D represent? D represents the signifying chain. This basic, fundamental structure subjects every manifestation of language to the condition of being regulated by a succession – in other words, by diachrony, that is, by something that unfolds over time. S stands for "signifier."

I will leave to one side the temporal properties that are involved; we will perhaps be led to return to them later. Let us say that the fullness of the fabric [étoffe] of temporality, as they say, is not at all
2 involved here. Things boil down to the notion of succession here and to what it may already imply as regards the notion of scansion, but we are not there yet.

Our concern is with the subject's involvement [or: embeddedness, implication] in the signifier. It can only be established on the basis of a discrete or differential element.

Given what I just pointed out – namely, that a signifier is defined and takes on its value and meaning on the basis of its relationship to another signifier in a system of signifying oppositions – the signifying chain develops in a dimension that implies a certain synchrony of signifiers: a signifying battery.

We can raise a question: "What is the smallest possible battery?" I've tried to answer this little question. It seems to me that four is the smallest possible battery. Can one construct a language with four signifiers? I do not believe that it is unthinkable. Trying to figure out if it is possible will not lead you too far away from your experience, but let us leave that to one side. It is clear that, given the current state of affairs, we are far from being reduced to only four.

The following is of the essence: that which is indicated by the dotted line intersects the line that represents the signifying chain twice, first on the right and then on the left [d'avant en arrière].

The first intersection [the one on the right] takes place at the synchronic level, that of the simultaneous existence of signifiers. Point C is what I call the point at which the dotted line intersects the code. In other words, we have here the play of the signifier, something akin to a chatterbox. The child addresses a subject whom he knows to be a speaking subject, whom he has seen speaking, and who has talked his ear off since the beginning of his awakening to the light of day. Very early on, the subject must learn that, in order for his needs to be satisfied, their manifestations have to stoop to get through this doorway or narrow passageway.

M, the second point of intersection, is the one where the message is produced. It is always through the retroactive play of a series of signifiers that signification is, in fact, affirmed and becomes precise. It is only afterward that the message takes form, on the basis of the signifier or code that precedes it. Conversely, the message, as it is being formulated, constantly gets ahead of the code, placing a bet on the future [tire une traite].

I have already told you what results from the intentional process 23 that runs from the id to capital I.

What is at its origin presents itself in the form of the blossoming of need, or of "disposition" [or: predisposition, tendance], as psychologists say. This is represented in my schema at the level of the id. Here there is no return pathway that closes the circle, for the id is caught up in language, but it does not know what it is; it is not reflected on the basis of this innocent approach to language in which the subject initially turns himself into discourse.

The fact that the subject has relations with other speaking subjects results in the following, even when this is only just barely apprehended by him: what I have called the first or primal identification, I, occurs at the end of the intentional chain.

This is the first realization of an ideal about which one cannot even say at this point in the schema that it involves an ego-ideal, but simply that the subject receives the first stamp [seing] or signum of its relationship with the Other here.

Now for the second stage of the schema.

It can be thought to overlap in a sense with a certain stage of development, assuming that we do not view these stages as discontinuous. There are clear discontinuities in development, but they are not found in the stages of this schema. These discontinuities can be found, as Freud observes somewhere, at the level of the judgment of attribution in relation to simple naming. That is not what I am talking about now, although I will turn to it later.

The first part of this schema represents the infant (infans) level of discourse, for it is perhaps not even necessary that the child begin to speak before the mark or seal placed on need by demand begins to work, as his alternating cries show. The second part implies that the child, even if he does not yet know how to speak coherently [tenir un discours], already knows how to speak, for this starts quite early on.

When I say that he knows how to speak, I mean that, at the second level of the schema, there is something that goes beyond being in the grip of language. There is a relationship here with the Other, strictly speaking, inasmuch as there is an appeal to the Other as presence, presence against a background of absence. This is the moment of the fort-da that so impressed Freud in 1915, as we can determine, when he had been called in to see one of his grandsons, the one who would later go on to become a psychoanalyst. I am speaking of the child whom he observed.

At the first level, what the chain of discourse articulates as existing beyond the subject imposes its form on the subject, whether he likes it or not. We have here, as it were, an innocent apprehension by the subject of linguistic form. But beyond this articulation and beyond this apprehension, something else occurs, which is based on his experience of language – namely, the subject's apprehension of the Other as such. This takes us to the second level of the schema.

The Other involved is the one who can respond to the subject, answer his call. We see this Other to whom he fundamentally asks a question in The Devil in Love by Jacques Cazotte; it is the bellowing of the terrifying form that represents the appearance of the superego, in response to he who invoked it in a Neapolitan cave; the response is "Che vuoi?" or "What do you want?" The subject asks the Other what he wants. The question is asked from the place where the subject first encounters desire, desire being initially the Other's desire.

This experience of the Other's desire is essential because it allows the subject to realize something that is beyond linguistic articulation, around which the following revolves: it is the Other who does or does not enunciate certain signifiers. Up until then, the battery of signifiers, among which a choice could be made, was there, but only in itself. Now, experience shows that this choice is commutative, inasmuch as it is within the Other's power to make it such that one or another of the signifiers be there.

This entails that two new principles be introduced, at this level of 26 experience. They are added to what was initially a pure and simple principle of succession implying the principle of choice.

The first new principle is that of substitution. The following point is essential: what I call the "bar" between the signifier and the signified is established for the subject on the basis of commutativity. That is to say, there is coexistence or simultaneity, which is marked at the same time by a certain impenetrability, between the signifier and the signified. I mean that the difference or distance between the signifier and the signified is maintained.

$$\frac{S}{s}$$

Curiously enough, group theory, as we learn about it in the abstract study of sets, shows us the absolutely essential link between all commutativity and the very possibility of using what I am calling the "bar," a sign that is used to represent fractions. This is a tangential remark that I shall set aside for the time being.

From the moment at which the structure of the signifying chain makes us call on the Other [a réalisé l'appel de l'Autre] – in other words, at which the process of enunciation is distinguished from the formulation of the enunciated and is superimposed on it – the taking up of the subject in the articulation of speech, a taking up that was initially innocent, becomes unconscious. Similarly, the commutativity of the signifier becomes an essential dimension for the production of the signified. This means that the very substitution of one signifier for another signifier comes to lie at the origin of the multiplication of significations that characterize the enriching of the human world in an effective way – that is, in a way that reverberates in the subject's consciousness.

A second new principle can also be seen: the principle of similarity. A certain dimension, the metonymic dimension, begins to operate as a function of the fact that, within the signifying chain, one signifying term may resemble another. It is essentially in this dimension that the characteristic and fundamental effects of what we might call poetic discourse – that is, the effects of poetry – are produced. I will show you this in what follows.

27 What happens at this second stage [étape] will thus allow us to situate the appearance of what constitutes the signified of the Other, $s(A)$ – as opposed to the signifier given by the Other, $S(A)$ – in the very place where the message was in the first schema. The latter [$S(A)$] is produced along the dotted chain line, since it is a chain that is only partially articulated, merely implicit, and represents the subject solely insofar as he underpins speech.

As I told you, the second stage [étape] is produced by the experience of the Other as an Other who has a desire. From the very first moment of its appearance, at its very origin, desire, d, is manifested in the interval or gap that separates the pure and simple linguistic articulation of speech from what marks the fact that the subject actualizes something of himself in it, something that has no scope or meaning except with respect to the production of speech, and that is his being – what language calls "being."

A horizon of being is situated for the subject between, on the one hand, the manifestations of his demand [demande] and what these manifestations have made him become and, on the other hand, the demand [exigence] to be recognized by the Other, which we might, in this case, call the demand [exigence] to be loved. We want to know if he can reach that horizon or not.

The experience of desire is situated in this interval or gap. It is first apprehended as being experience of the Other's desire, and it is within this experience that the subject has to situate his own desire. His own desire cannot be situated anywhere other than in this space.

This [Figure 1.4] represents the third stage [étape], form, or phase of the schema.

Here is what constitutes it. Finding himself in the primitive presence of the Other's desire as obscure and opaque, the subject has no recourse, he is hilflos. Hilflosigkeit, to use Freud's term, is known in French as the subject's "distress." It is the foundation of what, in psychoanalysis, has been explored, experienced, and qualified as "trauma."

What Freud taught us, at the end of the journey that allowed 28 him to finally situate the experience of anxiety in its true place, is that anxiety has nothing to do with the in some sense diffuse, or so it seems to me, nature of what people call the existential experience of anxiety.

In philosophy, people have gone so far as to say that anxiety confronts us with nothingness. Such formulations are assuredly justifiable from a certain vantage point. Nevertheless, you should be aware that, on this topic, Freud teaches us something that is positive and clearly formulated. He views anxiety as something that is thoroughly situated in a theory of communication, when he says that anxiety is a signal. Assuming that desire must be produced in the very same place where distress originates and is experienced, anxiety is not produced at the level of desire.

We will carry out a detailed, line-by-line study of Freud's work entitled Inhibitions, Symptoms, and Anxiety. As it is our first class of the year, I can only sketch out for you today a few major points that we will come back to, specifically the following: Freud tells 29 us that anxiety is produced as a signal in the ego, on the basis of Hilflosigkeit, which anxiety is called upon to remedy insofar as it is a signal. I realize that I am going too quickly and that this would warrant an entire Seminar; but I will not be able to talk to you about anything if I do not begin by tracing out the pathway that we must follow.

Specular experience – that is, the experience of one's relationship to the other's image insofar as it is at the core of the ego's Urbild – comes in at this third stage. We thus find here anew what I laid out at the end of my first Seminar concerning the relationship between the ideal ego and the ego-ideal. I am not simply alluding here to what I said and propounded about specular relations – namely, the subject's confrontation with his own image in the mirror – but to the O–O' schema: the one where we find the concave mirror, which allows us to conceptualize the function of a real image that is itself reflected, and that cannot be seen as reflected except from a certain position – namely, a symbolic position which is that of the ego-ideal.

We shall use all of this in a context that will give it a very different resonance, insofar as we shall be led to reconceptualize it in the context of the kind of symbolic action that I am showing you to be essential.

If the imaginary element – namely, the relationship between the ego, m [for moi], and the other, i(a) – thus comes in at the third stage of the schema, it is inasmuch as it allows the subject to deal with his distress in his relationship with the Other's desire.

How does he deal with it? With something he borrows from the game of mastery that the child, at a specific age, learned to handle with reference to his semblable as such. We are talking here about the experience of the semblable in the sense in which he is a gaze, the other who gazes at you, and who brings into play a certain number of imaginary relations, first and foremost, the relations of bearing [prestance], and also those of submission and defeat. The subject proceeds by means of this.

In other words, just as we must not say that the soul thinks, but, like Aristotle, that man thinks with his soul, we must say that the subject defends himself with his ego. This is what psychoanalytic practice shows us.

The subject defends against his distress; and with the means 30 given to him by his imaginary experience of his relationship with the other, he constructs something with the other that, unlike specular experience, is flexible. In effect, what the subject reflects are not simply games of bearing, and not simply his appearance to the other in [the form of] prestige and feigning; it is himself as a speaking subject. This is why fantasy is what I am designating to you here as the exit or reference point by which desire learns to situate itself.

I formulate fantasy for you with the following symbols: ($◊a). The subject is barred here because he is a speaking subject, one who relates to the other as a gaze – that is, to the imaginary other. Whenever you come up against something that is a fantasy, strictly speaking, you will see that it can be articulated in these primary terms, qua relationship between the speaking subject and the imaginary other. This is what defines fantasy. The function of fantasy is to provide the subject's desire with its proper level of correction or situation. This is why human desire is fixed, attached, and coapted, not to an object, but always essentially to a fantasy.

This is a fact of experience. Although it managed to remain mysterious for a long time, let us not forget that it is nevertheless an experiential fact that psychoanalysis made common knowledge.

It is only thanks to psychoanalysis that this ceased being an anomaly – something opaque, something like a deviation, corruption, or perversion of desire.

It is on the basis of psychoanalysis that all of this – which can at times be called corruption, perversion, deviation, or even delusion – was conceptualized and articulated in a dialectic that, as I have just shown you, can reconcile the imaginary with the symbolic.

I realize full well that I am not leading you along an easy path in our first class of the year. But if I did not begin by laying out our main terms immediately, if I confined myself to proceeding slowly, step-31 by-step, in order to suggest to you the need for such and such a term, what could I accomplish?

If I did not immediately provide you with what I call the graph [of desire], I would have to provide you with it little by little as I did last year, and this would make it all the more obscure. This is why I decided to begin with it directly. Which is not to say that, by doing so, I have made your task easier.

To ease your task, I would now like to give you a little illustration, taken from the simplest level, since what is involved are the relations between the subject and the signifier. The least one can expect, and the first thing one can expect, from a schema is to see what purpose it can serve with respect to commutation.

I recalled an anecdote I had once read in Darwin's book, The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals, which, I must say, amused me quite a bit. Darwin recounts that at a soirée he heard a man named Sydney Smith, who was, I assume, a high-society Englishman of Darwin's time, come out quite placidly with the following sentence: "I hear that dear old Lady Cork has been overlooked."*

Etymologically speaking, "to be overlooked"* means that one has not been noticed, that one has been neglected or forgotten – by an overseer, for example. Literally, someone's eye passed over you. The verb "to overlook"* is commonly used in English, but there is no corresponding expression in French. This is why languages are so useful and so harmful at the same time; they allow you to avoid making an effort, to avoid carrying out in French the substitution of signifiers thanks to which we might manage to target a certain signified; for we would have to change the entire context in order to obtain the same effect.

Darwin marvels at the fact that the quip was perfectly clear to everyone present. In fact, no one there had the slightest doubt that it meant that the Devil had overlooked the dear old lady and had forgotten to carry her off to the tomb, which seems to have been at that time, in the minds of his audience, her natural place, even the place they wished she would occupy. Darwin raises a question about this but leaves the question unanswered. "What did Sydney Smith do in order to have this effect?" he asks himself more or less, and opines, 32
"I truly can't say."

We should appreciate the fact that he highlights, in an especially significant and exemplary way, that he experienced his own limits in broaching this question. Since Darwin had broached the problem of the emotions in a certain way, he could have said that the expression of the emotions was nevertheless involved here because the subject did not manifest any emotion – because he said it "placidly"* – but that would perhaps have been taking things a bit far. In any case, Darwin does not say that. He was truly astonished by the fact he relates, and we must take him literally, because, as always when we study a case, we must not reduce it by rendering it vague. Everyone understood that the guy was talking about the Devil, Darwin says, whereas the Devil was nowhere to be found in what he said. And this is what is interesting: the fact that Darwin tells us that the Devil's shudder was felt by all those assembled there.

Let us now try to understand this a bit. I will not dwell on Darwin's intellectual limitations – we will inevitably come to them, but not right away. What is clear is that there is, right from the outset, something along the lines of knowledge here, and this is what is striking. There is no need to posit the principle of metaphorical effects – that is, the substitution of one signifier for another – nor to require Darwin to have had some inkling of it, to immediately realize that the effect of Smith's statement stemmed first and foremost from the fact that he did not say what was expected.

A sentence that begins with "Lady Cork" should usually end with "ill."* [We would usually expect to hear something like,] "I hear she is not well." It seems, in fact, that everyone was expecting news concerning the old lady's health, for, when people talk about old ladies, it is always their health that is foremost in their minds at the outset. A substitution thus took place here: the expected news was replaced by something else, which was, in certain ways, irreverent. Smith did not say that she was on death's doorstep, nor did he say that she was quite well; he said that she had been forgotten.

What then came into play to produce this metaphorical effect? If the word "overlooked"* had been expected, there would have been no such effect. It is inasmuch as it was not expected, but was 33 rather put in the place of another signifier, that a new signified was produced. It was neither along the lines of what was expected, nor of what was unexpected. This unexpected thing was not characterized as unexpected, but it was something original that had to be created in the minds of all of those present in accordance with their own ways of thinking. In any case, a new signified arose from something that made it such that, for example, Sydney Smith came across in his circle as a witty man – in other words, as someone who did not express himself in clichés.

But why the Devil? It will help us a great deal to look at our little schema. If we create schemas, it is in order to use them. We could arrive at the same result without it, but the schema guides us and shows us what is really [réel] happening. What is rendered present here is, strictly speaking, a fantasy.

And by what mechanisms? It is here that the schema allows us to go further than the naive notion, I would say, that things are designed to express something that wants to be communicated, an emotion, as they say, as if emotions did not pose in and of themselves plenty of other problems – namely, what they are, assuming they do not already need to be communicated.

Our speaker was perfectly placid, we are told. In other words, he presented himself in some sense in a pure state, the presence of his speech being a pure metonymic effect, I mean his speech qua speech in the continuity of speech. And in this continuity he conjured up the following: the presence of death insofar as a subject can or cannot escape it.

Stated differently, he conjured up the presence of something that is closely tied to the coming into the world of the signifier itself. In effect, if there is a dimension in which death (or the fact that there is no longer any death) can be both directly conjured up and at the same time veiled (but is, in any case, incarnated), in which death can become immanent in an act, it is certainly that of signifying articulation.

It is clear that this subject who spoke so easily of death did not wish Lady Cork especially well. But, on the other hand, the perfect placidity with which he spoke of her implies that, in this regard, he had dominated his desire, insofar as his desire could express itself as 34 in Volpone where we find the lovely formulation, "Die, and stink"! Sydney Smith did not say that; he simply and serenely articulated that the fate that awaits each of us in turn had been forgotten for a moment. But this was not the Devil, if I may put it thus, it was death, and it would come one day or another. Simultaneously, this character presented himself as someone who was not afraid of comparing himself with the lady about whom he was speaking, not afraid to place himself at the same level, subject to the same flaw, and thus to the same final equalization by the absolute master [i.e., death] that he rendered present to mind here.

In other words, in his full command of the language, he revealed himself as having a sort of familiarity with what is veiled in language. This suggests something on which I want to end class today, which was missing in everything I said in my discussion of the three stages, and it will complete the mainspring of what I wanted to formulate for you.

In the first schema, we have the innocent image of the subject. He is unconscious of course, but it is an unconsciousness that is just waiting to be [or: is itching to be, ne demande qu'à] transformed into knowledge. Let us not forget that the Latin term scire is present in "unconsciousness" [inconscience], and that even in French avoir conscience [to be aware] implies the notion of knowledge.

In the next two stages, we have, as I told you, a far more conscious use of knowledge; the subject knows how to speak and he speaks; this is what he does when he calls on the Other. It is nevertheless here that we find the originality of the field that Freud discovered, which he calls the unconscious.

There is, in fact, something in this Other that always places the subject at a certain distance from his being, and which makes it such that he can never join up with that being, can never reach it except in "the metonymy of being" in the subject that is known as desire. Why is that? Because at the level at which the subject is himself caught up in speech, and thereby in a relationship with the Other as the locus of speech, there is a signifier that is always missing. Why? Because it is the signifier that is specifically assigned to the relationship between the subject and the signifier [or: signifying system, le signifiant]. This signifier has a name; it is the phallus.

Desire is the metonymy of being in the subject; the phallus is the metonymy of the subject in being. We will come back to this. The phallus is the signifying element that is subtracted from the chain of speech, insofar as speech is involved in any and every relationship 35 with the Other. This is the ultimate principle which is such that the subject, inasmuch as he is caught up in speech, falls under the sway of what has been conceptualized under the heading of the "castration complex," with all its clinical consequences.

What is suggested by any type of usage – I would not say pure, but perhaps rather impure – of "the tribe's words"? Every type of metaphorical inauguration, assuming it is audacious, defies what language always veils. What it always veils is, in the final analysis, death. This always tends to bring out the enigmatic figure of the missing signifier: the phallus. It is the phallus that appears here, and as always, in a diabolical form, as it is called – ear, skin, even the phallus itself.

The phenomenon is inscribed here, of course, in the tradition of English wit, which, although restrained, nevertheless dissimulates a violent desire. But metaphorical usage suffices, in and of itself, to make the image of the subject, insofar as he is marked by his relation to the special signifier known as prohibition, appear in the imaginary – that is, in the other who is there as a spectator: little a.

In this case, Sidney Smith violated a prohibition, for one simply does not speak of old ladies in this manner. He revealed what lies beyond the prohibitions that constitute the law of language. Wishing to speak as placidly as possible, he nevertheless made the Devil appear. So much so that dear old Darwin wondered, 'How the devil did he do that?'

I will leave it at that for today.

Next time, we will once again take up a dream found in Freud's work, and we will try to apply our analytic methods to it. This will simultaneously allow us to situate different modes of interpretation.

FURTHER EXPLANATION

Two levels and four processes
Continuity and fragmentation
The two I's
What does "I desire you" mean?
From the first to the second topography

I will first lay out the limits of what I would like to do in class today.

I will thus enunciate what I mean to show you by taking up the example of the interpretation of a dream, as well as the use of what we have, for some time now, been conventionally calling the graph [of desire].

As I do not wish to discuss things in a way that goes over your heads, if I dare express myself thus, I would like it if a certain communication, as they say, could be established through this discussion. I did not fail to receive echoes of the difficulties that some of you, even many of you, had last time when faced with the repositioning of this graph, even though the graph is far from being new to all of you.

We constructed this graph together last year, and perfected it progressively. You watched it come together to answer the needs of a certain formulation centered around what I called "unconscious formations." The fact that its usage is not yet unequivocal to you, as some have remarked, is not surprising, since a part of what I shall have to explain this year about desire will show you its utility and will simultaneously teach you how to use it.

Our first order of business is thus to understand it. This is precisely what seems to have been difficult for some here, to different degrees, perhaps less than they let on. I would like you to note that the term "understanding" [compréhension] – I assure you that I am not being ironic here – is problematic. If there are among you some who always understand, in every situation and at all times, I congratulate and envy them. Even after twenty-five years of practice, that is not the case for me.

The term "understanding" truly shows us the dangers it brings with it. In all understanding there is a danger of illusion, to such a degree that the point is not so much to understand what I am doing as to know what I am doing. They are not always the same thing. They cannot be confused, and you will see that there are internal reasons for not confusing them. You can, in certain cases, know what you are doing and where you are at, without always understanding what is at stake, at least not immediately.

To pique your interest, I will say that I think I can today, if I have enough time, begin to show you how this graph, and this graph alone, I believe – or something analogous, for we must not become too attached to how it is clothed – can eminently help you distinguish three things that you all too frequently confuse to the point of slipping carelessly from one to the other: the repressed, desire, and the unconscious, to simply take up the way Freud defines them.

The graph is designed to help us map things. Before applying it, let me reconstruct it step by step so that, at least, what is represented by what I call the two levels will no longer be in doubt.

The difficulty for many of you has to do with the fact that these two levels do not correspond to anything that is usually presented to you as what I might call the architecture of the upper and lower functions: the functions of synthesis and of automatisms. It is precisely because you do not find these architectonics therein that the two levels confuse you. I am therefore going to try to reformulate them for you.

It seems that what is especially difficult to some of you is the second level [étage] of the construction, which is not necessarily a second stage [étape] – "level" being abstractly defined because, as this graph is a discourse, one cannot say everything at the same time.

I will thus take things up anew.

What is my goal in constructing this graph? To show the relations between the speaking subject and the signifier, relations that are essential to us insofar as we are psychoanalysts.

In the final analysis, the question around which these two levels are divided is the same for the speaking subject as it is for us. This is a good sign. I was just saying, "Do we know what we are doing?" Does the subject himself know what he is doing when he speaks? This means, "Can he, in fact, signify his own signifying action to himself?" It is around this very question that the two levels can be differentiated.

As this seems to have escaped some of you, I will tell you immediately that we must view the two levels as functioning at the same time in even the slightest speech act. And you will see what I mean by "speech act" [acte de parole] and how far I take this term.

What I will tell you is something that I had the opportunity to formulate for one of you to whom I gave a bit of additional explanation after the last class. I am mentioning this because my interlocutor indicated that it included something he had not perceived at the time.

Namely, how to think about the processes that occur in the subject insofar as the signifier is involved in his activity. The processes in question begin simultaneously at four different points: Δ, A, D, and X. These points are, respectively – and you will see what underpins my exposé today – the subject's intention, the subject qua speaking I, the act of demanding, and X, which we will give a certain name later and which I will leave unspecified for the time being.

The processes are thus simultaneous in the four trajectories, D→S, Δ→I, A→s(A), and the trajectory of the upper line [D'→S' or possibly ($◊D)→X]. I believe that this should now be sufficiently clear.

If these two levels exist, it is because the subject does something that is related to the signifier's predominant action or structure.

40 Let us begin by detailing what happens at the lower level. Here the subject receives, or is submitted to, this structure. This is especially apparent and illustrated – not uniquely, but especially – in the context of demand.

Pay close attention to what I am saying here, for it is not in the least bit improvised. Those who are taking notes have the right idea. The fact that it is especially illustrated [in the context of demand] is such that it is especially comprehensible, but at the same time it can be such that you do not see it in all its generality, which leads to a certain amount of incomprehension. You should get it into your heads right away that it is dangerous to think you understand.

At the lower level of the graph we find a line that represents the intentionality of the subject, the intentionality of what we assume the subject to be. The subject in question has not yet become a speaking subject; he is the subject about whom people speak. I would even say that he is the one people have always spoken about up until now, for I do not believe that anyone has ever truly and 41 clearly made the distinction that I am trying to make here between the subject and the speaking subject. To put it in a nutshell, [the former] is the subject of knowledge, a subject who is correlated with the object and around whom the eternal question of idealism revolves, he himself being an ideal subject.

This subject has always been problematic in some way, since after all, as people have remarked and as his name indicates, he is merely supposed [to exist]. This is not true of the subject who speaks, for he forces us to take notice of him.

In the context of demand, what is involved is the first state – a state without form, so to speak – of our subject, of he whose conditions of existence we are trying to spell out by means of the graph. Here the subject is no more than the subject of need. He expresses need in his demand. This is my precise point of departure.

It follows that the subject's need is profoundly modified by the fact of having to be expressed in demand, passing thus through the defiles of the signifier. Without going any further into this point, because I assume we all agree on it, I simply want to point out what happens owing to the exchange that occurs between the unconstituted, primitive position of the subject of need and the structural conditions that are imposed by the signifier.

You see in the schema that the line of demand, D→S, is continuous [it is a solid, not a dotted, line] until it arrives at A, whereas beyond A it is fragmented. Inversely, the part of the line that precedes $s(A)$, the line that represents the subject's intentionality here [running from Δ to A to $s(A)$], is fragmented, and it only becomes continuous afterward – that is, in the segment $s(A) \rightarrow I$. Let us even provisionally say – for I will have to emphasize this later on – that it is continuous in that segment insofar as we do not have to take into account the line $A \rightarrow m \rightarrow i(a) \rightarrow s(A)$ [see Figure 1.4].

Why is this so? I will tell you why briefly, because I must not talk endlessly about the graph, and because we will have occasion to return to it.

Let us begin by investigating what is represented by the continuity of the line $D \rightarrow S$ up to point A.

Capital A is, as you know, the locus of the code, the locus in which the treasure trove of language in its synchrony resides, I mean the sum total of the taxiematic elements without which beings who are subject to the conditions of language have no means by which to communicate. The continuity of the line $D \rightarrow S$ up to point A represents the synchrony of the systematic organization of language. 42
Synchronically, it [A] is posited as a system or set in which each element has its own value insofar as it is distinct from the other elements of the system – that is, from the other signifiers. This is the mainspring of everything I say about communication. What is always forgotten in theories of communication is that what is communicated is not the sign of something else; it is simply the sign of what [or: of the fact that, de ce que], in its place, another signifier is not.

It is on the basis of the solidarity of this synchronic system, insofar as it resides in the locus of the code, that the discourse of demand takes on its solidity prior to arriving at the code. Stated otherwise, we see in diachrony – in other words, in the unfolding of this discourse – what is known as the minimum duration necessary for the satisfaction of the slightest goal (even what is known as "magical satisfaction") – namely, the time it takes to speak [le temps de parler].

Since the discourse of demand is composed of signifiers, the line that represents it should appear here in the fragmented form in which we see it subsist – namely, in the form of a succession of discrete elements, which are thus separated by intervals. If it is nevertheless continuous here, it is owing to the synchronic solidarity of the code from which the succession of elements is borrowed. Continuity expresses the solidity of diachronic assertion, in the constitution of what is called the time it takes to formulate something, the time it takes for demand to be articulated. This is why, prior to or shy of the code, the line of demand is presented here as continuous.

Why, then, is the line that represents the subject's intentionality fragmented here? [Lacan is presumably pointing to the dotted line running from Δ to A to s(A).]

Let us note that the context of demand, in and of itself, simplifies the supposed diversity of the subject – in other words, the moments and variations of this point [Δ], which presents itself as essentially shifting [mouvant]. The problem of the continuity of the subject has, as you know, been apparent to psychologists for a long time. How can a being, who is essentially given over to what one might call fluctuations [intermittences] – not merely those of the heart, as some have said, but of many other things – establish himself and assert himself as an ego? This is the problem at hand. Now, putting a need 43 into play in demand is already something that assuredly simplifies the subject with respect to the more or less chaotic and random interferences of the different needs among themselves.

If, nevertheless, the first part of the line Δ→I, namely, the part up until s(A), appears in a fragmented form, it is because it represents the retroactive effect of the form of discourse's discrete elements on this shifting [mouvance]; the latter is both continuous and discontinuous, and assuredly confused, and we must assume it to be that of the primitive manifestation of needs [or: of (pre)disposition, de la tendance]. Discursivity is retroactively imposed on need, which is thereby subjected to its form. This is why the line appears in a fragmented form shy, not of the code, but of the message.

What happens beyond the message [s(A)]? I have underscored it at other times, so I can cover it quickly here. It is the following: the subject identifies with the Other to whom his demand is addressed [l'Autre de la demande], insofar as this Other is omnipotent. I do not think that I need to go back over the topic of omnipotence, which is sometimes attributed by psychoanalysts to thought and sometimes to speech. The fact remains that we see here, as I have often pointed out, how wrongheaded it is to attribute omnipotence to the subject; we can see here the depreciative stance that psychologists get into the habit of adopting, inasmuch as they are always more or less pedantic, in the original sense of the term. For the omnipotence in question here is that of the Other, insofar as the Other quite simply has the sum total of signifiers at his disposal.

To show you that by articulating things in this way we are not moving away from concrete experience, I will expressly point them out in development, and more precisely in language acquisition, which lies at the heart of mother–child relations.

Capital I – at which the segment that begins from s(A), the signified of A, arrives – is what primary identification is based on. Edward Glover conceptualized this as the first nucleus of the formation of the ego. This process leads to the nucleus of identification because the mother is not simply the person who offers the breast [sein]; she is also the one who gives the seal [seing] of signifying articulation. This is not due simply to the fact that she speaks to her child, for it is quite clear that she speaks to him well before she can assume that he understands what she is saying, just as he understands some of what 44 she is saying long before she thinks he does. In effect, before properly linguistic exchange occurs, all sorts of games – hiding games, for example, that so quickly make children smile or laugh – already involve symbolic action, strictly speaking.

While playing these games, what a mother reveals to her child is the function of symbols qua revealing. In making something disappear and reappear – his own face, for example, by covering and then uncovering the child's face – she reveals the revealing function to him. It is already a function raised to the second power.

It is here that the first identifications occur with what people call the mother as omnipotent.

As you can see, this has a very different scope than the pure and simple satisfaction of need.

Let us turn now to the second level of the graph, my presentation of which last time seems to have created a bit of difficulty for some of you.

At the second level of the graph, the subject is something other than a subject who passes through the defiles of signifying articulation. It is the subject who begins to speak – that is, the subject qua I.

I must, nevertheless, stop before providing a specific formulation in order to add an essential proviso. After all, I would not be dwelling on this I, for it is not our concern today, if I had not alluded, in previous work, to the I in "I am thinking, therefore I am." This is merely a parenthetical remark.

All the difficulties that have arisen regarding the I have concerned this "I am thinking, therefore I am." But this is said to be pointless, because the I was unjustifiably introduced into what is after all merely a cogitatum – that is, an "it [ça] is thinking." Why then would I be I in that?

I believe that all the difficulties that have been pointed out here stem from a failure to distinguish between two subjects in the way that I first formulated the distinction between them. In the experience that philosophy invites us to consider, people refer, more or 45 less wrongly, to the fact that the subject is faced with an object, an imaginary object, consequently; it should come as no surprise that the I turns out to be but one object among others. If, on the contrary, we take up the question at the level of the subject defined as speaking, it takes on a totally different import, as phenomenology shows us and as I will simply indicate now. For those who would like to read something about the I of the cogito, let me remind you that there is an article I have already mentioned by Sartre in the journal Recherches philosophiques.

The I involved in the cogito is not simply the I that is articulated in discourse, the I insofar as it is pronounced in discourse, and that linguists have, at least for some time now, been calling a "shifter." The I of the cogito is a semanteme whose only articulable use depends on the code, I mean that it purely and simply depends on the lexically articulable code. On the other hand, the shifter I, as the most basic experience shows, is related to nothing that can be defined as a function of other elements of the code, thus to a semanteme, but is simply defined as a function of the messaging act. It designates he who underpins the message – namely, someone who varies from one moment to the next.

That's all there is to it. But let us note that the upshot is that the shifter I is essentially distinct from what one might call the true subject of the act of speaking as such, as I will show you quite quickly. It is even what gives the simplest I discourse the appearance of indirect discourse. I mean that this I could rather easily be followed in discourse itself with a parenthesis: "I (who am speaking)" or "I (am saying that . . .)."

This is made quite clear, as others before me have noted, by the fact that a discourse that formulates "I am saying that . . .," and adds, "and I am repeating," is not saying something devoid of value with the second clause, for it is distinguishing between the two I's that are in question: "the one who said that . . .," and the one who endorses what the latter said. If you need other examples to grasp this, I would propose the difference between the I in "I love you" and the one in "I am here."

Owing to the structure that I am evoking, the I in question is especially tangible where it is fully hidden, that is, in forms of discourse that realize what I will call the vocative function – namely, the forms whose signifying structure brings out the fact that the addressee is absolutely not I. It is the I of "Rise and walk" [Luke 5:23].

This same fundamental I can be found in any imperative vocative form and in a certain number of other forms, too, that I will provisionally place under the heading of vocative. It is, if you will, the vocative I about which I spoke to you already in my Seminar on Schreber [Seminar III]. I am not sure I was able to bring it out fully at that time.

There is also an I that underlies the sentence "You are the one who will follow me" [Tu es celui qui me suivras] which I emphasized in that Seminar. It is inscribed, with the whole problem of a certain future tense, in vocatives, strictly speaking, vocatives of vocation. For those who were not here at that time, let me recall the difference we find in French – it is a subtlety that not every language allows us to bring out – between Tu es celui qui me suivras and Tu es celui qui me suivra without an s [both mean "You are the one who will follow me"]. In this case, the difference in the performative power of the "you" is in fact an actual difference of the I insofar as it is involved in this act of speaking. We see clearly here that the subject always receives his own message in an inverted form – namely, that it is the I that must own itself here via the form it gives to the "you."

This discourse – in other words, the discourse that is formulated at the second level – is a discourse with which we have always been familiar. Every discourse is the Other's discourse, even when it is the subject who speaks it. In this regard, the distinction between the two levels is merely arbitrary.

Nevertheless, what we find at the second level is fundamentally a call for being [un appel de l'être], which is made with more or less force. It always more or less contains a "So be it!" ["Soit!"], and we have here yet another of the marvelous homophonic equivocations for which French allows. In other words, it contains a "Fiat" which is the source and root of what, in need, comes to be inscribed for speaking beings in the register of wanting [vouloir]. Or, stated otherwise, it is the root of the I insofar as the latter splits into the two terms that we are examining here: the one in the imperative "Rise and walk" and the other in the erection by the subject of his own I.

You can now see at what level the question that I articulated last 47 time in the form "Che vuoi?" is situated. "Che vuoi?" is, as it were, the Other's response to the subject's act of speaking. This question responds – indeed, I would say that questions always respond. This response prior to the question responds to the question – that is, to the redoubtable question mark whose very form in my schema articulates the act of speaking.

The act of speaking goes much further than the speech of the subject alone, since his whole life is taken up in acts of speaking. His life as such – namely, all his actions – are symbolic actions if only because they are recorded, because they are subject to recording, and because they are often actions designed to be taken note of. Like everything that happens before the examining magistrate, everything the subject does can be held against him. All his actions are imposed upon him in a language context, and his very gestures are never anything but gestures chosen in a pre-established ritual, namely in a linguistic articulation. To the question, "Does he know what he is doing?" Freud answers "No." This is exactly what is expressed by the second level of my graph. The latter takes on its value only on the basis of the Other's question, "Che vuoi?": "What do you want?"

Prior to the moment at which the question is asked, we are mired in ignorance and stupidity. I am trying to show here that didacticism does not necessarily involve stupidity. I obviously cannot demonstrate this on the basis of those of you who are present here.

With regard to this question and in the responses given to it, the second level of the schema spells out where the following intersect anew: the true discourse offered up by the subject, on the one hand, and what is manifested in the guise of wanting [vouloir] in the articulation of speech, on the other hand. Where are these intersections located? Therein lies the whole mystery of the symbol that seems opaque to some of you.

The discourse that presents itself at this level as a call for being is not what it seems to be, as Freud tells us. This is what the second 48 level of the graph tries to show us. I can only be surprised if you did not immediately recognize this.

What did Freud actually say? What do we, insofar as we are psychoanalysts, do every day? We bring out the fact that at the level of speech acts, the code is given, not by primitive demand, but by a certain relationship between the subject and this demand, insofar as the subject remains marked by manifestations [avatars] of this demand. We call these the oral, anal, and other forms of unconscious articulation.

The first point of intersection [($◊D)] thus does not seem to me to raise many objections. We take quite simply as a premise that the second level, the code of discourse, which is being's true discourse, corresponds to the formula ($◊D) – the subject, qua marked by the signifier, in the presence of his demand as providing the material [for it].

What can we say now regarding the message the subject receives?

I have alluded to this message several times; I have given it several forms, all of which are more or less slippery, and this is no accident, for the whole aim of analysis is to figure out what it is. For the time being, at this point in my discourse, I can still leave it in a problematic state and symbolize it with a presumed signifier. It is a purely hypothetical form, an x. It is one of the Other's signifiers, of course, since it is at the level of the Other that the question is raised; it is the signifier of an Other who is missing a part – namely, who is missing the problematic element in the question about this message.

Let me summarize. The subject's situation at the level of the unconscious, such as Freud articulates it – and it is not me but rather Freud who says this – is that he does not know with what he is speaking. We must thus reveal to him the properly signifying elements of his discourse. Nor does he know the message that really comes back to him at the level of being's discourse [du discours de l'être] – let us say "truly," if you prefer, but I will not take back "really."

In other words, the subject does not know the message that comes back to him from the response to his demand in the field of what he wants. But you already know the answer, the true response. There can only be one. Namely, the signifier, and nothing but it, that is especially designed to designate the relations between the subject 49 and the signifier [or: signifying system as a whole, le signifiant]. This signifier is the phallus, and I have already told you why.

I ask those who are hearing this for the first time to accept it provisionally. This is not the point; the point is that the subject cannot have the answer [réponse], because the only answer is the signifier that designates his relations with the signifier. The subject annihilates himself and disappears to the degree that he articulates this answer. This is what makes it such that the only thing he can sense about it is a threat directly targeting the phallus – namely, castration, or the notion of the lack of the phallus, which is what the termination of analysis revolves around in both sexes, as Freud formulated it and as I am pointing out. But my goal is not to repeat such elementary truths.

I know that it gets on some people's nerves that I have been juggling being and having a little too much for a while, but they will get over it. For it does not mean that along the way we cannot harvest something precious, a clinical harvest – a harvest that can even allow people who follow my work to present themselves with all the characteristics of what I would call medical charlatanism.

What we must do now is situate what desire means.

As I have said, the second level of the graph, like the lower level, involves a synchronic treasure trove or battery of unconscious signifiers for each subject, and a message in which the response to "Che vuoi?" is announced. As you may have noticed, the latter is announced dangerously. I will mention this, too, in passing – just to evoke in you colorful memories of what makes the story of Abelard and Heloise the most beautiful love story.

What does desire mean? Where is it situated? In the complete form of the graph you have a dotted line that runs from the code, at the second level, to its message via two elements: d, which signifies the place where the subject descends [or: gets off or dismounts, descend], and $ across from little a, which signifies fantasy [see Figure 1.4].

This has a homologous layout to the line that, starting from A, includes the ego in discourse – the m on the schema, let us call it the "filled-out" person – and the image of the other, i(a). Symbolization 50 of the specular relationship [between m and i(a)] is, as I told you, fundamental to the establishing of the ego.

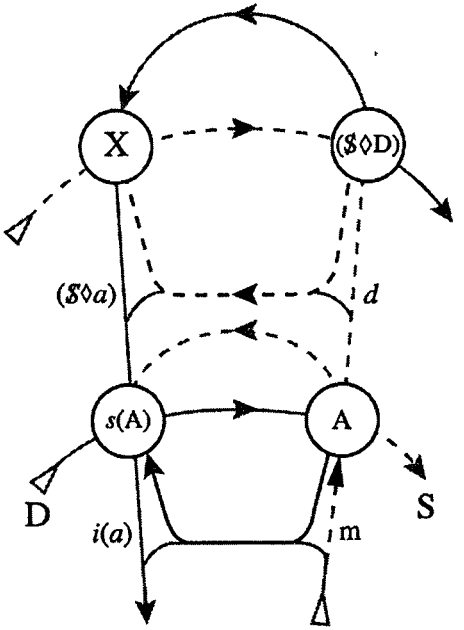

Figure 2.2: The homology between the two relationships

The homological relationship between the two levels warrants fuller discussion. I will not provide it today, not because I do not have time, for I am inclined to take my time to tell you what I have to tell you, but because I prefer to approach things in an indirect manner.

This is what seems to me to be most likely to get you to grasp its scope.

You undoubtedly can now guess at the riches that stem from the fact that an imaginary relationship is inscribed in the field of the determinant gap between the two discourses, an imaginary relationship that homologically reproduces the relationship with the other involved in the game of bearing [between m and i(a)].

You may have some inkling of it, but it is altogether insufficient 51 to have such an inkling. Before articulating it fully, I would simply like to get you to dwell for a moment on what is implied by the term that is situated or planted in this economy: "desire."

As you know, Freud introduced this term at the very beginning of psychoanalysis. He introduced it regarding dreams in the form of Wunsch. Wunsch is not, in and of itself, desire; it is a formulated or articulated desire – in other words, it is rightfully laid out on this line. What I would like you to ponder momentarily is the distinction between Wunsch and what deserves to be called "desire" in what I am introducing and establishing this year.

You have undoubtedly read The Interpretation of Dreams and we are going to begin to talk about it now. Just as last year we began by talking about Jokes and their Relation to the Unconscious, this year we will begin by talking about dreams.

You must have noticed right from the outset, and all the way to the end of The Interpretation of Dreams, that you do not find desire in it in the form in which, I would say, you constantly deal with it in your analytic experience – namely, in the form in which it gives you a hard time owing to its excesses, deviations, and (why not say it after all?) all-too-frequent failings. I am referring to sexual desire, the desire that plays tricks. We should nevertheless note that, for some time now, a quite remarkable placing of sexual desire in the shadows has been occurring in the entire analytic field. You should thus note the difference [between Freud's work and others']. Assuming that you read The Interpretation of Dreams carefully, in other words, that you do not continue to think about your own little problems while your eyes scan its pages, you perceive that it is very difficult to grasp the desire that we are supposed to find everywhere in every dream.

Recall the "inaugural dream," that of Irma's injection, about which we have already spoken a number of times, about which I have written a little and will write more, and about which we could talk inordinately. What exactly does it mean? This remains very unclear.

In the desire in the dream, Freud wants to make Irma give in; he wants her to no longer, as he tells us, stubbornly reject his interpretations. What does he want? Does he want to undress her? Does he want to get her to talk? Does he want to discredit his colleagues? 52
Does he want to force his own anxiety out of hiding to so great an extent as to see it projected onto Irma's throat? Or does he want to calm his anxiety regarding the harm he did to Irma? But this harm is, it seems, irremediable, as is clearly articulated in the dream. Is this what is at stake, to prove that no crime was committed? This would not stop us from saying that, since no crime was committed, everything will be fine, since everything has been repaired; and, moreover, all of this is due to the fact that certain people take incredible liberties, that someone else is responsible, and so on and so forth. We could go exceedingly far with all of that.

Let me point out, moreover, that Freud himself energetically underscores in a footnote in The Interpretation of Dreams, added in the seventh edition, that he never said that the desire at work in a dream is always a sexual desire. He did not say the opposite of that either, but in any case he did not say that; he writes this to respond to those who reproached him for it.

But let us not be fooled by this. Sexuality is always involved in dreams to some degree. But it is involved in some sense tangentially or in some roundabout way. We want to discover why, but to discover why I want to dwell for a moment on obvious things we know from the usage and employment of language.

What does it mean when a man says to someone – to a man or to a woman, we have to choose, for if it is a man, that will perhaps entail a number of contextual references – what does it mean when a man says to a woman, "I desire you"? Does it mean, as the moralizing optimism with which you see me doing battle from time to time in psychoanalytic theory would have it, "I am ready to grant your being as many, if not more rights than my own; I am willing to provide for all your needs and think about your satisfaction? Lord, thy will be done before my own"? It suffices to mention this to make you smile, as I see people doing around the room. Moreover, when one chooses the right words, no one is fooled by the aim of a term like this one [i.e., "desire"], as genital as that aim may be.

53 Another possible statement is the following; let us say, to use the crudest, most direct terms, "I want to sleep with you, I want to fuck you." It is much truer, we must admit. But is it as true as all that? It is true in a certain context, a social context, I would say. After all, given the extreme difficulty we have following through on the formulation "I desire you," we can perhaps find nothing better to prove it.

Believe me, it perhaps suffices that such speech not be linked to the incommensurable quandaries and dish-breaking brought on by statements that have a meaning, and that it be pronounced only in petto [in private] for us to immediately grasp that, if "I desire you" has a meaning, it is a meaning that is much more difficult to formulate. "I desire you," articulated in one's own mind, so to speak, concerning an object, has more or less the meaning "You are beautiful," around which all those enigmatic images, whose flow is known in my book as desire, collect and condense. In other words, "I desire you because you are the object of my desire." Stated differently, "You are the common denominator of my desires."

God only knows – if I can bring God into the picture, and why not? – what desire stirs up in one. It is something that in reality mobilizes and orients something quite different in one's personality than that toward which, conventionally speaking, one's precise goal seems to be oriented. To refer to an infinitely less poetic experience perhaps, but it seems that one need not be an analyst to mention it, we cannot misrecognize how quickly and front and center the structure of fantasy emerges in connection with the slightest distortion of the personality, as they say, or of images.

The subject's involvement in desire always brings out this structure, and it is rightfully predominant. To tell someone, "I desire you," is to tell him, "I include you in my fundamental fantasy." But experience does not always show us this, except in the case of those nice, instructive little perverts, little and big.

Since I have decided this year not to go beyond a certain time limit during which I ask you to listen to me here, and I still hope to hold myself to that, I will leave it there, at a point that falls far short of where I thought I would stop today, and put an end to your travails for the time being.

I will conclude by designating the key or decisive point in fantasy 54 where desire must be interpreted, assuming the term "desire" has a different meaning than that of the wish in a dream.

This point is located here on the graph. You might say that it is part of the dotted circle that traces out a type of little tail at the second level. I would simply like to say, in order to whet your appetite a bit, that elements spin around this dotted circuit. It is constructed in this way because, once it is fueled [or: powered up, alimenté] by the beginning, it goes around inside indefinitely. What are these elements? They are the ones that have been repressed. In other words, it is the locus of the unconscious as such, as located on the graph. This and this alone is what Freud spoke about up until 1915, when he wrote two articles that are entitled "The Unconscious" and "Repression."

I will pick it up there the next time, to tell you to what extent Freud articulated the very substance of what I am trying to convey to you regarding the signifier. What Freud himself clearly and unambiguously formulated is that the only thing that can be repressed are signifying elements. This is found in Freud's work. The only thing missing there is the word "signifier." I will show you, by re-examining the article on the unconscious, that only signifiers can be repressed.

On the graph you see the two systems that are juxtaposed.

The dotted system, as I have said, is the locus of the unconscious, the one where the repressed goes around and around until it makes itself felt – in other words, until some part of the message at the level of being's discourse [discours de l'être] upsets the message at the level of demand, which is the whole problem of psychoanalytic symptoms.

There is another dotted system. It is the one that paves the way for what I call the little landing – namely, the discovery of manifestations [l'avatar]. While we were already having so much trouble getting used to the first system [the first topography: conscious, preconscious, and unconscious], Freud made the fatal kind deed [bienfait] of taking the next step himself before his death by proffering the second topography [id, ego, and superego], which is the little landing I mentioned. He discovered the register of the other system.

In other words, Freud asked himself what happens at the level of the prediscursive subject as a function of the fact that the subject who speaks does not know what he is doing when he speaks – that is, as a function of the unconscious that Freud truly discovered. Let us say, if you will, to schematize things, that Freud sought to figure out at what level the ego is constituted with regard to the original place from which it speaks, and at what moment it is constituted with respect to an aim which is that of the endpoint of the process at I.

Freud also discovered a primitive discourse there, which is both purely imposed and marked by a fundamental arbitrariness, which continues to speak. It is the superego.

Nevertheless, he also left something undone. He left us something to discover and articulate, which completes his second topography and which allows us to resituate it in and restore it to the whole of his discovery. It is the fundamentally metaphorical function of language.

ON DESIRE IN DREAMS

III

THE DREAM ABOUT THE DEAD FATHER: "HE DID NOT KNOW HE WAS DEAD"

Taking being literally
From associationism to psychoanalysis Affects and signifiers
Elision = metaphor
The instance of the half-dead

I will begin by keeping my promises.

Last time I mentioned an article by Sartre that is entitled "The Transcendence of the Ego: Outline of a Phenomenological Description." You can find it on pages 85–123 of volume 6 of the Recherches philosophiques [1936–37], an excellent journal that the war put an end to, as did the death of its publisher, Boivin. As for Freud's remark [also mentioned last time], it is found on page 397 [SE V] of his Interpretation of Dreams:

> The assertion that all dreams require a sexual interpretation, against which critics rage so incessantly, occurs nowhere in my Interpretation of Dreams. It is not to be found in any of the numerous editions of this book and is in obvious contradiction to other views expressed in it.

Many of you attended the clinical paper presented last night on the topic of obsessives by one of our comrades, who is an excellent psychoanalyst. You heard him speak about desire and demand. We are trying to highlight the difference in structure between desire and demand here because the distinction between them is not simply theoretical, but is linked to the crux of our practice and applies directly to clinical work, bringing it alive and rendering it, I would say, understandable.

I would almost say that, if you sense that there is something inadequate here, it is a sign of the fact that we have explored this distinction too exclusively at the level of understanding. The level of understanding is far from exhausting the mainsprings of structure that we are trying to penetrate, because it is on structure that we are attempting to have an impact. The distinction between demand and desire immediately clarifies demand. But it truly locates human desire in its place – in other words, at its strictly enigmatic point.

The relationship between the subject and the signifier is key to all of this. What characterizes demand is not simply that it is a relationship between one subject and another subject; it is that this relationship is constituted by language as an intermediary – that is, by the signifier.

As promised, we will turn now to the topic of what desire is insofar as it is the bedrock of dreams. It is not easy to know what the desire that is the motor force of a dream is. At the very least you realize that it is twofold.

First of all, it initially aims at safeguarding sleep – Freud articulates this in the most explicit of terms – that is to say, at safeguarding the state in which reality is suspended for the subject. Secondly, it [désir] is a death wish [désir de mort]. It is a death wish by way of contrast [d'autre part], and at the same time it is a death wish in a perfectly compatible way, inasmuch as it is often by means of this second desire that the first is satisfied, the death wish being that by which the wishing subject [sujet de la Wunsch] is satisfied.

I would like to place this subject in brackets of some sort. We do not know what the subject is and yet we would like to know who the wishing subject in the dream is. When certain people say that he is the ego, they are mistaken – Freud assuredly asserts the opposite. And if we say that he is the unconscious, we are not saying anything. Thus when I say that the wishing subject is satisfied, I am bracketing the subject. The only thing Freud tells us is that there is a wish that is satisfied.

Satisfied by what? I would say that "it is satisfied by being." You should understand this in the sense of "by [coming into] being, it is satisfied." That is all we can say, for dreams do not bring with them any other satisfaction than satisfaction at the level of wishes – in other words, a verbal satisfaction, so to speak. The wish in a dream makes do with appearances. The character of this satisfaction is thus reflected in language, in this "satisfied by being" as I expressed myself a moment ago, in which the ambiguity of the word "being" shows through.

51 Being is there, it slips in everywhere, and it also takes on the grammatical form of referring to being, "satisfied being" [l'être satisfait]. Can this be broached from the perspective of substance? There is nothing substantial in being other than the word itself, "it is satisfied by being." We can only broach being by taking it literally. In the final analysis, wishes are satisfied by something like being. All in all, it is only in dreams, at least at the level of being, that wishes can be satisfied.

Here I would like to provide a short preamble, as I often do, and take a look back in order to open your eyes to something that comprises no less than the whole history of psychological speculation.

As you know, modern psychology began with formulations involving psychological atomism.

You are all aware that we are no longer at that point, that we have abandoned associationism, as it is called, and that we have made considerable progress since we began taking into consideration the demand for totality, the unity of the field, intentionality, and other forces.

Yet the question is hardly settled, precisely because of Freudian psychoanalysis. People fail to see how this settling of accounts, which is not really one, actually played out. I mean that people completely overlook the essence, and simultaneously the persistence, of what was supposedly eliminated.

It is true that associationism, which belongs to the tradition of the British psychological school, initially involves a thorough misunderstanding, as it were.

The problem is that of the field of the real and of our psychological apprehension of it. What we in fact need to explain is not only that there are men who think, but that there are men who move around in the world while apprehending the field of objects in a more or less suitable way. Now, where does this field of objects get its fragmented, structured character from? From the signifying chain, quite simply. Associationism does nothing, in fact, but immediately provide the field of the real with the fragmented and structured character of the signifying chain. 62

Once this is realized, people naturally perceive that something has gone awry. They tell themselves that there must originally, as it were, be relations with the real that are less structured by the signifying chain, without even realizing that it is the signifier that is at work. People thus go off in search of cases in which our apprehension of the world seems to be more primitive, on the basis of a proportionalist notion of things. They look to animal psychology, they mention all the visual ways in which animals manage to structure their world, and they make this into the foundation of human apprehension of the real. They thereby challenge the well-known elements of associationism for being based on a first and false conception of this apprehension of the real, they proceed to eliminate those elements, and they bury the whole thing in a sort of field theory in which the real appears to be animated by the vector of a primordial desire.

They then imagine that they have solved the problem, whereas, in fact, they have done nothing at all. They have described something else, another psychology, one that seeks to grasp the degree to which the subject's sensorimotor field is coapted to its Umwelt – that is, to its surroundings. Nevertheless, the elements of associationism live on perfectly well despite the establishment of this new psychology. Associationism is not in the least eliminated; the field that is targeted by psychology has simply been displaced.

The proof of this is found in the psychoanalytic field where all the principles of associationism reign supreme. Nothing thus far has managed to gloss over the fact that when we analysts began exploring the field of the unconscious, we did so on the basis of something that in theory is called "free association," and we continue to do so every day. Even though the term is approximate and inexact, the aim of free association remains valid for designating analytic discourse.

Consider the earliest experiments with word association. Even if they no longer have any therapeutic or practical value to us, they still orient us in our exploration of the field of the unconscious. This 63 alone suffices to show us that we operate in a field in which words or signifiers reign supreme.

What is associationism – and thus what comes after it related to the same experiential ground – based on? On the observation that elements, atoms, or ideas – as people say, no doubt approximately and insufficiently, but not for no reason – are coordinated at a certain level in a subject's mind. And what did the first experimental explorations of the phenomenon show? That it is conditioned by what people called relations of contiguity. Examine the texts to see what they talk about and what examples they are based on, and you will clearly see that this continuity is nothing but the discursive combination on which the effect that I call metonymy is based.

There is contiguity between two things that occur to us, inasmuch as they are evoked in memory at the level of the laws of association. A life event was experienced in a context that we can, overall, call a random context. One part of the event being evoked, the other part comes to mind. An association based on contiguity is thereby constituted, which is nothing other than an encounter. What does this mean? It means in short that the contiguity disintegrates [elle se brise], and that its elements are taken up in one and the same narrative text. If we speak here of contiguity, it is inasmuch as the event evoked in memory is a narrated event, inasmuch as a narrative forms the text thereof.

There is, by way of contrast, the kind of contiguity that we see in an experiment involving word association, for example. One word brings another with it. I [the experimenter] say the word "cherry" and the subject mentions the word "table." It is a relationship based on contiguity because on such and such a day there were cherries on the table.

A relationship based on similarity is different from a relationship based on contiguity, but it is also a relationship between signifiers inasmuch as similarity involves the passage from one term [to another] owing to a similarity of being. There is a similarity between them insofar as, the one and the other being different, some existing subject [or: extant subject, sujet d'être] makes them similar. I am not going to enter into the entire dialectic of the same and the other, with everything that it brings with it that is difficult and infinitely richer than a first glance allows us to suspect. Those who are interested in it can read Plato's Parmenides. They will see that they can 64 spend quite a lot of time on it before exhausting the topic.

What I am simply saying here, and what I am trying to get you to sense, is that there are other usages than metonymic usages. If I speak of lips as being like cherries, I make a metaphorical use of the word "cherry." Someone says the word "lip" and it brings to my mind the word "cherry" – why are they linked? Because they are both red? Because they both have the same shape, analogically? Because they are similar owing to some attribute? No, not just that. Regardless of what is involved, we are immediately, and this is palpable, faced with an altogether substantial effect that is known as a metaphorical effect. When I speak of cherries with regard to lips in a word-association experiment, there is no ambiguity whatsoever – we are at the level of metaphor in the most substantial sense of the term. And at the most formal level, a metaphorical effect always comes down to an effect of substitution [of one term for another] in the signifying chain, as I have shown you.

If cherries come to mind here, it is inasmuch as they can be inscribed in a context, whether structural or not, in which lips figure. To which you could object that cherries might come to mind in relation to lips owing to the function of contiguity, it being possible that cherries disappear between the lips, or that a woman presented me with cherries while holding them with her lips. This is of course possible. It can happen. But what sort of contiguity is involved, if not the contiguity of the narrative I mentioned earlier?

From the vantage point of the real, we must not allow ourselves to be deluded by the event in which this contiguity was integrated, which was such that a cherry was in fact momentarily in contact with the lips. What is important here is not that a cherry touch the lips but that it be swallowed. It is not that it be held with the lips, it is that it be offered to us via an erotic gesture. If we stop the cherry for an instant while it is in contact with the lips, it is as a function of a snapshot [flash*] that is provided by the narrative. What momentarily suspends the cherry between the lips is a sentence and words.

Inversely, it is because the dimension of narrative that can freeze the frame [flash*] exists that the image created by the suspension of the narrative in effect becomes, in this case, something that stimulates desire. It is the involvement of language in the act that sets the tone here. It is after the fact that language introduces into the act a stimulation or stimulating element that is related to the stopping of the narrative. This suspension, which at times comes to fuel the act itself, takes on the value of fantasy, which gives a specific meander [détour] of the act an erotic signification.

This, I believe, suffices to show you that the instance of the signifier is at the crux of the very structuring of a certain psychological field. It is not the totality of the field. It is a part of it, assuming that we conventionally call "psychology" a discipline constituted on the basis of what I will call an intentional or appetitive unitary theory. The fact remains that the presence of the signifier, as Freud never ceases to remind us, is articulated in an infinitely more insistent, powerful, and effective way in analytic experience.

We have an odd tendency to forget this. People would like psychoanalysis to go in the same direction as psychology did. They accept the unconscious only in the realm of a clinical force field. In this perspective, psychoanalysis is a type of well or drilling path, as it were, that runs parallel to the general development of psychology, which has supposedly given us access to elemental forces, to a field of depths reduced to the life functions, whereas what we see at the surface is thought to be the field of the conscious and the preconscious.

This is a mistake.

And it is precisely in this context that what we say takes on its value.

2

Did some of you follow my advice and reread the two articles by Freud that came out in 1915?

If you consult, for example, his article on the unconscious

[Unbewusste], the part that is most relevant to our topic, you will observe that what is at work [in the unconscious] is nothing other than signifying elements. When I speak here about the signifier, those who understand absolutely nothing unremittingly repeat that I am espousing an intellectualist theory, to which they naturally oppose affective life and dynamics. I am far from contesting the existence of the latter, since it is precisely in order to explain them 66 clearly that I am mentioning Freud's article on the Unbewusste. We will thus turn to a consideration of unconscious feelings, inasmuch as Freud mentions them.

In the third part of his article, Freud explains very clearly that the only thing that can, strictly speaking, be repressed is what he calls the Vorstellungsrepräsentanz. The German here means "representative of the representation." Of what? Of drive impulses, which he calls Triebregungen here, which we can even refer to more exactly as the units [unité] of drive motion.

Freud's text leaves absolutely no ambiguity on this score: we cannot consider the Triebregungen to be unconscious, nor can we consider them to be conscious. What does this mean? It means that what we call Triebregung must be taken as an objective concept. It is an objective unit because we look at it and it is neither conscious nor unconscious; it simply is what it is – namely, an isolated fragment of reality that we conceptualize as having its own active impact.

It is thus, in my view, all the more remarkable that what represents the Triebregung – namely, the "representative of (the) representation," this is the exact value of the German term, and it is the sole representative of the drive (Trieb) – is said by Freud to belong to the unconscious. Now, the latter implies the exact term that I wrote on the board earlier with a question mark next to it – namely, an unconscious subject.

You, of course, can already see not where I am heading with this, but where we will necessarily wind up. Whereas Freud, at his time, was at the stage at which things could be said in the form of scientific discourse, you must clearly sense that this Vorstellungsrepräsentanz is strictly equivalent to the notion of the signifier, to the term "signifier."

I am merely announcing this to you, even if its demonstration strikes me as already quite advanced; if not, what was the point of everything I said to you earlier today? I will, naturally, demonstrate it to you more thoroughly, ever more thoroughly. The signifier is precisely what is at work here.

Freud, on the other hand, articulates in the most unmistakable way that none of what we connote with the terms sensation, feeling, and affect, which he lumps together, can be called unconscious except when we express ourselves sloppily. Depending on the 67 context, such sloppiness, like all sloppiness, may or may not have disadvantages; but when it comes to theory he categorically denies such things any and all possibility of unconscious impact. This is expressed and repeated by Freud in a manner that can leave no doubt or ambiguity.

When we talk [sloppily] about an affect as being unconscious, we are implying that the affect is perceived but misrecognized. Misrecognized in what regard? In what it is connected with, but that does not make it unconscious, for it has nevertheless been perceived. It has simply, as Freud tells us, become connected to a different representation, one that is not repressed. Stated otherwise, the affect had to adapt to the context found in the preconscious; this allows the affect to be taken by consciousness – which in this case is not very exacting – to be a manifestation of this preconscious context. This is articulated by Freud, and not just once, but a hundred times; he reiterated it when discussing all kinds of different topics.

It is precisely here that we come upon the enigma of what is known as the transformation of affect; affect turns out to be incredibly plastic. Moreover, all psychoanalytic writers are struck by this as soon as they take up the topic of affect – in other words, every time their eyes alight on it, I mean insofar as they dare broach the topic. For, what is altogether striking is that someone like me, who apparently is developing an intellectualist form of psychoanalysis, is going to spend a whole year talking about it, whereas you can count on the fingers of one hand the small number of articles that have been devoted to the topic of affect in psychoanalysis – even though analysts talk about it constantly when they present a case, for naturally they always resort to affect.

To the best of my knowledge, there is but one worthwhile article on the topic of affect, an article by Glover, which is often mentioned in texts by Marjorie Brierley. Glover endeavors to take a step forward regarding the discovery of the notion of affect, Freud's discussions of the topic leaving a little something to be desired. Glover's article is, moreover, appalling, as is the whole of Brierley's book, which is devoted to what she calls Trends in Psycho-Analysis. It is a rather fine illustration of all the truly absurd places in which psychoanalysis is currently sticking its nose – morality, personology, and other eminently practical perspectives around which our era's blah blah blah loves to spin its wheels.

68 To return to the things that concern us, namely to serious things, what do we read in Freud's work? We read that, as regards affect, the problem is to figure out what becomes of it when it is disconnected from the repressed representation and no longer depends on anything but the substitute representation to which it has managed to get connected. A possibility that is characteristic of it – that of being annexed by another representation – corresponds to this being "disconnected"; it is in this respect that affect presents itself in analytic experience as something problematic.

We see this, for example, in the hysteric's lived experience. Psychoanalysis began with this and this is where Freud set out from when he began to formulate analytic truths. We see affects arising in the ordinary, comprehensible, communicable text of hysterics' everyday lives, and the affects that are there – and that appear to be integrated into the whole text of their lives except to those with a more exacting gaze – are nevertheless the transformation of something else.

This something else is worth dwelling on, for it is not another affect which would supposedly be in the unconscious. Freud rules that out absolutely. It is absolutely nothing of the kind. There is absolutely nothing which is really in the unconscious at that moment. What is transformed is the purely quantitative factor of the drive. The "something else" is the quantitative factor in a transformed guise.

The point then is to figure out how such transformations are possible – namely, for example, how an affect which is in the depths, an affect about which we might conclude that it corresponds to such and such in the unconscious text, can present itself in another guise in the preconscious context.

What does Freud tell us? A first citation: "The whole difference arises from the fact that ideas [Vorstellungen] are cathexes – basically of memory-traces – whilst affects and emotions correspond to processes of discharge, the final manifestations of which are perceived as feelings" [SE XIV, p. 178]. This is the rule of affect formation.

As I told you, affect refers to a quantitative factor. By that Freud means that it is not simply changeable and mobile, but that it is subjected to the variable constituted by this factor. He articulates this precisely by saying that the vicissitude of an affect may be threefold: "Either the affect remains, wholly or in part, as it is; or it is transformed into a qualitatively different quota of affect, above 69 all into anxiety" – this is what he writes in 1915, and we see here the outlines of the position he articulates in 1926 in Inhibitions, Symptoms, and Anxiety in the context of the second topography – "or it is suppressed, i.e., it is prevented from developing at all" [SE XIV, p. 178].

"In comparison with unconscious ideas," Freud writes, "there is the important difference that unconscious ideas continue to exist after repression as actual structures in the system Ucs., whereas all that corresponds in that system to unconscious affects is a potential beginning which is prevented from developing" [SE XIV, p. 178].

I could not avoid providing this preamble before beginning to raise questions here about the interpretation of the desire in dreams.

I announced that I would borrow for this purpose a dream taken from Freud's work, since he is, after all, the best guide for us if we want to be sure of what he means when he talks about the desire in a dream.

I will borrow a dream from the article entitled "Formulations on the Two Principles of Mental Functioning," published in 1911 just before the case of Schreber.

I have chosen to extract a dream and Freud's analysis of it from this particular text because in it Freud articulates in a simple, exemplary, significant, and unambiguous way how he intends to handle Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen, inasmuch as in this article the formulation of unconscious desire is examined.

The upshot of the whole of Freud's work as regards the relations between the Vorstellungsrepräsentanzen and the primary process – insofar as they are under the sway of the first principle, known as the pleasure principle – leaves no room for doubt. There is no other way to conceptualize the opposition between the pleasure principle and the reality principle if it is not to realize that what we are told about the emergence of hallucinations by which the primary process – that is, desire at the level of the primary process – finds its satisfaction concerns not simply an image but a signifier.

70 It is, moreover, surprising that people did not discover this in other realms, I mean on the basis of clinical work. If people never realized this in other realms, it is because the notion of the signifier had not yet been developed at the moment of the great blossoming of classical psychiatry. For in what form do hallucinations usually present themselves in the lion's share of clinical experience? What are the major forms that are the most problematic and insistent in which hallucinations arise for us? They are those of verbal hallucinations, or verbally structured hallucinations, when there is an intrusion or inmixing into the field of reality, not of an image or fantasy, not of something that a simple perceptual process would prop up, but a signifier. If a hallucination poses its own specific problems to us, it is because it involves signifiers, not images, things, or perceptions, not those "false perceptions of reality," as people put it. In Freud's work, this is unmistakable.

At the end of the article, Freud mentions a dream to illustrate what he calls a neurotische Währung, a "neurotic currency" [valorisation, which also means "valuation"], insofar as the primary process irrupts into it. Währung is a term we should keep in mind, as it is not very common in German. It is related to the verb währen [to last], which is a durative form of the verb wahren [to look after, keep, safeguard, or protect]. While it means duration, it is most commonly used in the sense of value or valuation.

The dream in question was dreamt by a subject who was mourning the loss of his father whom he had, Freud tells us, nursed throughout the long painful illness that led to his death. Here is the dream:

> His father was alive once more and was talking with him in his usual way. But he felt it exceedingly painful that his father had really died, only without knowing it. [SE XII, p. 225]

It is a short dream. And it is one that the patient had repeatedly in the months following his father's passing. It is a dream that, as always, Freud brings us in the form of a transcript, for what is essential in Freudian analysis is always based on the narrative of the dream as it is initially articulated. How does Freud broach it?

It is out of the question, of course – if only because of the distinction Freud always made between the manifest content and the latent content – that Freud ever thought a dream could be immediately brought into connection with what, in psychoanalysis, people have 71 no compunction about calling "wishful thinking,"* a term that has no equivalent in French. By pronouncing it, I would almost like to force it to make a sound like that of an alarm bell. The use of such a term should, all by itself, put analysts on their guard or even on the defensive, and persuade them that they have set off down the wrong path.

Freud does not even for an instant entertain this "wishful thinking." He does not say that, if the subject dreams about his father it is simply because he needs to see him and that to see him gives him pleasure. That is not at all sufficient, for the simple reason that this dream does not seem to bring any satisfaction whatsoever with it. Its painful character is quite clearly indicated, and this should allow us to avoid jumping to such inane conclusions. Nevertheless, if I am bringing this up here, it is in order to indicate the possibility of doing so, even though in the end I do not believe that any analyst could go that far when it comes to a dream. And it is precisely because we cannot go that far when it comes to dreams that psychoanalysts are no longer interested in dreams.

How does Freud broach things? We will stick to the level of his text:

> The only way of understanding this apparently nonsensical dream is by adding "as the dreamer wished" or "in consequence of his wish" after the words "that his father had really died," and by further adding "that he [the dreamer] wished it" to the last words. The dream-thought then runs: it was a painful memory for him that he had been obliged to wish for his father's death (as a release) while [his father] was still alive, and how terrible it would have been if his father had had any suspicion of it! [SE XII, p. 225]

This leads us to give its full weight to the way in which Freud approaches the dream: via the signifier. What Freud inserts into the text, and what he lays out for us as allowing us to understand the dream, as delivering up the meaning of the text, are clausulae. I will try to articulate what they are at the linguistic level.

Please pay attention to what I am saying here. I am not saying that this is the interpretation. It may in fact be the interpretation, but I am not yet saying so. I am freezing the frame here at a moment at which a certain signifier is designated as being produced by the fact that it is missing. It is by resituating it in the context of 72 the dream that we can immediately accede to what we are given to understand to be the meaning of the dream.

We find ourselves faced with a typical case here, a case in which one's self-reproach concerning a loved one leads back to the infantile signification of a death wish. The term transference, Übertragung, is used here by Freud in the way he first used it in The Interpretation of Dreams to designate the carryover of an early situation – of an early death wish, in this instance – into a current situation. A wish that is analogical, homologous, parallel, or in any way similar is introduced in order to revive the archaic wish in question.

Freud thus approaches the problem via the signifier. It is on that basis that we can try to elaborate what interpretation means. But let us begin by settling a score with the type of interpretation we set aside, which refers to "wishful thinking."* One remark will suffice here.

This English term cannot be translated by pensée désireuse or pensée désirante for a very simple reason. It has a meaning, of course, but people use it in analysis in a context in which that meaning is not valid. Whenever you encounter the term, in order to put the pertinence of its usage to the test, you need but make the following distinction. It must not signify "take one's desires for realities," as people say nowadays [in French] – that is the meaning of thought insofar as it slip slides and gives way – but rather "take one's dream for reality." This in and of itself makes it altogether inapplicable to the interpretation of dreams, to this type of comprehension of dreams. In the case of dreams, it simply means that we dream because we dream. An interpretation at this level is in no wise applicable at any moment to dreams.

We must thus turn to the procedure known as the addition of signifiers.

If we follow Freud here, this procedure assumes that there had been a prior subtraction of a signifier – "subtraction" is the exact meaning of the term that Freud uses to designate the operation of repression in its pure form, in its unterdrückt effect, I would say. It is here that we find ourselves brought up short by something that appears to be an objection and an obstacle.

If we had not decided in advance to find everything in Freud's 73 work wonderful – in other words, if we had not decided in advance to believe we believe, as Prévert puts it – we would stop to consider the following: that the pure and simple restoring of the two clausulae, "nach seinem Wunsch" and "daß er [der Träumer] es wünschte" – that is, that the son wished for his father's death – provides nothing, strictly speaking, as regards what Freud himself designates as the final goal of interpretation, namely, the reconstruction of the unconscious desire in the dream.

What are we actually formulating with these additions? Nothing but what the subject already knew perfectly well. During his father's extremely painful illness, the subject indeed wished for his father's death as a solution and end to his torments. Naturally, he did everything possible to hide this desire or wish from his father, but it was totally accessible to the son in this context, in his recent life experience. We need not even speak about it being preconscious in this regard – it was a conscious memory that was part and parcel of the continuous text of his consciousness.

It is thus the dream that subtracts from its text an element that is not at all hidden from the subject's conscious mind. And it is thus the phenomenon of subtraction that takes on a positive value here, as it were. I mean that this is the problem of repression. What is repressed here is indubitably a Vorstellungsrepräsentanz, one that is even quite typical.

If something deserves to be termed a Vorstellungsrepräsentanz, it is certainly something that is, in and of itself, I would say, a form that is devoid of meaning. Taken all by itself, isolated [from its context], "as he wished" means nothing. It means "in consequence of the wish mentioned earlier." The meaning depends on the sentence that came before it.

This is the direction in which I would like to lead you in order to get you to grasp the irreducible character of what is at stake in any and every conception based on an imaginary elaboration – or even on an abstraction of object-like data – whereas what is actually involved is the signifier and the originality of the field that is established by the signifier's action in the psyche, lived experience, and the human subject. What we have here are signifying forms that hang together only insofar as they are linked with other signifiers.

74 I am well aware that I am raising points here that would require far more discussion.

Psychologists from what is known as the Marburg School, which involved a small group of people working in a closed circle, conducted all sorts of experiments, with a great deal of perseverance, regarding a kind of intuition that they called thought without images. The point was, without using images, to think up kinds of forms that were nothing but signifying forms without any context, in statu nascendi. Moreover, the problems that are raised here for us by the notion of Vorstellung warrant that we recall that Freud attended the course given by Brentano for two years, we having unambiguous evidence thereof. It would be necessary to examine Brentano's Psychologie and his conception of Vorstellung in order to grasp the exact weight this term could have had in Freud's mind and not simply in my interpretation.

What is the problem we encounter? It is that of the relationship that exists between repression, on the one hand, insofar as it applies, as Freud tells us, to something like Vorstellungen, and the appearance, on the other hand, of a new meaning owing to something which, to our way of thinking, at the point where we are making headway, is different from repression – namely, the elision of the two clausulae in the context of the preconscious. Is this elision the same thing as repression? Is it the precise counterpart or contrary of repression?

We must first explain this elision at the most formal level. What effect does it have? It is clear that it has a meaning effect. I am saying "elision" and not "allusion," for it is not a "figuration," to use everyday language. Far from alluding to something that preceded it – namely, the relations between the father and the son – the dream introduces something that sounds absurd and has an entirely original range of signification at the manifest level. What is involved is a figura verborum, a figure of words [or trope], to employ a term that is a counterpart to the first one. The elision creates a signified effect. In this regard it is equivalent to the substitution of a blank or zero for the missing terms – but a zero is not nothing. In short, the effect involved can be qualified as a metaphorical effect.

The dream is a metaphor. In this metaphor, something new emerges that is a meaning or signified. The latter is undoubtedly enigmatic, but it is certainly not something that we have no need to take into account. It is, I would say, one of the most essential forms of human experience, since it is this very image which, for centuries, forced people, at one moment or another of mourning in the course of their existence, onto the most hidden of pathways that led them to consult necromancers. 75

What necromancers summoned up in the magic circle were what are called shades [or spirits, ombres], and what took place was no different than what takes place in this dream. A shade is a being who is there without us knowing how he exists, and before whom one can literally say nothing. This being speaks, of course, but that is not important, for, up to a certain point, what he says is also what he does not say, and the dream does not even tell us what it is. His speech only takes on its value owing to the fact that the person who summoned this loved one from the nether regions can literally say nothing to him regarding his innermost truth.

This confrontation, structured scene, or scenario invites us to wonder what it is. What is its import? Does it have the fundamental, structured, and structuring value of what I am trying to lay out for you this year by the name of fantasy? Is it a fantasy? Are there a certain number of characteristics that can be required in order for us to recognize the characteristics of fantasy in such a scenario?

Unfortunately, we cannot begin to answer these questions until next time. But rest assured that we will answer them very precisely. Our answers will allow us to glimpse the way in which it is in fact a fantasy and in what regard it is a dream fantasy [un fantasme de rêve].

Let me make a first point right away. In the precise sense that we can give the word "fantasy," a dream fantasy takes very specific forms, and it does not have the same import as that of a waking fantasy, whether it be unconscious or not. We will see in this regard how we must conceptualize the function of fantasy.

A second point: we will see on this basis where what Freud called the mechanisms of the dream-work [élaboration] are situated – namely, in the relationship between the repressed, which is assumed to be prior, and the signifiers about which I showed you to what degree Freud pinpoints them and how he articulates the impact of their absence in terms of pure signifying relations, by which I mean relations that exist between signifiers. 76

We will try to situate the signifiers of the narrative – first, "he is dead," second, "he did not know it," and third, "as the dreamer wished" [see SE V, pp. 430–1] – and put them to work along the trajectories of the chains that I call the "chain of the subject" and the "signifying chain," respectively, such as they are posited, repeated, and insistently presented to you in the form of our graph of desire.

You will see what this graph can do for us, and that there is no possible functioning of discourse except on the basis of structures in which the topological position of elements and of their relations are inscribed. You will also see that the notion of these structures alone allows us to give meaning to the analysis of this dream. In other words, up to a certain point, we can say that the two clausulae in question are truly the content of the repressed – namely, the Real verdrängt, as Freud puts it, what is really repressed.

But that is not enough. We must also distinguish how and why the dream uses these elements. They are undoubtedly repressed, but at the level of the dream they are not repressed. Whereas the earlier immediately lived experience brought them into play as such, in the dream, far from being repressed, they are elided as clausulae. Why? In order to produce what sort of effect? It is not easy to say. In short, it is a signification that is produced, there is no doubt about that; but we will shall see that the elision of the same wish can have effects that are altogether different in different structures.

To pique and stimulate your curiosity a bit, I would simply like to observe that there is perhaps a relationship between the elision of the clausula "as he wished," and what we see in other contexts, which are not dream contexts – in psychosis, for example, where we sometimes observe a misrecognition of death, misrecognition by the subject of his own death. At the formal level, it suffices that the words "he did not know it" or "he wanted to know nothing about it" be linked otherwise with "he is dead" for the one to lead to the other, unless we immediately distinguish the clinical contexts, as Verwerfung [foreclosure] is distinguished from Verneinung [negation].

77 In psychosis this articulation can lead to feelings of being invaded or penetrated, or to fertile moments in which the subject thinks that he in fact has across from him something far closer still to a dream image than we might expect – namely, someone who is dead. The subject lives with a dead man, but a dead man who quite simply does not know that he is dead.

Perhaps we can go so far as to recognize a similar phenomenon in normal life, the kind we experience every day. Perhaps it happens to us more often than we think to have in our presence someone who appears to behave satisfactorily, socially speaking, but who – in terms of his being of interest to us, in terms of what allows us to get along with a human being – is truly dead, and has been for some time, dead and mummified, who is just waiting for the pendulum to swing – for I know not what, for [the last straw that reveals he is mere] semblance – to be reduced to the sort of dust that must spell his demise. I know more than one of them. Now that I have brought this to your attention, look around among those you know.

Being half-dead is perhaps far more prevalent than we think in relations between subjects. Isn't it true that the part of every living being that is half-dead does not leave us a perfectly clear conscience? Perhaps a large part of our behavior with our fellow men sets off in us an incidental reaction that is always present and essential, which is denoted by the precautions we must take in order not to comment to the half-dead that where he is, where he is in the process of talking to us, he is half-prey to death.

Perhaps this is something that we must take into account, whose importance we must weigh, when we take it upon ourselves to listen to the speech, revelations, and free discourse of people undergoing analysis. Undertaking something so audacious with analysands cannot fail to have an impact upon ourselves, which is precisely what we defend against most strongly. [We defend against] what there is in us that is most fictitious and most repeated – namely, what is half-dead in us, too.

At the point at which we have arrived at the end of today's class, I have raised more questions than I have answered.

If this dream teaches us something about the relations between 78 the subject and desire, it is because it has a value that should not surprise us given its protagonists – namely, a father, a son, death incarnate, and, as you will see, a relationship to desire.

It is thus no accident that I chose this example and that we will have to explore it further next time.

LITTLE ANNA'S DREAM

Hallucination, between pleasure and reality
The topology of signifiers
The palimpsest of repressions
The I of the statement and the I of enunciation Repression, from the unsaid to not-knowing

I left you last time in the midst of discussing a dream, a dream that at least superficially seems simple. I announced that, with regard to this dream, we would strive to articulate the strict meaning we give here to the following terms: the desire in the dream and interpretation. We will return to those. I also think that this dream is quite valuable, theoretically speaking.

I have once again been rereading The Interpretation of Dreams, having told you that this was the first text we would be examining this year on desire and its interpretation.

I must admit that, up until a certain point, I allowed myself to reproach people in the analytic community for being unfamiliar with its twists and turns – which is indisputable – yet my reproach, like every reproach, has another facet, which is that of an excuse. For in fact, it does not suffice to have read this book hundreds of times in order to remember its contents. This is a phenomenon that we encounter quite often, but that has been brought home to me especially clearly the last few days. Everyone knows how easily we forget everything that has to do with the unconscious.

For example, it is quite obvious to what degree people forget funny stories and stories that are considered to be witty. This highly significant fact cannot be explained even one iota outside of a Freudian perspective. Let us say that you are meeting with some friends. Someone makes a joke, not even recounting a funny story, but making a pun at the beginning of the get-together or at the end you ask yourself, "What was that incredibly funny thing the person sitting to my right said earlier?" And you cannot for the life of you recall it. This is an almost sure sign of the fact that witticisms arise from the unconscious.
80 of the lunch, and by the time the coffee comes at the end of the meal

When we read or reread The Interpretation of Dreams, we have the impression that it is what I would call a magical book, if the word did not lend itself, in our vocabulary, to so much ambiguity and even error, which is quite unfortunate. We stroll through The Interpretation of Dreams as if we were truly in the book of the unconscious, which is why we have so much trouble holding onto what is so well articulated in it. We have here a phenomenon that is worth noting.

To that we have to add the almost insane distortion introduced by the French translation. The more closely I examine it, the more I find truly inexcusable the crude inaccuracies it contains. Some of you ask me for explanations and I immediately refer back to the text. There is, for example, in Chapter VI, devoted to the dream-work, a section entitled "Considerations of Representability," the first page of which in the French translation is more than just a web of inaccuracies – it has nothing whatsoever to do with the German text, and it confuses everything and puzzles us. I will not develop this point any further, but obviously none of this makes it especially easy for readers of the French to get a handle on The Interpretation of Dreams.

We began to decipher the dream we took up last time in a way that may not have seemed very straightforward to you, but which was nevertheless intelligible, at least I hope it was. To clearly see what is at stake, we will articulate it using the graph of desire.

If a dream interests us, it is in the sense in which it interests Freud – that is, in the sense in which it fulfills [réalisation] desire. Desire is at work in the dream here insofar as the dream is its fulfillment. How are we going to be able to articulate it? I will first bring up another dream, one I already mentioned before [see Seminar V, Chapter XII], and whose exemplary value you will see. It is not terribly well known – one has to go looking for it.

At the beginning of Chapter 3, whose title is "A Dream Is the Fulfillment of a Wish," we find dreams whose existence I am sure none of you are unaware of, children's dreams, and they are presented to us by Freud as what I will call an early stage of desire in dreams.

The dream I will discuss was already included in the first edition of 81 the Traumdeutung [The Interpretation of Dreams]. Freud mentions it at the moment at which he begins to spell out the nature of dreams for his contemporaries. The fact that the Traumdeutung takes the form of an expository text explains many things to us, especially the fact that things are brought out first in a sweeping sort of way, giving us a first approximation of things, only to be unpacked later.

When we do not look very closely at this passage, we content ourselves with what Freud says about the direct, undistorted (that is, without Entstellung, distortion) character of children's dreams, whereas dreams usually appear to us in a profoundly modified guise as regards their deepest thought content. In children, it is all supposedly quite simple – desire purportedly goes straight, and as directly as possible, to what the subject desires. Freud gives us several examples of this. The first is worth recalling, because it truly illustrates his point. Here it is:

> My youngest daughter [Anna Freud] who was at that time nineteen months old, had a fit of vomiting one fine morning and was forced to fast. During the night that followed this day of fasting, we heard her call out in her dream "Anna F.eud, Er(d)beer, Hochbeer, Eier(s)peis, Papp!"

Er(d)beer is a child's way of pronouncing strawberries, Hochbeer also means strawberries, Eier(s)peis corresponds more or less to the word "custard," and Papp means porridge. Freud tells us the following:

> She thus used her name to express taking possession, and the enumeration of all the prestigious dishes, or those that seemed to her such, [to express] food worth desiring.

The appearance of strawberries in the dream (in the form of two varieties, Erdbeer and Hochbeer – I did not manage to precisely pin down Hochbeer, but Freud's commentary suggests that they correspond to two varieties of strawberries) was a demonstration or protest against the health police in the house, and was rooted in the circumstance clearly registered by Anna that the day before the nurse had attributed her illness to having eaten too many 82 strawberries. Because of the nurse's unwanted and annoying recommendation, Anna immediately took revenge on her in her dream.

Leaving aside the dream that Freud's nephew Hermann had, which raises other problems, I would point to a passage that is not found in the first edition, because it was added later after discussions of the Viennese school, the minutes of which we have. Ferenczi corroborated Freud's views by reminding people of the proverb, "Pigs dream of acorns and geese dream of corn." Freud then brought up the proverb, "What do geese dream of? Maize," that he undoubtedly did not borrow so much from the German context, I think, given the specific form of the last word. Lastly, there was the Jewish proverb, "What do chickens dream of? They dream of millet."

Let us dwell upon this for a moment.

I will begin with a brief tangential remark.

1

Regarding Granoff's paper last night, I mentioned an essential problem, which is that of the difference between the directive of pleasure and that of desire.

Let us return for a moment to the directive of pleasure and let me spell it out once and for all as quickly as possible.

It is obviously related to questions people ask me or that arise about the function I attribute to Vorstellung in what Freud calls the primary process.

To put it concisely, as this is but a parenthetical remark, when we investigate the function of Vorstellungen in the pleasure principle we realize that Freud gives it short shrift. To put it in a nutshell, we could say that he needs an element with which to construct what he perceives intuitively and that he finds this element in Vorstellungen.

It is characteristic of brilliant intuition to come up with something that had absolutely never been perceived hitherto. This is the conception of the primary process as distinct and separate from the secondary process. We do not perceive how original this is; we think 83 that what Freud is saying is comparable to what we thought before, whereas it is utterly and completely different. The composition or synthesis of these two principles is highly original.

The primary process signifies the presence of desire, but not of just any old desire. It signifies the presence of the desire that presents itself as the most fragmented. As for the perceptual element, it is what Freud uses to explain and get us to grasp what is at stake.

When the primary process alone is active, what happens? It leads to hallucination. Recall the first schemas Freud gives us on this score. Hallucination is produced by a process of regression that he calls "topographical." The different schemas Freud drew of what motivates and structures the primary process all have in common the fact that they are grounded in the trajectory of the reflex arc, with its two pathways – the afferent pathway, the afference of something known as sensory "stimuli," and the efferent pathway, the efference of something that is known as "motor activity" [SE V, p. 537].

In this perspective perception is conceptualized, in a way I would call terribly debatable, as something that accumulates somewhere on the side of the senses owing to a flood of excitations and stimuli from the outside world, and it is situated at the origin of action. All kinds of other things are assumed to happen afterward. Namely, it is here that Freud inserts a whole series of superimposed layers that run from the unconscious to the preconscious and so on, to arrive at something that may or may not lead to motor activity.

Whenever Freud speaks to us about what happens in the primary process, look closely at what is involved: a regressive movement. When excitation's advance toward motor activity is, for some reason, blocked, something like regression always occurs. It is here that something appears, a Vorstellung, which turns out to give the excitation in question a satisfaction that is, strictly speaking hallucinatory.

This is what is new in what Freud introduced.

The schemas he uses are provided for their functional value, I mean in order to establish, as Freud explicitly says, a series or 84 sequence, which should be considered to be temporal rather than spatial, as he points out [SE V, p. 537]. To Freud, the hallucinatory phenomenon is of interest, I would say, owing to its insertion in a circuit. In short, what Freud describes to us as being the result of the primary process is the fact that something in the circuit gets turned on.

I will not provide a metaphor here. I will merely indicate, in substance, what is highlighted by the explanation Freud draws from the phenomenon and the translation he gives of it, by referring here to the functioning of a circuit with a homeostatic goal, running through a series of relays in which the electrical activity is always implicitly measurable by reflexometry. Under certain conditions, the fact that something happens at the level of one of the relays takes on, in and of itself, the value of a terminal effect, identical to what we see occur in any kind of measuring device when, in a series of lights, one of them goes on. What is important is not so much what appears – namely, light – but what it indicates by way of a certain tension (which is produced, moreover, owing to a resistance) and state of the whole circuit at a given point in time.

Let us begin by underscoring the fact that an hallucination does not in any wise correspond to a need, to use that word, for naturally no need is satisfied by an hallucinatory satisfaction. Need, in order to be satisfied, requires the intervention of the secondary process – and even of secondary processes, for there is a wide variety of them – and these processes exact realities, as their name indicates. They are under the sway of the reality principle.

If there are secondary processes that occur, they only occur because there were primary processes. This is a truism, but the following remark is no less obvious, which is that the division between the two principles makes instinct unthinkable, however it may be conceptualized. Instinct evaporates.

Consider what all research regarding instinct – especially the most modern, elaborate, and intelligent – is moving toward. It aims to explain how a structure that is not purely preformed (we are no longer at that stage, we no longer view instinct like Fabre did, to us instinct is a structure that engenders and maintains its own sequential chain) lays down pathways in the real that lead a living being 85 toward objects that have not yet been tested by that being.

This is the problem of instinct. We are told that there is an appetitive stage and then a searching stage. The animal puts itself in a certain state involving motor activity that leads to movement in all sorts of directions. We arrive next at a stage of specialized triggering. Even if this specialized triggering gives rise to a behavior that leads him astray – in other words, even if he grabs onto a few colorful bits of string, as it were – the fact remains that he detected these bits in the real.

What I would like to indicate to you here is that an hallucinated behavior can be radically distinguished from a self-guided behavior based on a regressive cathexis, as it were, which is translated by the lighting up of a light along the conducting circuits. This luminous phenomenon can, at most, illuminate an already tested object. But if the object just so happens to already be there, it does not in any way show us the way to it – and still less, of course, if it shows the very same object when the object is not there, which is what actually happens in hallucinatory phenomena. At best, the subject can inaugurate on that basis the mechanism of searching, and this is what happens in the secondary process.

In short, according to Freud the secondary process takes the place of instinctual behavior. But, on the other hand, it is absolutely different from it, since, owing to the existence of the primary process, the secondary process presents itself as behavior that tests whether something is an hallucinatory reality or an experience (Erfahrung) that is at first organized like the effect of a light on a circuit. The secondary process accounts for judging behavior – "judgment" being a word that is proffered by Freud when he explains things at this level.

It should be clear that I am not endorsing all of this. I am extracting the meaning of what Freud articulates in order to transmit it to you.

In the final analysis, human reality is constructed, according to Freud, against a backdrop of prior hallucination, which is the universe of pleasure in its illusory essence. The whole process is out in the open. I am not saying that it betrays itself – not even!

What term does Freud constantly use when he needs to explain the succession of impressions into which the process of the psychi-86 cal apparatus breaks down, and specifically in the Traumdeutung? The term is niederschreiben. We encounter this term every time he postulates, in this text and in all the others too, a succession of levels, piled on top of each other, on which elements come to be written – niederschreiben does not mean to be stamped, it means to be inscribed – and registered, which Freud formulates differently at different moments in his thinking. In a first layer, what is at stake, for example, are relations of simultaneity, which will later be organized in other layers.

This is how the schema breaks down into a succession of inscriptions, of Niederschriften – a word that we cannot actually translate – that are superimposed on each other. Everything that happened at the outset – that is, prior to arriving at another form of articulation which is that of the preconscious – namely, everything that is strictly speaking in the unconscious, can only be conceptualized in a sort of typographical space. We find here a true topology of signifiers. This conclusion is inescapable when we follow Freud's articulation exactly.

In letter 52 to Fliess, we see that Freud is necessarily led to assume at the outset a kind of ideal, that cannot be taken to be a simple Wahrnehmung, a taking of truth [prise de vrai]. If we literally translate this topology of signifiers, we arrive at a begreifen [grasping or comprehending] of reality, a term Freud uses all the time.

How, according to Freud, do we manage to get a handhold on reality? Not at all through a selective triage, nor by anything that resembles what every theory of instinct presents as the first approximate behavior that directs an organism along the pathways of successful instinctual behavior. What is involved is, instead, a veritable, recurring critique of the signifiers that are evoked in the primary process. This critique, like all critique, does not of course eliminate what came before it, and which it concerns, but rather complicates it. It complicates it by connoting it as what? As indices of reality that are themselves part of the signifying order.

What I am articulating here as being what Freud conceptualizes and presents to us as the primary process emphasizes the function of the signifier, but there is absolutely no way to escape this emphasis. If you peruse any of the texts he wrote at the different stages of his 87 work, you will see that he repeated this every time he broached the problem, from its introduction in the Traumdeutung right up until what he formulated about it later when he proposed a second way of laying out his topography, starting in Beyond the Pleasure Principle and Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego.

What happens now to representations [Vorstellungen]?

Allow me to provide an image for a moment by playing with the etymology, as I did for [wahrnehmung, interpreting it as the kind of] taking of truth that would lead a sort of ideal subject to the real, which would lead him to alternatives by which he would create the real through his propositions [induit le réel dans ses propositions] – breaking the word Vorstellungen down as follows: Vor-stellungen.

Vorstellungen have a signifying organization. If we wanted to speak in Pavlovian terms, we would say that they are not part, at the outset, of a first system of significations connected to need, but are part of a second system of significations. They resemble the lighting up of a light in a slot machine when the ball has fallen in the right hole. The right hole, as Freud also says, means the same hole in which the ball fell before. The primary process does not seek a new object but rather an object to be found anew, and it does so by means of a Vorstellung that is evoked anew because it was the Vorstellung that corresponded to a first facilitation [frayage, corresponding to Freud's Bahnung]. The lighting up of the light pays a bonus. That's the pleasure principle.

Except that in order for this bonus to be paid, there has to be a certain reserve of coins in the machine. In this case, the reserve is reserved for the second system – that is, for the secondary processes. In other words, the switching on of the light is a satisfaction only within the machine's overall workings, insofar as the machine is that of a gambler from the moment at which he begins to gamble.

That said, let us return to Anna's dream.

Anna's dream is presented by Freud as a dream that manifests desire in the naked state.

It seems quite impossible to me, in the revelation of this nakedness, to avoid or elide the very mechanism by which this nakedness is revealed. In other words, the mode of revelation of this nakedness cannot be separated from the nakedness itself.

I have the impression that this so-called naked dream is known to us only by hearsay. When I say that, it does not at all mean what certain people have claimed I have said, that in short, we never know what someone has dreamt except by what he tells us of it, such that everything related to a dream should be bracketed owing to the fact of his having related it. While it is certainly not insignificant that Freud grants so much importance to the Niederschrift that constitutes the dream's residue, it is clear that this Niederschrift is related to an experience that the subject tells us about.

Freud is light years from sanctioning for so much as an instant the obvious objection that a spoken narrative is one thing, whereas a lived experience is something else. On the contrary, he rejects it energetically and he even expressly grounds his entire analysis in the narrative, going so far as to advise us to use a sort of Niederschrift technique, based on how the dream is set down in writing. This clearly shows what he thinks, at bottom, about lived experience – namely, that such experience gains from being broached via the signifier. If experience is articulated, it is not its own doing, of course, for it is already structured as a series of Niederschriften.

We have here a kind of palimpsest writing, as it were, assuming we could imagine a palimpsest on which the different superimposed texts were related to each other, even if we did not know how. But if we tried to determine how, we would see that the relationship between them was far more to be sought out in the shape of the letters than in the meaning of the text. I am thus not in the process of saying that.

What I am saying in this case is that what we know of Anna's dream is strictly speaking what we know at the very moment at which it occurs as an articulated dream. Stated otherwise, the 89 degree of certainty we have about this dream is linked to the fact that we would also be far more certain about what pigs and geese dream about if they themselves told us their dreams. But in this earliest example, we have more. The exemplary value of the dream overheard by Freud is that it was spoken out loud while Anna was sleeping, and this leaves no room for ambiguity whatsoever concerning the presence of the signifier in its actual text.

It is impossible to cast the slightest doubt on the dream by pointing to the supposedly added character of the information that comes to us about it through speech. We know that Anna Freud is dreaming because she pronounces the words, "Anna F.eud, Er(d)beer, Hochbeer, Eier(s)peis, Papp!" We know nothing about the dream images in this case, but they find in these words a symbolic "affix" [affixe], if I may borrow a term from the theory of complex numbers, an affix in which we in some sense see the signifier present itself in a flocculated state – in other words, in a series of names.

These names constitute a sequence whose choice of elements is not random. In effect, as Freud tells us, what is involved here is precisely everything that she was prohibited, inter-dicted, from having, everything which, when she asked for it, she was told "No, you can't have any!" This common denominator brings unity to the diversity of terms, even if we cannot but observe conversely that this diversity reinforces the unity and even designates it. In short, this series juxtaposes this unity to the electiveness of need satisfaction.

People attribute a desire to pigs and to geese. Well, you need but reflect on the effect it would have if, instead of saying, as in the proverb, that pigs dream of kukuruz, maize, we set out to enumerate everything that pigs presumably dream of. You would see that this would have a rather different effect. And even if we wanted to claim that only an insufficient education of the glottis stops pigs and geese from making this known to us – and even if we argued that we could make up for this by perceiving in both species the equivalent, so to speak, of linguistic articulation in certain tremblings of their mandibles – the fact remains that it would hardly be likely that these 90 animals would include their own names, as Anna Freud does, in the sequence.

Let us even assume that our pig is named Toto and our goose is named Bel-Azor. If something like this were to occur, it would turn out that they would mention their names in a language which obviously – no more nor less obviously, moreover, than in human beings, but in human beings we see this less clearly – has nothing whatsoever to do with the satisfaction of their needs, since they would go by these names in the farmyard – in other words, in a context that corresponds to the needs of men, not to their own needs.

As I said earlier, we want to dwell first of all on the fact that Anna Freud articulates words. The mechanism of motor activity is thus not absent from this dream, since it is thanks to motor activity that the dream comes to our attention. But secondly, we want to dwell on the fact that the signifying structuring of the dream sequence places a message at the top (or beginning), as you can see illustrated if you know how people communicate using the complicated machines that are those of our modern era. For example, when one places a telephone call from the head to the tail of an airplane, or from one phone booth to another, one announces oneself, one announces who it is that is speaking. Anna Freud, at nineteen months of age, in her dream, announces herself; she says, "Anna Freud," and then she provides a series. I would almost say that after having heard her speak her dream aloud, one expects but one thing, which is that she say at the end, "Over and out!"

This introduces us to what I call the topology of repression – the clearest, the most formal as well, and the most articulated.

At the moments at which Freud speaks, at least twice in the Traumdeutung, about the anderer Schauplatz ["other stage (or scene)"; see SE IV, p. 48, and SE V, p. 536] – a term that had struck him when he read Fechner's work, so much so that we get the impression that it was a kind of lightning bolt, illumination, or revelation to him – he always highlights the fact that it is not another neurological locus. I would say that this other locus must be sought out in the structure of the signifier itself.

What I am trying to show you with this graph is the very structure of the signifying system. As soon as the subject enters into it, with the minimal hypotheses required by the fact that the subject enters 91 into the play of the signifier – namely, that the signifier is given and that the subject is defined as nothing more than what is going to enter into the signifying system – things necessarily become organized accordingly, and all sorts of consequences flow therefrom. This necessity is based on the fact that there is a topology that we must conceptualize; it suffices to conceptualize it as constituted by two superimposed chains.

How do things present themselves in Anna Freud's dream? They present themselves in a problematic and ambiguous way which, up to a certain point, legitimates the distinction Freud makes between a child's dream and an adult's dream.

Where is the chain of names that is found in Anna Freud's dream situated? On the upper or the lower chain?

You may have noticed that, in the upper part of the graph, the chain is represented as a dotted line – this emphasizes the element of discontinuity in the signifier – whereas the lower chain is represented as a continuous line [see, for example, Figure 2.1]. I told you, moreover, that both chains are involved in every process.

At the level at which we are posing the question, what does the lower chain mean? It is the level of demand, and – inasmuch as I told you that the subject qua speaking takes on solidity there that is borrowed from the synchronic solidarity of the signifier – it is quite obviously related to the unity of a sentence. This is what got people talking, and in a way that spilled a lot of ink, about the function of holophrasis, of a sentence qua whole. There is no doubt that holophrasis exists.

Holophrasis has a name: interjection. To illustrate the function of the lower chain at the level of demand, it is "[Give us] bread!" or "Help!" These interjections reside in the dimension of universal discourse. I am not speaking for the time being about children's discourse. This form of sentence exists; I would even say that in certain cases it takes on a value that is quite pressing and exacting. Need, which must undoubtedly pass through the defiles of the signifier qua need, is expressed here in a way that is certainly deformed but at least monolithic, with the proviso that it is the subject himself who constitutes the monolith in question at this level.

What happens on the upper line is something else altogether. What one can say about it is not easy to say, but for good reason – it is because what happens on the upper line is the basis for what 92 happens on the lower line.

Even in something that is presented to us as being as primitive as Anna's dream, something indicates to us that the subject is not simply constituted in the sentence and by the sentence; whereas, when an individual, crowd, or mob cries "[Give us] bread!" the whole weight of the message bears upon the sender. The latter is the dominant element and this cry suffices, all by itself, in the forms that I just mentioned, to constitute this sender as a subject who is truly unique, even if he has a hundred or a thousand mouths. He need not announce himself – the sentence announces him adequately.

By way of contrast, when a human subject operates with language, he counts himself, and that is even his initial position. I am not sure if you remember a certain test Binet came up with, designed to shed light on difficulties subjects have going beyond a certain stage, which I personally find far more suggestive than the stages mentioned by Piaget. I will not tell you what stage it is because I do not want to go into detail here, but it seems to be distinctive and consists in the fact that the subject realizes that there is something fishy in the sentence, "I have three brothers, Paul, Ernest, and me."

This [kind of construction] seems quite natural to the child up until a rather advanced age, and for the best reason imaginable, because it truly captures the human subject's involvement in the act of speech – he counts himself therein, he names himself therein. It is thus the most natural and the most coordinated form of expression, so to speak. It is simply that the child has not yet found the correct formulation, "There are three brothers in my family: Paul, Ernest, and me." But we should certainly not feel obliged to reproach him for this, given the ambiguities of the function of being and having. It is clear that a step must be taken in order for a distinction to be made between the I qua subject of the statement [l'énoncé] and the I qua subject of enunciation [or: enunciating subject], for that is what is involved here.

When we take the next step, we say that what is articulated on the lower line is the process of the statement [le procès de l'énoncé]. In the dream we talked about last time, what is stated is that "He is dead."

Let me observe in passing that everything that is novel about the dimension that speech introduces into the world is already implied in this statement. "He is dead" means absolutely nothing in any perspective other than that of speaking. "He is dead" means "He 93 no longer exists." One need not say it since he is already no longer there. In order for us to say "He is dead," he must have been a being who was underpinned by speech.

We do not expect anyone to realize that, of course; but we do expect people to realize that the act of enunciating the statement "He is dead" commonly requires that we have at our disposal in discourse itself all sorts of landmarks [repères] that are distinguished from landmarks derived from the statement of the process [l'énoncé du procès]. If what I am saying here were not obvious, all of grammar would evaporate.

For the time being, I am simply getting you to note the need to use the future perfect, inasmuch as there are two temporal landmarks. One of them concerns the act that will be involved – for example, in the statement "At such and such a time, I will have become her husband"; this is the landmark of the I that will be transformed by marriage. Nevertheless, since you express it in the future perfect tense, there is a second temporal landmark: the current point from which you are speaking, which situates [repère] you as the I in the act of enunciation. There are thus two subjects – that is, two *I*s.

The stage that the child must reach in Binet's test – namely, the distinction between these two *I*s – seems to me to have literally nothing to do with the well-known reduction to reciprocity that Piaget makes into the pivotal point of the child's ability to use personal pronouns. But let us leave this aside for the time being.

We have thus begun to grasp these two [horizontal] lines as representing what is related to the enunciation process, on the one hand, and what is related to the process of the statement, on the other.

There are two lines, but that is not because each one represents a specific function. We encounter a twofold structure whenever language functions are involved.

Let us say, moreover, not only that there are two of them, but that they will always have opposite structures, the one being discontinuous while the other is continuous, and conversely.

Where is Anna Freud's articulation situated?

94 I am not developing this topology in order to simply give you the answer. I mean, I am not going to declare right from the outset "it is here or there" because it suits me or even because I might see a bit more than you do, since I am the one who constructed this thing and I know where I am going with it. If I have formulated this question, it is because the question arises of what this articulation represents, which is the guise in which the reality of Anna Freud's dream presents itself to us.

This child was quite capable of perceiving the meaning of what her nurse said. Whether true or false, Freud implies this. Freud assumes it to be true, and rightly so, of course, because a nineteen-month-old child very clearly understands when her nurse is about to make life difficult for her.

What she enunciates in her dream is articulated in a form that I called flocculated. Signifiers follow one another in a certain order, but this order takes the form of a piling up. These signifiers are superimposed on each other, as it were, in the form of a column. They replace each other, like so many metaphors for each other. What we need to bring out here is the reality of the satisfaction qua interdicted.

We will not go any further with Anna Freud's dream. Since the topology of repression is involved in it, we will take the next step now by asking ourselves how what we are beginning to articulate allows us to clarify what is at stake in an adult's dream. What is the true difference between the form taken by the child's desire in Anna Freud's dream and the form taken by an adult's dream? The latter is assuredly more complicated since it is going to give us far more trouble, at least as regards its interpretation.

What Freud says on this score is in no way ambiguous – it suffices to read what he says. The function of what intervenes is akin to censorship. Censorship operates exactly as I illustrated it in the course of my previous Seminars. I am not sure if you recall the well-known story we liked so much, that of the typist caught up in the Irish revolution who said, "If the King of England were an idiot, then all would be permitted." I gave you a different explanation of it, based on what we find in Freud's work regarding punishment dreams. Specifically, we assumed the existence of a law stipulating that "Whoever shall say that the King of England is an idiot will have his head cut off," and I proposed we imagine that the next night I dream 95 that I have my head cut off.

There are still simpler forms that Freud also articulates. Since for some time now people have managed to get me to read the Tintin comic books, I will borrow an example from him. In a Tintinesque vein, I can evade the censorship in another manner: I can articulate out loud, "Whoever says that General Tapioca is no better than General Alcazar will have to deal with me." If I articulate something like that, it is clear that neither General Tapioca's supporters nor General Alcazar's supporters will be satisfied, and, what is more surprising still, those who support both of them will be the least satisfied.

Freud explains this very precisely: what is said places us before a highly peculiar difficulty which, at the same time, opens up very specific possibilities. Here is what is quite simply at stake.

What a child has to deal with is an interdiction, a no-saying [or: saying no, dit que non] – shaped by some principle of censorship and by the entire process of education – in other words, he has to deal with an operation on the signifier that makes it into something unspeakable. Yet the signifier is spoken, which assumes that the subject realizes that the no-saying remains said even if it is not executed. The upshot is that "doing but not saying" is distinct from "obeying and not doing."

Stated otherwise, the truth of desire is in and of itself an offense against the authority of the law. Thus the possible outcome of this new drama is to censure the truth of desire. But, censorship, however it operates, is not something that can be sustained with the stroke of a pen, because it is the enunciation process that is targeted.

To stop a statement from being enunciated, some pre-knowledge of the process of the statement is necessary. All discourse that is designed to banish this statement from the enunciation process is thus going to find itself more or less seriously at odds with its goal. The matrix of this impossibility is presented in the upper line of our graph – and it will provide us with plenty of other matrices. The fact that a subject articulates his demand means that he is caught up in a discourse in which he himself cannot help but be constructed 96 as an agent of enunciation, and this is why he cannot give up this statement, because he would thereby efface himself as a subject who knows what is at stake.

The relationship between these two lines that represent the enunciation process and the statement process is quite simple: it is the whole of grammar. If you like, I can tell you where and how, in what terms and in which tables, this has been articulated within the framework of a rational grammar. But for the time being, what we are dealing with is the following: Repression, when it arises, is essentially linked to something that appears to be absolutely necessary – namely, that the subject be effaced and disappear at the level of the enunciation process.

How and by what empirical pathways does the subject accede to this possibility? It is altogether impossible even to articulate it if we do not grasp the nature of the enunciation process.

As I have said, all speech begins from the intersection that I situate at point A on the graph. In other words, all speech [or every word, toute parole], insofar as the subject is implicated in it, is the Other's discourse [discours de l'Autre]. It is for this exact reason that children initially believe that all of their thoughts are known to others.

As opposed to the definition given by psychologists, thought is not a first sketch of action. Thought is first and foremost something that is part and parcel of the dimension of the unsaid [non-dit] that I have just introduced by way of the distinction between the enunciation process and the statement process. But, of course, in order for something unsaid to be unsaid, one must speak. In order for the unsaid to subsist, it must be spoken at the level of the enunciation process – that is, qua the Other's discourse. This is why children do not doubt for a single instant that those who represent for them the locus in which this discourse resides – that is, their parents – know their thoughts.

This is, in any case, their first impression. It persists as long as something new has not been introduced, which we have not yet articulated here, concerning the relation between the upper line and the lower line – namely, what, apart from grammar, keeps them at a certain distance from each other.

I have no need to tell you how grammar keeps us at a distance in sentences like "I do not know if he is dead," "He is not dead as far as I know," "I have not heard he was dead," and "I am afraid he is dead" [C'est la crainte qu'il fût mort]. All of these subtle taxemes, 97 which run the gamut from the subjunctive to a ne that Le Bidois calls, in a way that is truly incredible for a philologist who writes for the Le Monde newspaper, "the expletive ne" – all of this is designed to show us that a whole part of grammar, the essential part, the taxemes, are designed to maintain a necessary distance between the two lines.

Next time, I will situate the articulations at stake here on these two lines. For a subject who has not yet learned these subtle forms [of expression], the distinction between the two lines comes well before. Certain conditions are required to reach this goal, which form the basis of the investigation that I am engaging in today. I would simply say that whenever the distinction between the two lines is based on the difference of tense [temps], which is not simply a temporal landmark, but a tension-related landmark, you can see the relationship that exists between this and the topology of desire.

This is where we are at. For a while, children are, in short, entirely caught up in the play of these two lines. What does it take here to bring about repression?

I hesitate to do something which, after all, I would not want to appear as it in fact is – making concessions. This involves appealing to notions of development. I would say that in the empirical process at the level at which repression occurs, an intervention, accident, or impact of an empirical kind is certainly necessary – but the necessity with which this empirical impact reverberates, the necessity that this empirical impact precipitates in its form, is of another nature.

Whatever the case may be, at a certain moment a child perceives that the adults who were supposed to know all his thoughts actually don't. This assumes that he not take the step, at least not immediately, of entering into the fundamental possibility of what I will briefly and rapidly designate as the so-called mental form of hallucination. In the latter, we see the primitive structure of what I will call the backdrop of the enunciation process – parallel to the ongoing statement of existence – which is known as the echo of actions, the echo of explicit thoughts.

The fact remains that if a Verwerfung [foreclosure] has not 98 occurred, the child perceives at a certain moment that the adult who supposedly knows all his thoughts doesn't in the slightest. The adult actually does not know – whether in a dream "He knows he is dead" or "He does not know he is dead." Next time, we shall see the exemplary signification of this relationship in this case. We need not for the time being link these two terms, knowledge and death, for the reason that we have not yet gone far enough in formulating what will be targeted by repression.

What is the fundamental possibility of what can but be the goal of this repression, assuming it is successful?

It is not simply that it assigns the sign "no" to the unsaid, which says that the unsaid is not said, all the while leaving it said. If the unsaid involved in repression is truly such a thing, there is no doubt that the kind of negation that is at work here is so primordial that Freud situates Verneinung [negation] – which nevertheless appears to be one of the most elaborate forms of repression in the subject, since we find it in subjects with a high psychological efflorescence – right after the earliest Bejahung [affirmation]. You will observe that it is thus true that he proceeds, as I am doing for the time being, by means of a possibility – and even by means of a deduction – that is logical, rather than pointing to its genesis at a specific moment in time [génétique].

The earliest negation is what I am in the process of talking to you about regarding the unsaid. The next step is "He does not know," by means of which the Other, who is the locus of my speech, becomes the dwelling place of my thoughts; and by means of which the subject's Unbewusste [unconscious] can be established, into which the content of repression will enter.

Do not ask me to go any further or any more quickly here than I am already going. Although I tell you that the subject proceeds by following the example of this Other in order for the repression process [processus du refoulé] to be inaugurated in him, I never said that it was an easy example to follow. Moreover, I have already indicated that there is more than one mode of negation, since I mentioned in this regard Verwerfung [foreclosure] and I also mentioned Verneinung [negation] again. I will rearticulate the latter next time.

Verdrängung, repression, cannot be such an easy operation to bring about, since what it involves in essence is that the subject be effaced. As regards repression, it easily comes to the child's attention that the others, the adults, know nothing. Naturally, a subject who comes into existence does not know that, if the adults know nothing, 99 it is, as we all know, because they have had all kinds of experiences involving repression. A subject knows nothing of this, and it is not an easy task for him to imitate them. For a subject to hide himself qua subject requires a form of sleight of hand that is rather trickier than many others I am led to present to you here.

There are three ways in which the subject can perform this trick: through Verwerfung [foreclosure], Verneinung [negation], and Verdrängung [repression].

Verdrängung involves the following: in order to mark what must be made to disappear as unsaid, in a way that is at least possible if not durable, the subject operates by the pathway of the signifier; he operates on the signifier. This is why, regarding the dream about the dead father that I mentioned last time – around which we continue to dance here even if I did not actually get back to it in today's class – Freud articulates that repression bears essentially on the elision of two clausulae, namely, "nach seinem Wunsch" and "daß er [der Träumer] es wünschte."

At its origin or root, repression, as it is presented in Freud's work, cannot be articulated otherwise than as bearing on the signifier.

We did not take a major step today, but we nevertheless took an additional step.

This step will allow us to see what sort of signifiers the operation of repression comes to bear on, for not all signifiers can be equally damaged, repressed, or rendered fragile.

It is of essential importance that we were already able to see that repression bears on what I called two clausulae, for this will put us in a good position to designate what is at stake, strictly speaking, when we talk, first, about the desire in a dream, and then about desire tout court.

V

THE DREAM ABOUT THE DEAD FATHER: "AS HE WISHED"

The foreclusive and the discordant
The subject's vacillation when faced with the object of desire "To be a beautiful blonde and popular, too . . ."
The dream laid out on the graph
Death, pain, castration, and necessity

At the point at which I left you last time, you could already see that I was tending to broach our topic, desire and its interpretation, by means of a certain ordination of signifying structure.

I showed you that what is enunciated in the signifier involves an internal split [duplicité] between the process of the statement and the process of the act of enunciation.

I emphasized the difference between the I of the statement and the I of enunciation. The former is involved in every statement insofar as, like any other [subject], it is the subject of a stated process, for example, which is moreover not the only mode of statement. The latter is involved in any and every enunciation, but especially when it announces itself as the I of enunciation.

The way in which this I announces itself is not unimportant. In little Anna Freud's dream, it announces itself by naming itself at the beginning of the dream's message. I indicated to you that something ambiguous remained there – is this I, qua I of enunciation, authenticated at that moment, or not? I am hinting that it is not yet authenticated, which is what accounts for the distinction Freud makes between the desire in a child's dream and the desire in an adult's dream.

In children, something has not yet been completed, precipitated by the structure, or distinguished in the structure. I showed you the 102 reflection and trace of this something, an undoubtedly late trace, in a psychological test. Although the clearly defined conditions of the experiment do not allow us to judge in advance what the situation is for the subject at his core, it appears that the difficulty distinguishing between the I of enunciation and the I of the statement lasts a long time, going so far as to manifest itself in a form of fumbling that occurs during a test that chance and psychological flair made Binet point out, "I have three brothers, Paul, Ernest, and me," where we see that the subject does not yet know how to "uncount" himself.

The trace that I pointed out is an index – there are others too – of the element that is essential to the subject, which is constituted by the difference between the I of enunciation and the I of the statement. As I told you, we are not taking things up by way of deduction, but by a pathway about which I cannot say that it is empirical, since it was already traced out and constructed by Freud.

Freud tells us that the desire in an adult's dream is a borrowed desire, which is the mark of repression, a repression he characterizes at this level as [an instance of] censorship. What does he emphasize when he takes up the mechanism of censorship? He emphasizes the impossibilities of this censorship, and it is in this sense that he shows us what censorship is. I was trying to get you to dwell for a moment on this point by showing you the type of contradiction in terms implicit in anything that is unsaid at the level of enunciation, I mean the self-contradictory nature of a formulation like, "I am not saying that . . ."

Last time, I tried to convey this to you in various funny forms: "Anyone who says such and such about so and so whose speech must be respected, who must not be offended, will have to deal with me!" What does this mean, if not that in taking this obviously ironic stand, I find myself proffering exactly what one must not say?

Freud himself often highlighted how frequently dreams adopt this path – namely, that what they articulate as not being supposed to be said is [est] precisely what they have to say, and is that by which what is effectively said in the dreams transits.

As this formulation "I am not saying that . . ." brings us to something that is connected with the signifier's deepest structure, I would like to dwell on it further before taking an additional step.

It is no accident that Freud makes Verneinung [negation], in the article he devotes to it, into the mainspring and the very root of the most primitive phase in which the subject is constituted as such, and is specifically constituted as unconscious.

A question thus begins to arise for us regarding the relation between Verneinung and the earliest Bejahung [affirmation] – that is to say, between Verneinung and a signifier's access to the dimension of questions, for that is what a Bejahung is.

What is inscribed at the earliest [plus primitif] level? Is it, for example, the coupled terms "good" and "bad"? You are aware of the role this couple, which is clearly very early, has played in certain psychoanalytic approaches. To choose one or another of such primitive terms, or to refuse to do so, is already to opt for an entire orientation of one's analytic thinking.

I am dwelling on the function of the ne [not] in the formulation "I am not saying . . . [Je ne dis pas . . .]" because I believe that it is the essential articulation. By saying that one is not saying something, one says it. This makes clear, through a sort of reductio ad absurdum, what I have already pointed out to you as the most radical property, as it were, of the signifier.

If you recall, I already tried to direct you down the pathway of an exemplary image that showed the relationship between the signifier and a certain type of index or sign that I called a trace, that the signifier itself already bears, which is the mark of some sort of flip side of the stamp of the real.

I spoke to you about Robinson Crusoe and the trace of Friday's footstep [Seminar III, p. 167]. Is that trace already a signifier? I told you that the signifier begins not with a trace, but with the fact that one effaces the trace. Nevertheless, an effaced trace does not a signifier make. What inaugurates the signifier is the fact that it is posited as capable of being effaced. Stated otherwise, Robinson Crusoe effaces the trace of Friday's footstep, but what does he put in its place? If he wishes to remember where Friday's foot was, at the very least he makes a cross at that spot – in other words, a bar [or: line, barre] and another bar on top of that one. This is what specifies the signifier.

104 The signifier presents itself both as being able to be effaced and as being able, in the very operation of effacement, to subsist as such. I mean that the signifier presents itself as already endowed with the properties characteristic of the unsaid. With my bar, I cancel out the signifier, but I also perpetuate it indefinitely, inaugurating the dimension of the signifier as such. To make a cross is to do something that, strictly speaking, does not exist in any form of mapping available to animals.

We must not believe that nonspeaking beings, such as animals, map nothing, but they do not intentionally leave traces of traces with something that is said [avec le dit]. When we have time, we will turn to the mores of the hippopotamus, and we will see what he deliberately leaves on his tracks for his fellow creatures. What man leaves behind him is a signifier, a cross, a bar qua barred.

One bar is covered over by another bar, indicating that it is, as such, effaced. The function of the no of the no [or the no's no, non du non], insofar as it is a signifier that cancels itself out, in and of itself warrants a very long discussion. Logicians, who are always overly psychological in bent, have, strangely enough, left aside the earliest facet of negation in the formulations and classifications of it that they have provided.

You may or may not know what the different modes of negation are. I do not intend, after all, to tell you everything that can be articulated about this concept as regards what distinguishes the meaning of negation from privation, and so on. We must rely on the phenomenon of speaking, linguistic experience, to find what is earlier than all of that and more important to us. I will focus on that alone.

I cannot avoid turning here, at least momentarily, to research that has an experiential value – namely, the research that was done by Édouard Pichon, who was, as you know, one of our elder psychoanalysts, and who died at the beginning of the war from a serious heart condition. Pichon perceived something regarding negation and he made a distinction of which you should at least have a little glimpse, notion, or idea.

It was in his capacity as a logician that he made this distinction, 105 but he manifestly wanted to be a psychologist and he wrote that what he was doing was exploring the realm that runs Des Mots à la pensée, from words to thought – like so many others, he was quite capable of deluding himself. Luckily for us, what is weakest in his work is the claim that he is working upward from words to thought. But he turned out to be an admirable observer of linguistic usage. I mean that he had a feeling for the stuff of language which was such that he taught us a great deal more about words than about thought.

He dwelled especially on the use of negation in French, and in this realm he could not avoid making a discovery that he formulated with the distinction between the "foreclusive" and the "discordant." I will immediately give you some examples of this.

Let us consider a sentence like, Il n'y a personne ici [No one is here, or There is no one here]. This is foreclusive – it is ruled out for the time being that there is anyone here. Regarding this, Pichon pointed out that whenever you are dealing with a pure and simple foreclosure, French always employs two terms: a ne, and secondly something that is represented here by the word personne, but that can be represented by other words like pas and rien, as in Je n'ai pas où loger ["I have no place to stay"] and Je n'ai rien à vous dire ["I have nothing to say to you"].

Moreover, he observed that there is a very large number of uses of ne, and they are the most indicative – they are, as usual, those that pose the most paradoxical problems – in which it appears all alone. A ne all alone is never, or almost never, used to indicate pure and simple negation, which is the kind of negation that in German is incarnated in the word nicht and in English in the word not. By itself, ne, when it is left to its own devices, expresses what Pichon called discordance. Now this discordance is situated precisely in between the enunciation process and the statement process.

I am going to discuss the example on which Pichon dwelled the most, for it is especially illustrative. It is the use of ne that people who understand nothing – in other words, people who want to understand – call the "expletive ne." I mentioned this last time, when I referred to an article in Le Monde that had struck me as slightly scandalous as regards this so-called expletive ne.

This ne, which is altogether essential to the use of the French language, is the one that is found in sentences like Je crains qu'il 106 ne vienne. Everyone knows that it means Je crains qu'il vienne [I am afraid he is coming] and not Je crains qu'il ne vienne pas [I am afraid he is not coming], but in French this is how you say it. In other words, at this point in its linguistic usage, French grasps the ne somewhere at the level of its wandering, as it were, as it descends from the enunciation process to the statement process.

At the level of enunciation, negation concerns the very articulation of the signifier, the pure and simple signifier said to be in action [or: at work, en acte]. It is the negation in Je ne dis pas que . . . – for example, Je ne dis pas que je suis ta femme [I am not saying that I am your wife]. At the level of the statement, it becomes the following negation: Je ne suis pas ta femme [I am not your wife].

We are obviously not here to explore the genesis of language, but something related to it is implied in psychoanalytic practice. Freud's articulation of negation implies, in any case, that negation descends from enunciation to the statement. Why should we be astonished by this? For, after all, every negation in statements involves a certain paradox, since it posits something in order to posit it at the same time as nonexistent – well, at least in a certain number of cases.

The level at which discordances are introduced is situated somewhere between enunciation and statement. Since some aspect of my fear precedes the fact that he is coming, since I am hoping he will not come, can I do otherwise than articulate Je crains qu'il ne vienne? In passing, this grabs ahold, as it were, of the discordant ne that is distinguished from the foreclusive ne in the realm of negation.

You will tell me, "This phenomenon is peculiar to the French language alone. You yourself said so earlier when you mentioned the term nicht in German and the term not in English." Quite so. But that is not what is important.

In English, for example, we find traces in the articulation of the linguistic system of something analogous. I cannot bring this out here, as I am not here to give you a class on linguistics, but keep in mind that, in English, negation cannot be applied purely and simply to the verb that designates the process in statements. You do not say "I eat not,"* but rather "I do not eat."* In other words, for everything involving negation, statements are led to borrow a form that is based on the use of an auxiliary [verb], the auxiliary being typically what introduces the dimension of the subject into a statement, as in 107
"I don't eat,"* "I won't eat,"* or "I won't go."*

In French, Je n'irai pas [I won't go] merely expresses the fact that the subject will not go, whereas "I won't go"* implies a resolution on the subject's part not to go.

The fact that in English all pure and simple negation brings out something like an auxiliary dimension is the trace of something that links negation to the earliest position of enunciation in an essential manner.

Thus at the outset, the subject is constituted in the process of distinguishing between the I of enunciation and the I of the statement. In our last class, I began to articulate what comes next, the second time or stage.

That is what we will turn to now.

In order to show you by what route the subject enters into a dialectic involving the Other [la dialectique de l'Autre], insofar as this dialectic is imposed on him by the very structure of the difference between enunciation and statement, I have led you by a path that is not the only one possible, but that I deliberately made an empirical one – in other words, I have introduced the subject's real history into it.

The next step in this history is, as I told you, the dimension of "knowing nothing about it."

The subject puts it to the test against the backdrop of the idea that the Other knows all about his thoughts, since at the outset his thoughts are, by their very nature and structure, this Other's discourse. The discovery that the Other knows nothing about his thoughts, which is factually true, inaugurates the pathway by which the subject develops the opposite requirement that lies within the unsaid. From there, he will have to find the difficult path by which he must implement the unsaid in his being, going so far as to become the sort of being with which we deal – namely, a subject who has the dimension of the unconscious.

The essential step that psychoanalysis has us take in the experience of humanity is that – after many centuries in which philosophy has, I would say, entered obstinately and ever further into a discourse in which the subject is merely the correlate of the object in 108 the knowledge relationship, where he is what is presupposed by the knowledge of objects, where he is a sort of strange subject about which I said somewhere, I do not recall where, he could fill up philosophers' weekends, because the rest of the week (namely, during the workweek) everyone can naturally neglect altogether this subject who is in some sense but the shadow and underside [doublure] of objects – we analysts realized that something about this subject had been overlooked, namely, the fact that he speaks.

This is the case only from the moment at which we can no longer overlook him – that is, from the moment at which his domain as a subject who speaks stands on its own two feet, as it were, whether the subject is there or not. But what completely changes the nature of his relations to the object is the crucial thing known as desire.

It is in the field of desire that we try to articulate the relations between the subject and the object. These are relations involving desire, for it is in the field of desire that psychoanalytic experience teaches us that the subject must be articulated. The relationship between the subject and the object is not based on need; it is a complex relationship that I am trying to elucidate for you.

I will begin by quickly indicating that, inasmuch as the relationship between the subject and the object is situated in the field of desire, the object cannot be the correlate of, or something that merely corresponds to, one of the subject's needs. The object is something that props the subject up at the precise moment at which the subject has to face, as it were, his existence. The object is something that props him up in his existence in the most radical sense – namely, in the sense in which he exists in language. Otherwise stated, the object is something that is outside of him and whose true linguistic nature he can grasp only at the very moment at which he, as a subject, must be effaced, vanish, or disappear behind a signifier. At that moment, which is a moment of panic, so to speak, the subject must grab hold of something, and he grabs hold of the object qua object of desire.

Someone whom I will not name immediately today, in order not to create confusion, someone who is quite contemporary but is now dead, wrote somewhere: "To ascertain exactly what the miser whose treasure was stolen lost: thus we should learn much." This is exactly what we must learn, I mean learn for ourselves and teach to others.

Psychoanalysis is the first locus or dimension in which one can 109 ascertain this. Of course, in order to get you to grasp what I mean, I will have to find another example, a more noble example, because the miser is ridiculous – in other words, far too close to the unconscious for you to be able to bear it.

If I were to articulate it to you in the same terms that I used in speaking of existence earlier, in two minutes you would take me for an existentialist, which is not what I want. I will take an example from the film by Jean Renoir entitled La Règle du jeu [The Rules of the Game].

In this film there is a character played by Marcel Dalio, who is an old man – the kind we see in everyday life, in certain social circles, and we must not believe that he is limited to this particular social circle – who collects objects and especially music boxes. If you still remember the film, recall the moment at which, in front of quite a few people, Dalio comes across his latest find: an especially beautiful music box. At that moment the character is literally in a position which is one we can or rather must call shame [pudeur] – he turns red, effaces himself, disappears, and is very ill at ease. What he has shown, he has shown – but how could the onlookers understand that we are faced here with the precise point of oscillation that manifests itself to the highest degree in the subject's passion for the object he collects, which is one of the forms of the object of desire?

Is what the subject shows none other than the major point, the most intimate point of himself? No, for what is propped up by this object is precisely what the subject cannot reveal even to himself. It is something that is at the cusp of the greatest secret. It is in this direction that we must seek to figure out what the treasure chest is for the miser. Another step is certainly required here for us to move from the level of the collector to that of the miser. This is why misers can only be presented in comedic registers.

But this has already introduced us to what is at stake when the subject finds he has begun, starting at a certain moment, to articulate his wish insofar as it is secret. How does he express his wish here? This expression varies according to different languages, and according to the forms that are characteristic of each language to which I alluded last time. Different modes and registers have been 110 invented, which all strike different chords. Do not always lend credence to what grammarians say on this score – the subjunctive is not as subjunctive as it seems, and other verbal modes can express the type of wish in question here just as well.

I looked around for something that could illustrate this for you and, I do not know why, a little poem came back to me from the recesses of my memory, which I had some trouble reconstructing, and even resituating.

Être une belle fille blonde et populaire qui mette de la joie dans l'air et lorsqu'elle sourit donne de l'appétit aux ouvriers
de Saint-Denis.

[To be a beautiful blonde and popular, too, who brings joy to all and when she smiles makes the workers in Saint-Denis horny.]

This was written by a contemporary of ours, a discrete poetess. She happens to be petite and black, and undoubtedly expresses, in her nostalgia for making the workers in Saint-Denis horny, something that can be rather strongly tied to some stray moment of her ideological reveries. But we cannot say that such is her usual occupation.

I would like to get you to dwell on this phenomenon, this poetic phenomenon, for a moment, because we find here first of all something that is quite important as concerns temporal structure.

We have here what is perhaps the pure form, I am not saying of a wish [voeu], but of what is wished for [souhaité] – that is to say, of what in a wish is enunciated as wished for. As you see, what is wished for presents itself here in the infinitive tense, and the primitive subject seems to be elided here. But this does not mean anything – in reality she is not in the least bit elided. By entering into the structure in order to map the position of what is articulated here, we see that this articulation is situated before the subject and determines her retroactively. We are not talking here either about a pure and simple aspiration or a regret, but rather about an articulation that is positioned before the subject as retroactively determining her to be a certain type of being.

111 This doesn't mean much. The fact remains that what is wished for is articulated in this way. We have here something that we have reason to remember when we seek to give meaning to the sentence with which The Interpretation of Dreams ends: "Indestructible desire models the present on the image of the past." We immediately chalk up what this sentence, whose purring we hear, says to repetition or ex post facto action; but is this so very clear if we examine it closely? If indestructible desire models the present on the image of the past, it is perhaps because, like the proverbial carrot held out in front of the donkey, it is always in front of the subject and always retroactively produces the same effects.

Once we have indicated the structural characteristics of this statement, we are simultaneously confronted with its ambiguity. After all, the gratuitous characteristic, as it were, of this enunciation does not fail to have certain consequences, which nothing stops us from exploring. Hence the following remark.

Having gone back to the text [of the poem], I saw that it was entitled, as if by chance, Voeux secrets [Secret wishes]. This is thus what I retrieved from my memory when, some twenty-five or thirty years after reading it, I was looking for something that would bring us to the secret of wishes. This secret wish is poetically expressed – that is, it is, of course, communicated. And this is the whole problem – how to communicate to others something that has been constituted as a secret? Answer: through some sort of lie.

In fact, to us, and we are a bit cleverer than others are, this can in the final analysis be translated by saying, "True as it is that I am a beautiful blonde and popular, too, I desire to bring joy to all and make the workers in Saint-Denis horny." Now, it is not clear or self-evident that every being, no matter how generous or poetic or a poetess, has such a strong desire to bring joy to all. After all, why bring joy to all? Why if not in fantasy and in order to demonstrate to what degree the object of fantasy is metonymic? Joy therefore circulates here like a metonymy.

As for the workers in Saint-Denis, they take a lot. Let them divide it up among themselves. In any case, there are enough of them that we would not know which one of them to turn to.

In this digression, I have introduced the structure of wishes to you by the pathway of poetry. We can now enter into it by the pathway of serious things – I mean by locating the actual role that is played in it by desire. 112

We have seen, as we should have expected, that desire has to find its place somewhere on the graph between, on the one hand, the point from which we began when we said that the subject is alienated there [A], inasmuch as he must enter into the defiles of the signifier – in other words, essentially the alienation of the appeal [to the Other], that related to need – and, on the other hand, the beyond in which the dimension of the unsaid is introduced as essential.

The dream that I selected, the one involving the dead father, will allow us to show how and where desire is articulated.

This dream is assuredly among the most problematic, insofar as it is a dream in which a dead man appears. The appearance of dead people in dreams is far from having revealed its secret to us, even if Freud talked a good deal about it already – see page 433 of the German edition [SE V, p. 431]. Throughout his analysis of dreams in the Traumdeutung, Freud never stopped emphasizing the profound ambivalence of feelings we have about those we love and respect, this having been his first take on the psychology of the unconscious. He broached this topic anew regarding the dream about the dead father, which I selected in order to begin to try to spell out for you the function of desire in dreams.

I remarked last time that we always forget what is in the Traumdeutung. Having decided for various reasons to reread the first edition of it, I realized that I had forgotten that this dream was only added in 1930. More precisely, it was first added as a footnote shortly after its publication in the Sammlung kleiner Schriften zur Neurosenlehre, 1913, volume 3, page 271 of the second edition, and it was moved into the text in the 1930 edition. Since then it has thus been in the main body of the Traumdeutung.

I will indicate once again how this dream goes. The dreamer sees his father appear before him, a father whom he has just lost after a long, drawn-out, and tormenting illness. The dreamer sees his father 113 in front of him and is "penetrated," as Freud tells us, with profound pain at the thought that his father is dead and "did not know it." Freud emphasizes the absurd resonance of this formulation and he tells us that it can be understood if we add that the father was dead "as he [i.e., the son] wished." In short, "he did not know" that it was "as he wished" that "he was dead."

These are the elements that I must thus situate on the different levels of the graph. We will try to verify this in detail at the experiential level.

I will place "he did not know" on the lower line, insofar as it is essentially related to the dimension of the constitution of the subject. It is, in effect, on the basis of a useless "he did not know" that the subject must situate himself, and it is precisely here that he must constitute himself as not knowing, for it is the only exit offered to him in order for what is not said to actually take on the import of the unsaid.

"He did not know" is situated at the level of the statement, but it is clear that no statement of this type can be made, if it is not

propped up by an underlying enunciation. Indeed, "he was dead" means absolutely nothing to a being who does not speak. We have 114 proof thereof. I would go even further – this is continually shown by the immediate indifference that most animals manifest to the remains or cadavers of their fellow beings once they are cadavers.

An animal can, no doubt, be attached to the deceased. People talk about dogs being so attached. But it should be pointed out that dogs are exceptions in the sense that, although they do not have an unconscious, they have a superego. Stated otherwise, [to be attached to a dead being] it is necessary that something come into play that allows for the emergence of something along the lines of signifying articulation. But let us leave that aside.

"He was dead" already assumes that the subject has entered into something like existence. Existence here is nothing other than the fact that a subject, from the moment at which he is posited in the signifier, can no longer destroy himself; he enters into this intolerable sequence that immediately unfolds for him in the imaginary, and which is such that he can no longer conceive of himself except as forever re-emerging in existence.

This is not a philosophical construction. I have been able to observe it in those whom we call patients. It was, I remember, one of the turning points of the inner experience of a female patient of mine when, in a certain dream – which did not arrive at just any old moment in her analysis, naturally – she alighted upon something that was apprehended and experienced in a dream, which was nothing other than a sort of pure feeling of existence. It was the sense of existing, as it were, in an indefinite way. And from the heart of this existence a new existence continually re-emerged for her – for her innermost intuition, so to speak – a new existence that extended as far as the eye could see. Existence was apprehended and felt by her to be something that, by its very nature, is extinguished only to re-emerge forever further on, and this was accompanied in her by intolerable pain.

This is quite close to what the content of the dream [about the dead father] brings us. For the person who has the dream is the dreamer. It is always good to keep this in mind when we talk about the characters in a dream. Here, as the dream is that of a son, the question of what we call identification arises especially easily. We have no need for dialectic to think that there is some identificatory relationship between the subject and his own dreamlike fancies [fantaisies de rêve].

What do we see here? We have a dreamer, in pain of the most pro-115 found kind, standing before his father. And we have a father who does not know he is dead, or more precisely – for we must consider the verb tense in which the subject apprehends and communicates it to us – il ne savait pas ["he did not know"].

I am emphasizing this point without being able to emphasize it maximally for the time being. The rule that guides me here is to proscribe half-baked formulations and to always strive not to give you approximations. But as, on the other hand, I cannot give precise formulations from the outset, this leads me at times to be less than clear, and in any case naturally leaves certain doors open.

As for dreams, it is important that we remember the way in which they are communicated to us. It is always by a statement. A dreamer recounts what to us? Another statement, but it is not at all adequate to say that. He presents this other statement to us as an enunciation.

Indeed, if a dreamer tells us a dream, it is for an entirely different reason than for the statement he recounts to us. It is in order for us to seek its key or meaning – that is to say, in order for us to figure out what it means. From this vantage point, the fact that "he did not know" – which is inscribed on the graph at the first level of the split – is said in the imperfect tense takes on great importance.

For those who are interested in the relationship between a dream and the speech by which we become cognizant of it, let us continue and see how things break down.

What do we find on the side of what is presented in the dream as the subject? We find an affect: pain. Pain related to what? To the fact "that [his father] was dead." What corresponds to this pain on the father's side is "he did not know." He did not know what? The same thing, "that he was dead." By way of a complement, I would add "as he wished."

THE SUBJECT'S SIDE	THE FATHER'S SIDE
pain	he did not know
(owing to the fact) that he was dead	that he was dead as he wished

Figure 5.2: Distribution of the four elements between the two characters in the dream

When Freud tells us that the meaning, and implicitly the interpretation, of the dream is found in "as he wished," it all seems quite simple. Yet I have indicated that it is not quite so simple. But what does this mean? If we are at the level of the signifier, as Freud formally indicates – not just in this passage, but also in the one about repression that I asked you to reread – you must immediately see that we can make more than one use of "as he wished." 116

Where does "he was dead as [the dreamer] wished" take us? It seems to me that some of you at least can recall the point to which I once led you in discussing the story of Oedipus.

Recall that, after having exhausted in every form the pathway of desire, insofar as it is not known to the subject, and suffering the effect of punishment – for what crime? for no other crime than that of having existed in this desire – Oedipus finds himself led to a point where he can proffer no other exclamation than me phúnai, "Never to have been born," where existence, having arrived at the extinction of his desire, ends up. Well, the pain that the dreamer feels in the dream – let us not forget that he is someone about whom we know nothing other than the immediately prior fact that he witnessed his father's demise in the course of a long illness – is close, in experience, to the pain of existence when nothing any longer inhabits it other than existence itself, and that everything, when suffering is excessive, tends to abolish a term that cannot be uprooted: the desire to live.

If the pain of existing after desire had dried up was experienced by someone, it was no doubt by he who was far from being a stranger to the dreamer – namely, his father. But what is certain, in any case, is that the dreamer knew about this pain. We will never know if he who felt this pain in the real knew or did not know the meaning of the pain, but what is clear is that the dreamer does not know what he is taking on, which is the pain itself. He does not know it in the dream, of course – nor, quite surely, outside of the dream – before interpretation leads us there.

117 The proof thereof is that in the dream he can only articulate this pain in a way that, in his relation to the other, is both faithful and cynical, and takes an absurd form. What does this form correspond to? If we turn back to the short section in the Traumdeutung that discusses absurd dreams [SE V, pp. 426–45], we see that the impression of absurdity, which is often linked in dreams to a sort of contradiction that is linked to the structure of the unconscious itself, can lead to something laughable, but that in certain cases absurdity is introduced to express a particularly violent repudiation of the designated meaning. Freud says this quite specifically regarding this dream, and it confirms what I was trying to articulate for you here even before having reread the passage.

What does "he did not know" mean? It assuredly means that the dreamer can see that his father did not know the dreamer's wish – his wish that his father die in order to be done with his suffering. In other words, at this level, the dreamer is cognizant of his own wish. He can see – or not see, it all depends on what point he is at in his analysis – that, in the past, he himself had wished his father would die, although not for the sake of his father, but of the son, his rival.

But there is something that he cannot see at all at the point he is at, which is that he has taken on his father's pain without knowing it. He cannot see, moreover, that it is absolutely necessary for him to keep situating ignorance across from him [i.e., outside of himself] – in the father as a character in the dream, that is, in the object, in the form "he did not know" – in order not to know that it would have been better to have never been born. If there is nothing at the end of existence but the pain of existing, it would be so much better to take that pain as though it were the other's [l'assumer comme celle de l'autre] – as though it were that of the other who is there, and who continues to speak, just like I, the dreamer, continue to speak.

That would be far preferable than to see the final mystery revealed, which is the most secret content of this wish. What is it in the final analysis? We have no element of it in the dream itself, we know it only through our knowledge of analytic experience. Its secret content is the wish for the father's castration – in other words, the wish par excellence which, at the moment of the father's death, is reflected back onto the son because it is his turn to be castrated. This he must not see at any cost.

Although I am not, for the time being, in the process of detail-118 ing the terms and stages by which to lay out the interpretation [of this dream], it is easy to show on the graph that a first interpretation can immediately be made at the lower level, at the level of the continuous line on which are inscribed the dreamer's words "he did not know." This would be a remark of the type: "In your dream, your father has no pain, since, as you wished, he did not know you had enunciated this wish." This would be all fine and well, but on condition that the analyst already include in this remark something problematic that would be such as to make emerge from the unconscious what had up until then been repressed and discontinuous at the upper level – namely, that "[his father had been] dead" already for a long time "as he wished," as in his Oedipal wish.

However, the point now is to give its full import to what, as we saw earlier, goes well beyond this wish.

In effect, the wish to castrate the father, which is reflected back on the dreamer, has an import that goes beyond any and all justifiable desire. This wish here is but the mask of what is most profound in the structure of desire as it is revealed in the dream – namely, the structuring, signifying necessity that prohibits the dreamer from escaping from the concatenation of existence insofar as it is determined by the nature of the signifier. This necessary sequence is not expressed by "his wish"; it is expressed by nothing other than the essence of selon [as, in selon son voeu, as he wished].

In the end, Verdrängung rests entirely on the problematic of the subject's effacement, which is, in this case, his saving grace, at this final point where the subject is doomed to a final ignorance. This is the meaning I tried to convey to you at the very end of our last class. The mainspring of Verdrängung is not the repression of something full that is discovered, seen, and understood, but rather the elision of a pure and simple signifier, that being nach or selon – the elision of what serves as the signature of the agreement or discordance, the agreement or discord between enunciation and the signifier, the relationship between what lies in the statement and what lies in the necessities of enunciation. Everything revolves around the elision of a clausula – that is, of a pure and simple signifier.

In the final analysis, what is manifested in the desire in the dream is the following: "he did not know." What does that thus mean, in the absence of any other signification that we have within our grasp?

We will see it when we take up the dream of someone we know better, namely Freud. Next time we will take up a dream that is quite 119 close to this one in the Traumdeutung – the dream in which Freud sees his father again in the guise of Garibaldi [SE V, pp. 427–9, 447–8, 478]. We will go further with that one, and we will see what Freud's desire truly is. Those who reproach me for not making enough of anal eroticism will be repaid in spades.

For the time being, let us stick to the dream about the dead father.

This schematic dream figures the dreamer's confrontation with death. But the shade who is summoned up by the dream makes his mortal meaning fall away. What, indeed, does the appearance of a dead man mean, if not that the dreamer is not dead, because he can suffer in the dead man's stead?

But that is not all. Behind this suffering there lies a lure, the only one the subject can still hold onto at this crucial moment. And what is it? It is the lure of his rival, the lure of killing the father, the lure of imaginary fixation.

We will pick it up there next time, for I believe that, with what I have said today, I have sufficiently paved the way for the elucidation of the constant formula of fantasy in the unconscious: barred S, lozenge, little a ($◊a).

The subject, insofar as he is barred, canceled out, and abolished by the action of the signifier, finds his prop in the other who, for the speaking subject, is what defines the object as such. We will try to identify this other, who is the prevalent object of human eroticism.

In fact, we will identify him very quickly. Those who attended the first year of this Seminar heard me talk about this for a whole term. This other is the image of one's own body, in the broad sense we shall give it.

In this case, it is here – in this human fantasy, which is the subject's fantasy and which is no longer anything but a shade – that the subject maintains his existence, maintains the veil that is such that he can continue to be a subject who speaks.

INTRODUCING THE OBJECT OF DESIRE

The three levels of interpretation
The algorithm ($$ \lozenge a$) guides us
From castration to aphanisis
From use to exchange
From hippos to women

Last time, I mentioned Jacques Damourette and Edouard Pichon's Des Mots à la pensée: Essai de grammaire de la langue française. The details about foreclosure and discordance that I mentioned can be found in two different places in the second volume, where we find a whole, condensed entry on negation. There, in particular, you will see that the foreclusive is incarnated in French by such odd words as pas and point, as well as by personne, rien, goutte, and mie, that bear in themselves the sign of their origin in traces. In effect, they are all words that designate traces. It is here that the symbolic act of foreclosure or rejection is found in French, the word ne remaining reserved for the discordance that negation more originally is.

Last time I tried to show you that, at its origin, in its linguistic root, negation is something that emigrates from enunciation toward the statement.

I showed you in what respect this could be represented on the little graph that we use here, by situating the elements of the dream "he did not know he was dead" on it.

It was around the phrase "as he wished" that we designated the point of desire's real impact, inasmuch as the dream both bears and marks it.

To continue to break new ground, we must ask ourselves in what way and why such action is possible on the part of desire in dreams.

I indicated at the end of the last class by what path I intend to investigate the function of desire, as it is articulated in Freud's work, namely at the level of unconscious desire – that is, on the basis of the formula ($$ \Diamond a$) to which we are led by everything we have demonstrated regarding the structure of the dream about the dead father.

What does the dream consist of? It shows us the confrontation between the subject and an other, a small other in this case.

In the dream, the father seems to be alive again, and he turns out to be related to the subject in ways whose ambiguities we began to investigate. It is the father who makes it such that the subject takes upon himself what I called the pain of existing. It is the father whose soul the subject witnessed to be in agony. It is the father whose death he wished for – insofar as nothing is more intolerable than existence reduced to itself, existence beyond anything that can sustain it, existence sustained despite the abolition of desire.

I indicated what we could glimpse here by way of a distribution of intra-subjective functions, as it were. The subject takes responsibility for the other's pain, all the while rejecting onto the other what he does not know – namely, the subject's own ignorance. His desire is, in effect, to stay ignorant. This is the precise desire in the dream.

The desire for death takes on its full meaning here. It is the desire not to awaken – not to awaken to the message, the most secret message that is borne by the dream itself, which is that the subject, through his father's death, is now confronted with death, having been protected from it hitherto by the father's presence. "Confronted with death" – what does that mean? Confronted with an x that is linked to the father's function, that is present here in the pain of existing, and that is the pivotal point around which what Freud discovered in the Oedipus complex revolves – namely, the signification of castration.

Such is the function of castration.

What does "to take castration upon oneself" [assumer la castration] signify? Does one ever truly assume [one's own] castration? What is this sort of point on which the last waves of "Analysis 123 Terminable and Interminable," as Freud calls it, crash? And up to what point is the analyst not simply within his rights, but in a position to be able to interpret it in this dream and regarding this dream?

At the end of what I said last time about the dream, I raised, without answering it, a question regarding the three ways in which the analyst can bring the subject's "as he wished" into the interpretation.

There is, first of all, the way that proceeds according to [selon] the subject's speech, according to what he wanted, which he recalls perfectly well, it having not been forgotten by him in the least. "He did not know, as he wished." The phrase "as he wished" is inserted here at the level of the statement line.

Re-established afterward at the level of the upper line – that is, at the level of the enunciation that is hidden in unconscious memory – it restores the traces of the Oedipus complex, which are those of the child's desire for the father's death: "He was dead, as he wished."

Recall here what Freud tells us about the child's desire, which is, when any dream forms, the capitalist, the latter finding his entrepreneur in a current desire. The current desire, which is far from always being unconscious, is the one that is expressed in the dream, and it is strictly speaking the desire in the dream. In this case, once the phrase "as he wished" is restored to the level of the child's desire, isn't it clear that the latter finds itself in a position to go in the direction of the desire in the dream?

What is, in effect, the desire in this dream? It is indisputably – at this crucial moment in the subject's life, the disappearance of his father – to interpose the image of the object [i(a)], in order to make it into the prop of a perpetual ignorance veiling desire. In short, "he did not know" buttresses what was up until then desire's alibi. It maintains and perpetuates the very function of prohibition that the father conveyed. The latter is what gives desire here its enigmatic and even abyssal form. It separates the subject from his desire; it gives the subject shelter from or a defense, in the final analysis, against this desire; it gives him a moral excuse not to confront it.

This was very clearly glimpsed by Ernest Jones, whose extraordinary insights about certain points of this psychical dynamic I will have the opportunity to show you today.

Lastly, can't we say that there is some intermediate stage of the interpretation of the dream to which the pure and simple interpretation of Oedipal desire is connected, like: "You wished 124 for your father's death at such and such a time and for such and such a reason"? You will recognize the nature of this third stage once I have designated it as "identification with the aggressor." Identification with the aggressor lies somewhere in one's childhood. Haven't you recognized that, being one of the typical forms of defense, it is essential, and that it emerges at the very place where "as he wished" is elided?

The meaning of "as" [selon] is undoubtedly essential if we are to reach a full interpretation of the dream.

The fact remains that the conditions and opportunities that allow the analyst to reach it will depend on the stage of the treatment and on the context of the response that the subject gives – by what means? By his dreams – since we know that the dreams dreamt by a subject in analysis are responses to the analyst, at least to what the analyst has become in the transference – but essentially, I would say, by the logical position of terms.

The fact remains, above all, that we can wonder if, to the question "What is the wish in 'as he wished'?" we do not always risk giving some precipitated or premature response, and thus giving the subject an opportunity to avoid what is at stake – namely, the dead end in which he is placed by the fundamental structure that turns the object of any desire into the prop of an essential metonymy.

As such, in effect, the object of human desire presents itself in a vanishing form, about which we can perhaps glimpse that castration turns out to be what we might call the final temperament.

In order to investigate more precisely what human desire means and signifies, we are thus led to broach the question from the other end, an end that is not given in dreams – namely, to take up the question via our algorithm, in which the barred S is confronted with and placed across from little a, the object.

I introduced the algorithm ($$ \lozenge a$) last time. Why not put it to the test 125 of the phenomenology of desire, as the latter presents itself to us as analysts? If we allow ourselves to be guided by this algorithm, it will lead us to investigate together our shared experience.

Let us try to see in what form the desire that is in us – that has been there since Freud, that lies at the heart of analysis, and that curiously enough has not been investigated as it should have been heretofore – presents itself in the subject.

The subject is not obligatorily nor always a neurotic subject. But if he is, it is no reason to assume that our research concerning desire does not have to take his structure into account, for that structure reveals a more general structure. The neurotic indubitably finds himself situated somewhere along the continuum of an experience that, to our way of thinking, is universal. All of Freud's theories are constructed upon this foundation.

Before examining some of the ways in which the dialectic of the relations between the subject and his desire have already been broached – that is, before coming to Jones's thought, which I mentioned earlier – I want to discuss something I came across quite recently in my clinical practice, which seems rather well designed to introduce what I am seeking to illustrate.

The patient in question was impotent. It is not bad to start with impotence in order to begin to investigate what desire is. We are sure, in any case, to be talking about human beings.

He was a young man who, of course, like many of those who are impotent, was not at all impotent. He had made love quite normally in the course of his existence, and had had a few liaisons. He was married and it was with his wife that things were not working anymore. This is not to be chalked up to impotence. The term does not seem appropriate given that the problem concerned the precise object with whom relations were for him the most desirable, for he loved his wife.

Now, here is more or less what, after a certain amount of analytic work, emerged from the subject's remarks. It was absolutely not the case that he had no passion [élan] for her, but if he allowed himself to be guided by it on any particular night, would he be able to sustain it? This was the particular point he was at in his analysis.

Things had gone very far in the conflict ignited by the difficulty he had been having. Did he have the right to impose on his wife some 126 new test, some new addition to his attempts and failures? In short, was this desire – whose possibility of fulfillment was far from zero, as one could sense in every regard – legitimate?

I cannot take my discussion of this particular case any further here, and give you the whole case history, if only because it is an ongoing analysis, and for many other reasons as well. This is one of the disadvantages we always encounter when we allude to ongoing analyses. I will thus borrow from other analyses a term that is altogether decisive in certain developments, which sometimes lead to detours, or even what we call perversions, which are of a much greater structural importance than what, so to speak, nakedly played itself out in this case of impotence.

Does he have a big enough phallus? In certain cases, the question emerges in the subject's lived experience and comes to the light of day in analysis. It may serve a decisive function, and, as in other places, reveal a structure: the point at which the subject raises the question. From certain angles or directions, this question can in and of itself lead the subject to try out a whole series of solutions, which – being superimposed, forming a series, and being added to each other – can lead him quite far from the field of a normal execution of what he has everything he needs to execute.

This "big enough phallus," or more exactly this phallus that is essential to the subject, thus turns out to be foreclosed at a certain moment of his experience. This is something that we encounter in a thousand different forms, which naturally are not always apparent or manifest, but which are latent. But it is precisely in the case in which this moment or stage of the subject's experience is exposed for all the world to see [à ciel ouvert] that, as La Palice would say, we can see and put our finger on it, and also give it its full import.

At the moment of the subject's life at which he encounters the sign of desire, which is often situated at the moment of the awakening of puberty, we see him more than once confronted, as it were, with something that is similar to what I mentioned earlier – is his desire legitimated or sanctioned by something else? We can take up what appears here already in a flash, in the phenomenology in which the 127 subject expresses it, in the following form – does he have at his disposal an absolute weapon? If he does not, he will find himself drawn into a series of identifications, alibis, and games of hide and seek that may take him very far afield.

For the aforementioned reasons, I cannot go into the dichotomies that are at work here. This is not too important, for the essence of what I want to indicate does not lie there. The point is to get you to grasp where desire finds the origin of its peripeteia.

The subject always alienates his desire in a sign, promise, or anticipation, something that brings a possible loss with it as such. Because of this possible loss, desire turns out to be linked to the dialectic of a lack. It is subsumed by a stage [temps] which, as such, is not there – no more than a sign is desire – a stage which, in part, is yet to come. In other words, desire must confront the fear that it will not stay the same over time and that, qua artifex, it perishes, if I may put it thus.

Of course, the desire that man feels and senses as an artifex can perish only with regard to the artifice of his own speaking. It is in the dimension of speaking that this fear develops and stabilizes. And it is here that we encounter a term that is so surprising and that has so curiously been left behind by psychoanalysis, the one that Jones makes into the mainstay of his reflections or meditations on castration – namely, "aphanisis."

In the as-it-were modern practice of analysis, whose norms reorient the analyst's relation to the patient in an entirely different direction, the phenomenology of castration is ever more veiled, as we see in recent publications. On the other hand, at the stage [in the history] of psychoanalysis at which Jones found himself, different tasks forced themselves on him; he was confronted with the need to give Freud's thought a certain interpretation, exegesis, apology, and explanation concerning what is involved in the castration complex, in particular. It was there that he found a way to get his point across – a ruse, if you will – that consists in saying that people are afraid of being deprived of their own desire.

The word "aphanisis" means disappearance. As you will see in Jones's text, what is at stake is the disappearance of desire. Aphanisis served him as a sensible introduction to a problematic that gave the dear man a lot of worries, of which he never managed 128 to rid himself – that of the relations between women and the phallus.

From the outset, he used the term to give men and women's relations to their desire the same common denominator. This was tantamount to a dead end, for it completely neglected what Freud discovered – namely, that these relations are fundamentally different owing to the asymmetry in the different sexes with regard to the phallus as a signifier. I believe that I have conveyed this to you adequately enough that, for the time being, we can take this for granted, at least provisionally.

Moreover, this use of "aphanisis," whether it was at the root of Jones's invention or whether it only arose from its consequences, marked a sort of inflection point that, in short, deflected its author from the true question, which is, "What does the possibility of aphanisis signify in the structure of the subject?" Doesn't it oblige us to [postulate] a structuring of the human subject as such, precisely insofar as he is a subject for whom existence is supposable and presupposed beyond desire, a subject who exists and subsists outside of his desire?

The question is not whether or not we must objectively take into account desire in its most radical form – namely, the desire to live or the "life instinct," as we say. What psychoanalysis shows us is entirely different – it is that the desire to live is, as such, subjectively put into play in the subject's lived experience. This does not merely mean that human experience is sustained by desire – this we naturally suspect to be true – but that the human subject takes desire into account and counts on it.

When the dear old and well-known élan vital [vital impulse] – that charming incarnation of human desire in nature that truly warrants the term anthropomorphism, and with which we try to make nature, about which we do not understand much, hang together – is at stake, the human subject sees it before him and is afraid that it will fail him.

What is at stake here is, all the same, something other than reflections of the unconscious. In and of itself, this suggests that we would do well to have a few structural requirements here. I mean that the subject/object relationship, which is conceived of as immanent, as it were, in the pure dimension of knowledge, nevertheless raises prob- 129 lems for us that are a bit more complicated once desire comes into the picture, as Freudian practice proves to us.

Since we began with impotence, we can turn now to the other term. Human beings sometimes manage to satisfy their desire, sometimes managing to anticipate it being satisfied. But when they are within range of satisfying it, I mean when they are not struck with impotence, it also sometimes happens that they become afraid of satisfying it – whereas, on this score, someone who is impotent fears neither potency nor impotence. The very remarkable cases in which the subject is afraid of the satisfaction of his own desire occur more often than they should. This is because the satisfaction would then make him dependent on the other who is going to satisfy him.

This is an everyday occurrence, phenomenologically speaking. It happens all the time in human experience. There is no need for us to refer to the great dramas that have taken on the role of exemplary illustrations of this problematic in order for us to observe how someone's life story unfolds. The subject spends his time avoiding each and every opportunity to encounter what has always been his most powerful desire in life. For the dependence on the other that he is afraid of, which I just mentioned, is there too.

In fact, dependence on the other is the form in which what the subject fears is presented in fantasy, and it makes him deviate from the path of satisfying his desire.

The fear in question may not concern what one might simply call the other's caprice [or whim]. I am not sure you realize that the word "caprice" has little to do with the usual etymology, that found in the Larousse dictionary, which relates it to goats [chèvre]. The French have in fact borrowed it from Italian, in which capriccio means frisson [thrill, chill, or shiver]. It is the very same word that is so cherished by Freud, sich sträuben, which signifies se hérisser [i.e., to bridle, prickle, stand up straight, or be rubbed the wrong way], and which is, as you know, throughout his work one of the metaphorical forms in which he incarnates in the most tangible way possible how resistance manifests itself. He uses it in every context, when speaking about his wife, when speaking about Irma, and when speaking in general about subjects who resist.

What the subject is afraid of when he thinks about the other is not essentially becoming dependent on his caprice [or whim], but the fact that the other will mark this caprice with a sign [c'est que l'autre ne marque ce caprice de signe]. This is what is veiled. There is no ade-130 quate sign of the subject's goodwill if not the totality of the signs by which he subsists. In truth, there is no other sign of the subject than the sign of his abolishment as a subject, the sign that is written $.

This shows you, in short, that, as regards his desire, man is not true, since – however little or much courage he puts into it – the situation radically escapes him. When he finds himself in the presence of object a, the subject vanishes. What I wanted to convey to you on this score last time was called, by someone who spoke with me afterward, "an umbilication of the subject at the level of his will," an image that I quite willingly accept inasmuch as it is strictly in line with what Freud designates when he speaks about dreams.

A dream's navel is the point of final convergence of all the signifiers in which the dreamer is caught up, to such an extent that Freud calls it the "unknown" [SE V, p. 525]. He himself did not realize what was at stake in this Unbekannt [unknown], which is a very strange term to flow from his pen and concerns the radical difference of the unconscious that he discovered. As I have tried to show you, the Freudian unconscious is not constituted and instituted as unconscious in the simple dimension of the subject's innocence with respect to the signifier that organizes and articulates in his stead, for we find in the subject's relation to the signifier an essential impasse. I just reformulated this by telling you that there is no other sign of the subject than the sign of his abolition as a subject.

As you might well suspect, things do not remain at this stage. After all, if there were nothing but an impasse here, it would not take us very far, as they say. The characteristic of impasses is that they are fruitful, and this impasse is of interest to us only owing to the ramifications that we see it develop, which are precisely those where desire comes in.

Let us try to perceive this sort of aphanisis at the moment in your analysis at which it must appear in a flash. However, it is not merely an experience, there are mental modes in which you are led to conceptualize it.

Regarding the Oedipus complex, people tell you that there is a moment at which the subject flees [se dérobe]. It is the so-called moment of the inverted Oedipus in which the [male] subject glimpses a solution to the Oedipal conflict in the possibility of purely and simply attracting the love of the strongest party – namely, the father. If he then flees from this love, it is, we are told, because his narcissism is threatened, for to receive the father's love implies castration 131 for him.

People tell you this as if it were self-evident, because when they cannot resolve a problem, they naturally consider it to be comprehensible, and this is what usually makes it such that it is nevertheless not as clear as all that. This is certainly the case here.

This solution is indeed possible, all the more possible in that it is, at least in part, the path that is usually followed, the one that leads to the introjection of the father in the form of the ego-ideal. In any case, that is what it looks like. But, if the so-called inverted Oedipus is involved in the normal solution, this moment was nevertheless perceived and especially brought out in the problematic of homosexuality in which the subject feels his father's love to be essentially threatening. We qualify this threat as a castration threat, not having a more suitable term at our disposal.

But this term is not all that unsuitable, after all. Psychoanalytic terms have, in the end, fortunately retained enough meaning and fullness, enough dense, heavy, and concrete character, to continue to guide us.

People sense that there is some narcissism involved here, narcissism being involved at this particular turning point in the Oedipus complex. This is confirmed by later pathways of the dialectic that lead the subject into the path of homosexuality. These later pathways are, as you know, far more complex than the pure and simple, summary requirement that the object have a phallus, even if this requirement is fundamentally hidden therein.

But that is not where I would like to head now. I will simply note that, at the outset of the problematic of the signifier, the subject, in order to deal with the suspension of desire, has more than one trick up his sleeve, as it were.

These tricks naturally bear first and foremost on the manipulation of the object, the manipulation of a in the formula.

The taking up of the object in the dialectic of the subject's relations with the signifier must be placed at the core of the relationship to the phallus that I have tried to articulate for you over the past few years.

The relationship to the phallus is seen all the time and everywhere. Need I recall to mind the moment in little Hans's life when, at the age of two, he asked about every object, "Does it have a widdler, a Wiwimacher, or not?" It suffices to observe children to see this essential function operating right out in the open in all its forms.

Freud remarks in passing that the question raised by Hans constitutes a mode of interpretation of the phallic form, which defines a sort of analysis. This position, of course, merely translates the presence of the phallus in the dialectic, without informing us in any way either about the nature of the process or about its stability, or even about its goal, which I tried to show you at the time [in Seminar IV]. What I simply want to indicate is that we constantly find evidence that we are not going astray here, and that the terms involved are truly the following: the subject, owing in this case to his disappearance, faced with an object, which sometimes turns out to be the essential signifier around which the fate of the entire relationship between the subject and object is played out.

I will begin by rapidly mentioning in what sense, in the most general sense, the object, I mean little a in our algorithm, impacts what one might call the instinctual specificity of need.

When the signifier's interposition makes a relationship between the subject and the object impossible – in other words, when the subject cannot maintain himself in the presence of the object – we know what happens: his object undergoes a sort of volatilization that in our concrete practice we call the possibility of displacement. This does not simply mean that the human subject, like all animal subjects, sees his desire displace from one object to another, but that displacement itself is what allows the fragile equilibrium of his desire to be maintained.

In the final analysis, what does displacement involve? What it involves is, I will say, the thwarting of satisfaction while nevertheless preserving an object of desire. But, on the other hand, it is still, as it 133 were, a way of metonymically symbolizing satisfaction.

We are heading straight for the dialectic of the treasure chest and the miser, which is far from being the most complicated, even if people barely perceive what is at stake. Which is, namely, that in this case, a certain retention of the object – as we say, bringing in an anal metaphor – is the necessary condition for desire to subsist. But this is only to the degree to which the retained object, which props up desire, not itself be the object of any jouissance.

Legal terminology bears traces of this. When we say in French that we give someone the jouissance [usufruct] of a piece of property, what do we mean? We mean precisely that it is altogether humanly conceivable to possess property that one does not enjoy but that someone else enjoys [or benefits from, jouisse]. Here the object reveals its function as desire's collateral [gage], so to speak, not to say desire's hostage.

We can, if you will, try to connect this up with animal psychology. As regards ethology, I myself am inclined to believe what one of our colleagues said that was most exemplary and most colorful. I realized this while reading a monograph that the publisher Plon just brought out entitled L'Ordre des choses [The Order of Things]. I did not want to tell you the title because reading the book would distract you from our work here; but fortunately it is a short book, and it is by Jacques Brosse, someone who was completely unknown up until now.

The book is a sort of brief natural history – that is how I interpret it – fitting for our times. I mean by this that the book reminds us of what we find so subtle and charming when we read Buffon's work, and can never find in any contemporary scientific publication. But what stops us from giving ourselves over to this kind of exercise, even if we know much more about the behavior of animals and ethology than Buffon did? What we find in specialized journals is unreadable. What is said in this short monograph is expressed, as you will see, in a style that I must say is verily and truly remarkable. Read, above all, the middle section, which is called "parallel lives" and which discusses the lives of tarantulas and ants.

I thought of this short book because its author has something in common with me, which is that the question of mammals is resolved for him. Apart from man, who is an essentially problem-134 atic mammal – it suffices to consider the role that breasts [mammes] play in our imagination – there is but one truly serious mammal, which is the 'potamus. Everyone agrees here, at least those who have some slight degree of sensitivity. T. S. Eliot, whose metaphysical ideas are awful, but who is nevertheless a great poet, immediately symbolized the militant Church as a hippopotamus – we will come back to that.

What does the hippopotamus do? People highlight the difficulties of his existence. They are great, so it seems, and one of the essential things he does is guard his grazing ground [pacage] – because he must nevertheless have a reserve of resources – with his excrement. This is an essential point: he maps his territory, as it is called, by delimiting it with a series of relays or points designed to adequately indicate to all those whom this concerns – namely, his fellow creatures – that this is his turf. As you see, we find a first sketch of symbolic activity in animals. In mammals, it is a specifically excremental symbolism.

Whereas the hippopotamus thus turns out to guard his grazing ground with his excrement, man does not guard his grazing ground with shit; it is his shit that he keeps as collateral for the essential grazing ground, the grazing ground that remains to be determined. This is the dialectic of what people call anal symbolism, which was one of the hitherto absolutely unsuspected dimensions that Freud revealed to us – a new revelation of the Noces chymiques, if I may put it thus, of man with his object.

In truth, the progress made by man depends on language alone – this singular intermediary – and we do not know where it comes from. It seriously complicates our relationship with objects – in other words, it leads us to have a problematic relationship with objects.

This is, in short, the same question that Marx raises, without resolving it, in his polemic with Proudhon – namely, how is it that human objects shift from having use value to having exchange value? I simply wanted to indicate to you why this happens and give at least a brief sketch of an explanation.

You must read a piece by Marx called The Misery of Philosophy:

A Response to Proudhon's "Philosophy of Misery" (1948). The pages 135 in which he ridicules Proudhon for having decreed that the shift from use value to exchange value occurred by a sort of pure decree among those who were cooperating – and we would have to figure out why they began cooperating and with the help of what – are rather salubrious. The way in which Marx excoriates Proudhon for a full twenty or thirty pages, without counting the rest of the book, provides good intellectual training.

This is thus what happens regarding objects and the meaning of their volatilization. To value an object is also to devalue it, I mean to rip it away from the field of pure and simple need. This is, after all, merely a reminder of the essential phenomenology, the phenomenology of property [or commodities, bien], strictly speaking – and in every sense of the word bien, imagine that! But let us leave that merely sketched out for the time being.

Let us simply say that when the object involved is another person, or other people [l'autrui], and especially a sexual partner, a certain number of consequences ensue, of course, which are all the more palpable since we were talking earlier about the social dimension. What is at stake here is assuredly at the very root of the social contract. We must, in effect, take into account the elementary structures of kinship in which the female partner is, as Lévi-Strauss demonstrated, an object of exchange, and in a way that is not lacking in latency or repercussions.

This exchange is not self-evident. Indeed, as an object of exchange women are, as it were, a very bad deal for those who carry out the operation, since all of this brings about a real mobilization, as it were, known as the offering [prestation] of the phallus, the contractual renting out of its services. Here we situate ourselves naturally in the perspective of social utilitarianism, which, as you know, presents several disadvantages. This was my precise point of departure earlier.

Once women are included in this dialectic, namely as socialized objects, they undergo a transformation that is truly disturbing. It is amusing to see how Freud, in the innocence of his youth, spoke of it. See pages 192–3 of the first volume of Jones's biography of Freud.

In a letter to his fiancée, Freud indicates what purpose a woman, a 136 good woman, serves. He does so in connection with the topic of the emancipation of women in John Stuart Mill's work, which, as you know, Freud translated for a while, at the insistence of Gomperz. This is quite priceless when you think that his passion for his fiancée was, at the time, at its height.

The letter ends with the fact that a woman must stay in her place and render all the services that are expected of her – this at a time at which Freud was willingly making himself the possible mentor of his wife – and which are no different from the famous Kinder, Küche, Kirche [children, kitchen, and church]. I must read you a passage here based on the English, since Jones's biography has never been published in another language: "Law and custom have much to give women that has been withheld from them, but the position of women will surely be what it is: in youth an adored darling and in mature years a loved wife." We have here something that is not devoid of interest to us, for it shows us both from what experience Freud began and the path he had to travel.

Faced with this problematic position, another solution is possible for the subject. And it is no accident that we have broached the question from the angle of the social dialectic, for this other solution, as we also know from Freud's work, is identification. Identification with what? Identification with the father.

Why identification with the father? Because, as I already indicated, the father is in some way perceived as someone who has succeeded in really overcoming the impasse in the conjugal link, because he is supposed to have really castrated the mother. I say "supposed to have" [censé] because, naturally, it is merely supposed.

We have here the problematic of the father. If I am emphasizing it again today, it is perhaps because of what was said at our scientific meeting last night regarding the father's imaginary function, his lordliness [seigneurialité] in certain spheres of culture.

The figure of the father does not fail to present all sorts of possibilities for slippage. In effect, we must see that the solution that is prepared here, as it were – namely, identification with the father – stems directly from the fact that the father is already a type, in the strict sense of the term. There is no doubt but that this type is subject to temporal variations, but this does not bother us because 137 we cannot conceive of it otherwise than in relation to an imaginary function. It is thanks to the subject's identification with the father ideal, which denies the reality of the subject's relationship with his father, that we can perhaps say that, on average, wedding nights turn out alright, and in the final analysis are a success – even if a truly rigorous statistical study of them has never been done.

Whatever the case may be, to us, identification with the father, which is obviously linked not only to factual data but also to imaginary data, resolves nothing when it comes to the problematic of desire – neither for us nor, of course, for our patients, and perhaps on this point we are no different from them.

Identification with the father's image is but a specific case of what we must now broach as being the most general solution of the subject/object relationship, the most general solution of the confrontation between the barred subject and object a, the object as a – namely, the introduction of the imaginary function in its most general form, otherwise stated, the dimension of narcissism.

It is narcissism that offers the subject a prop, solution, or solution pathway to the problem of desire. Human eros gets caught up in a relationship with a certain image that is none other than that of one's own body. Here an exchange or reversal occurs by which I am going to try to articulate for you the confrontation between $ and little a.

As it is already a quarter to two, and as I was unable to take things any further today, we will begin anew on this point when we meet on January 7th after the Christmas vacation.

We will finally have the opportunity to specify little a in its essence, function, and essential nature.

I have already indicated at length in prior Seminars that any and every human object is fundamentally marked by a narcissistic structure, by a profound relationship with narcissistic eros. In the most general structure of fantasy, this human object normally ends up receiving the lion's share of the subject's Angst – that is, neither more nor less than his affect in the presence of desire, this fear, this feeling of imminence that I mentioned earlier, it being what essentially thwarts the subject when he is on the verge of realizing his desire. The whole nature of fantasy is to transfer this fear to the object.

In studying anew a certain number of fantasies whose dialectic we 138 have hitherto developed, we will see that the subject's affect in the presence of his desire is transferred onto the object qua narcissistic. A single fundamental fantasy, "a child is being beaten," will suffice – because it was one of the first that was discovered – to bring out the most essential features of this transfer.

What then becomes of the subject? How is he structured? Why is he structured as an ego and as an ego-ideal? We can only glimpse this in its absolutely rigorous structural necessity as the return or echo of the affect that the subject delegated to the object, a.

We have never yet truly spoken about a, in the sense that I have not yet shown you that it must necessarily be posited not qua a but qua image of a, image of the other, which is one and the same thing as the ego. I designate this image with a capital I, for Idéal du moi (ego-ideal), insofar as it is itself the heir of the subject's first relationship, not with his own desire, but with his mother's desire. This ideal thus takes the place of what it felt like to the subject to be a child who was wanted.

Following this necessary development, capital I comes to be inscribed in a certain trace. A transformation of the algorithm is necessary here, that I can already put on the blackboard as a sort of preannouncement. The I is inscribed in a certain relationship to the other, a, inasmuch as the latter is affected by the subject himself, inasmuch as the latter is affected by his desire.

DESIRE'S PHALLIC MEDIATION

The symptom in the RIS knot
The imaginary interposition of the dead father
The signifying privilege of the imaginary phallus
The subject's primary masochism
Love and desire in men and women

Our practice confronts us with the need to make an essential distinction between two functions. There is in the subject what we must call desire. And yet this desire's constitution, manifestation, and contradictions – which, in the course of treatments, come out clearly between the subject's discourse and his behavior – oblige us to distinguish it from the function of demand.

If there is something that psychoanalysis has brought out – not only in its original Freudian form but also in the contradictions that have arisen subsequently – it is certainly the role played by demand and its problematic character.

The development of psychoanalysis since Freud's time has, in effect, granted ever greater importance and emphasis to what, going by various names, converges in the final analysis on the general notion of dependency neurosis. This is where the theoretical slippages, not to mention failures in terms of practice, of a certain conception of the results [réduction] that must be obtained by therapeutic treatment converge. What is hidden or veiled behind the notion of dependency neurosis is the fundamental fact of demand, whose effects impress, compress, and oppress the subject.

Have we adopted the right attitude toward this function, which we reveal to be formative in the genesis of the subject? Have we adopted, I mean, an attitude that allows for the elucidation of symptoms as well as for their alleviation?

Symptoms do not result from the mere subtraction or suspension that is known as frustration, nor are they merely a sort of 140 deformation of the subject – however it might be envisioned – owing to something that is supposedly doled out as a function of a certain relationship to the real. For an imaginary frustration is, as I have said, always related to something real. Between what we in fact discover in psychoanalysis as the aftermath, consequences, and effects of frustration, on the one hand – and even its long-lasting effects, for it makes an impression on us – and symptoms, on the other hand, there is something known as desire that is characterized by an infinitely more complex dialectic.

Now, what I have tried to demonstrate is that desire does not result from a few impressions left by the real, but rather that it cannot be grasped or understood except in the tightest knot by which the real, the imaginary, and its symbolic meaning are tied together for man. This is why the relationship between desire and fantasy is inscribed on the graph in the field that lies midway between the two structural lines of any and every signifying enunciation [d→($◊a)].

If what constitutes a symptom – namely, let us say, a metaphorical phenomenon, that is, interference by a repressed signifier with a patent signifier – is truly based on desire, we would be barking up the wrong tree altogether were we not to seek to situate, organize, and structure the place of this desire.

We have begun to do so this year, by taking up a dream that I have already discussed at length.

It turns out that Freud highlighted this odd dream, the one in which the dead father appears, on two different occasions. After having given it an especially useful place in his 1911 article on the two principles of mental functioning [SE XII, pp. 225–6], the pleasure principle and the reality principle, he integrated it into the Traumdeutung.

I have tried to situate the elements of this dream on what we might call the graph of the inscription of the elementary biological subject – that is, the subject characterized by need – in the defiles of demand. This graph includes a chain or articulation that is fundamentally twofold, which corresponds to a structural distinction. I showed you how we must view it.

Namely, we must see that demand is never purely and simply a 141 demand for something, since behind every precise demand, every demand for satisfaction, there is, owing to language, the symbolization of the Other, the Other as presence and absence, the Other who may be a subject who provides the gift of love. What he gives is beyond anything he can give. What he gives, he gives by his presence and by his presence alone. What he gives is precisely that nothing which amounts to everything in the determination of presence versus absence.

I have articulated this dream by didactically shifting onto the twofold nature of signs something that allows us to grasp, in the dream's structure, the relationship that is established by the fantasized production whose structure Freud attempted to elucidate throughout his life, and first of all, masterfully, in the Traumdeutung.

The son, who is in mourning for a father whom he undoubtedly loved and whom he watched over until the very end of his death throes, makes his father reappear under conditions that the dream articulates with exemplary simplicity. The father appears as he was when alive, he speaks, and before him the son remains dumb, oppressed, and gripped by pain – pain, he says, that stems from the thought "that his father was dead and did not know it." We must complete this, as Freud tells us, "that he was dead as he [the dreamer] wished. He did not know" what? That it was "as he wished."

This is the whole dream. If we try to go further into its construction and examine its structure more closely, we note that the subject is confronted with a certain image under very specific conditions. I would say that a distribution or dividing up is established between this image and what the subject assumes responsibility for in his dream, which will show us the essence of the phenomenon.

I have already tried to home in, so to speak, on the structure of this dream by distributing the dream's characteristic signifying themes on what we might call a signifying ladder.

"He did not know," which I have situated on the upper line of the graph, is an essentially subjective reference, for it concerns nothing factual as such. It concerns the deepest dimension of the subject, going to the core of his structure, and we know that this structure is ambiguous here. "He did not know" is attributable not only to the person to whom it is attributed by the dreamer – in a paradoxical, absurd, and contradictory way that even resonates nonsensically, 142 since we are, after all, talking about someone who is dead – but it is also present in the structure of the dreamer inasmuch as he too shares in this ignorance, and this is essential.

How does the subject position himself in the suspension, as it were, of the dream narrative? He views himself as knowing what the other does not know. The upshot is that the other's subjective position is that he is found wanting [d'être en défaut], so to speak.

The statement that he is dead obviously cannot affect him. But a symbolic expression like être mort ["to be dead" or "dead being"] harbors within itself a paradox, for it makes the very person that it concerns subsist, preserving him in being, whereas there is no being here who can be dead. There can be no symbolic assertion of someone being dead [de l'être mort] that does not immortalize him, in a certain manner. This is clearly what is at work in the dream about the dead father.

The fact remains that the position of this being who is found wanting, that this subjective minus value [moins-value], does not aim at the fact that he is dead but that he is the one who does not know it. This is how the subject [i.e., the dreamer] is situated in relation 143 to the other. Not only does the other not know that he is dead but I would say that, in the end, he must not be told this. Such protecting of the other is always found more or less at the root of any and all communication between beings, where the question of what one can and what one cannot make known to the other always arises. This is something whose impact you should always weigh carefully whenever you are engaged in analytic discourse.

We talked last night about those who cannot speak, those who encounter obstacles to expressing themselves. What was at issue was the resistance of discourse itself, strictly speaking. It is essential that we mention this dimension if we are to relate the dream about the dead father to another dream, one that I will borrow from a page near the end of Trotsky's Diary in Exile. It is a dream he had shortly after the end of his stay in France, I believe.

It is an especially poignant dream. Trotsky had it at a moment when, perhaps for the very first time, he began to notice the first signs of the diminishing of his life force that had been so inexhaustible. In his dream he sees his companion Lenin, and Lenin conveys to him that Trotsky is perhaps no longer at the height of his powers, as his old companion had always known him to be. But faced with this old companion, who emerges so significantly at a critical moment in his own vitality, what Trotsky thinks, in a way whose value derives from the ambiguity we always encounter in dialogue, is that he should spare Lenin's feelings. And wishing to remind him of a time related to the precise moment at which Lenin's own forces failed him, Trotsky says to him, in order to designate to him the moment at which he died, "the moment at which you were very, very ill . . ." – as if some precise formulation of what was involved would, by its mere utterance, have blown away the shade in the dream with which Trotsky himself was grappling, at the same turning point in his existence.

Well, if in the distribution between the two figures who confront each other in the dream about the dead father, ignorance is imputed to the other, how can we fail to see that there is also, conversely, the subject's own ignorance? For the dreamer does not know, not simply the signification of his dream – namely, everything that underlies it and that Freud brings out, that is, his unconscious history, his old wishes for his father's death – but, further still, the nature of the pain that he (the dreamer) feels. In seeking its origin, we have realized 144 that it was the pain that he had felt and glimpsed while witnessing his father's last moments on earth. But it is also the pain of existence as such, at the limit at which this existence subsists in a state where we no longer apprehend anything but its inextinguishable character and the fundamental pain that accompanies it when all desire disappears from it, when all desire has vanished from one's existence.

This is the exact pain that the subject takes on, but he explains it absurdly since he explains it solely by the other's ignorance. In the final analysis, if we look very closely, this ignorance is no more a reason for his pain than the affect that emerges in an hysterical fit is explained by the context from which it seems to arise, the affect being in fact related to some other context.

It is precisely by taking this pain on himself that the subject blinds himself to what has taken place in his immediate proximity – that is, to the fact that his father's death throes and disappearance have actually threatened him, the son. He experienced these things, and in the dream he distances himself from them by recalling his father's image to mind. This image separates him from the sort of abyss or vertigo that opens up before him whenever he is confronted with the final term of his existence, and attaches him to something that calms men down – namely, desire. What he needs to interpose between himself and unbearable existence is, in this case, a desire.

He does not cite just any old prop for his desire, just any old desire, but the closest and most urgent one, the best one, the desire that had long dominated him, the one he had subdued but that he must now bring back to life imaginarily for a while.

In the power struggle that lies at the core of his rivalry with his father, it is the dreamer who finally wins out. If he triumphs, it is because the other does not know, whereas he does. Here we see the flimsy footbridge [passerelle] thanks to which the subject does not feel directly invaded – or swallowed up by the gaping hole that opens up before him – when he is directly confronted with the anxiety that death provokes.

To put this more crudely, we know that the death of one's father is always experienced as the disappearance of a sort of shield, of the interposition or substitution that the father was with respect to the absolute master, death.

145 We thus begin to see a sort of prefiguration of something; we see something being sketched out. What is it, if not the formula that I am trying to present, which is what props desire up – the fundamental formula of the essential intra-subjective relationship within which all desire, as such, must be inscribed: ($◊a)?

In this simplest form possible, the formula ($◊a) expresses the same relationship as the one that interposes itself in the partially unconscious discourse coming from the Other with a capital O [grand Autre] and going toward the subject, in the quadrilateral schema that you already know, the one known as the L schema.

The imaginary tension a–a' between the ego and the other – that we could call, in certain regards, the tension between little a and the image of a – generally structures the relationship between the subject and the object, whereas the formula ($◊a) specifically expresses the absence of the subject that is characteristic of the impact of desire on the relationship between the subject and the imaginary functions.

Indeed, desire as such raises for man the question of his subjective elision, $, with regard to any and every possible object.

To the degree to which the subject is inscribed in the dimension of speech as a plaintiff [or: petitioner, demandeur], he approaches

the most elaborate and evolved object that certain analysts more or less deftly conceptualize as the object of "oblativity." This notion is 146 problematic, as I have often indicated. I, too, try to conceptualize what is involved here and endeavor to formulate it more rigorously.

Inasmuch as a subject, qua desire – that is, in the fullness of a human destiny which is that of a speaking subject – approaches this object, he finds himself caught in a sort of impasse. He cannot reach this object qua object except by finding himself, as a subject of speech, effaced in a kind of elision that leaves him in the darkness brought on by trauma, and in what is, strictly speaking, beyond anxiety itself. Or else he finds that he must take the place of the object, substitute himself for it, and subsume himself under a certain signifier.

Which one? The phallus. For the time being, I am simply stating this. I am not justifying it; our whole discussion will justify it. All of psychoanalytic experience attests to it. It is owing to this that, in every instance of assuming a fully developed [mûre] position, the one we refer to as genital, something occurs which has an impact at the imaginary level – it is called castration.

It is from this perspective alone that one can understand the problematic of the phallic phase that raised truly infinite questions and contradictions from which analysts have found it impossible to extricate themselves. The dialogue between Freud and Jones on this topic is, I would say, singularly moving. It suffices to see the impasse that Jones ends up in when he revolts against the conception – which is too simple for his taste – that Freud offers of the phallic function, as the one and only term around which all concrete and historical development of sexuality in men and women revolves. Jones highlights instead what he refers to as the functions of defense linked to the image of the phallus.

Freud and Jones end up saying the same thing, but they come at it from different angles. If they assuredly cannot agree, it is because they do not have at their disposal the central notion according to which the phallus must, in this case, be conceptualized as subtracted, as it were, from the imaginary community, as isolated when confronted with the variety and multiplicity of other images that come to take on bodily functions. Its function is privileged, it constituting the signifier of the subject.

147 Let us look at this still more closely, and distinguish the level of the call [appel] from that of the wish [voeu].

The level of the call is first, immediate, apparent, and spontaneous. When we call out, "Help!" or "Give us bread!" – each of which is, in the end, a cry – the subject is identical to his need for an instant, and in the most total way possible. A call must, nevertheless, be articulated at the interrogative [quésitif] level of demand. It is articulated in the experience between child and mother, and in everything he puts in her place – namely, the whole society that speaks her [or: his, sa] language.

On the other hand, the articulation of the votive [votif] level is at one remove. It is the dimension in which the subject, throughout his life, must find himself anew – that is to say, must find what got away from him because it was outside and beyond all that is filtered out by language qua form. As it develops, such filtration rejects and represses ever more thoroughly that part of the subject's need that tended to be expressed at first. What we do in analysis is attempt to go beyond what was filtered out, shaped, and transformed by the subject's speech.

We could say that everything that must be articulated at the interrogative level resides in the Other, here at A [on the lower level of the graph], as a predetermined code that completely pre-exists the subject's experience, it being offered up to the play of language – that is, to the first signifying battery the subject experiences, assuming he learns to speak.

What do we do in analysis, what do we encounter, and what do we recognize when we say that the subject is at the oral stage or at the anal stage, etc.? We must first of all express it in a full-fledged form, which assumes that we do not forget the complete element – namely, that what is always involved is the subject qua marked by speech and in a certain relation to his demand. Next, we must see that an interpretation by which we convey to the subject the structuring of his demand, does not simply consist in getting him to recognize the oral, anal, or other character [caractère] of the demand in question, but, literally, to confront him with this characteristic [caractère]. What we interpret is not simply a characteristic that is immanent in the subject's demand; we confront the subject with the structure of his demand as such.

It is precisely at this point that the emphasis of our interpretation must shift, oscillate, and vacillate. If we know how to emphasize it in a certain way, we teach the subject to recognize at the upper level 148 of the graph – which is the votive level, the level of what he wishes for, the level of his wishes insofar as they are unconscious – the signifying props that are hidden and unconscious in his demand. Interpretation must stay entirely within this register. In short, we do nothing but teach the subject, as it were, to speak and to recognize himself as a subject in what corresponds to D [on the graph; see Figure 2.2], yet without giving him answers.

On the other hand, to reveal this unconscious vocabulary to the subject without confronting him with his demand comes down to producing a collapse in the function of the subject as such; it comes down to asking him to efface himself and disappear. This is clearly what happens in a type of psychoanalytic practice in which the analysis of the unconscious is reduced to teaching the patient a vocabulary. What disappears and escapes, what turns out to be progressively eliminated, is the requirement that the subject manifest himself – beyond all of that – in his being. Constantly bringing him back to the level of demand – which is known in a certain form of technique as "analyzing the resistances" – ends up purely and simply eliminating his desire.

It is simple and easy to see that the two levels of the graph include the vector of a retroactive response. In the subject's relation to the Other, this vector goes backward toward the subject in order to confirm the meaning of his demand for him, and at times to identify him with his own demand. Similarly, at the level at which the subject seeks to recognize himself in what is beyond this demand, there is a place for a response, which is schematized by the abbreviation S(Ⱥ), which is the signifier of barred A. This is a reminder that the Other too is marked by the signifier, that he too is in a certain way abolished in discourse.

This serves no other function than to indicate a theoretical point, and we shall see the form it must take. Let us simply say that this form is essentially the recognition of what is castrated in any living being who attempts to approach this living being when the latter is approached through language. Of course, it is not at this level that we can instantly give an answer, but we must target, respect, and explore it.

In order to do so, we can use what the subject already expresses beyond the answer's locus – namely, the imaginary situation in 149 which he places, maintains, and suspends himself in a position that, in certain ways, assuredly includes the artifices of defense. This is what leads to the ambiguity of so many manifestations of desire, of perverse desire, for example. This is the most essential point at which the subject's being attempts to express and assert itself.

This is all the more important to consider, as it is precisely here, in this very locus, that we expect what we so blithely call optimal genital development to occur, and the fully developed [achevé] object to appear. Thanks to which we should note that everything that constitutes the relations between men and women, as Jones expresses himself biblically somewhere, remains marked by structural difficulties that stem from the fact that man is a speaking subject and that express the relationship between $ and a. Why are there such difficulties?

Up to a certain point in development, the vocabulary and code of demand can pass through a certain number of relations that involve a detachable object – namely, to limit ourselves to two, nourishment in oral relations and excrement in anal relations. Nevertheless, when genital relations are at stake, it is quite clear that it is only through a type of borrowing or continuation of the subject's signifying fragmentation in relations involving demand that something can appear to us – and indeed appears to us, but in a morbid way, including all its symptomatic forms of impact – namely, the phallus. And this is true for a good, simple reason, which is that the phallus is not a detachable object and that it only becomes one by shifting to the status of a signifier.

What is involved in optimal genital development is based on the following, that nothing that presents itself in the subject as related to the fulfillment of his desire can, to put it as clearly as possible, be demanded [or: asked for, se demander]. The essence of neurosis, the essence of what we deal with when we work with those characterized by neurotic structure, consists very precisely in the fact that what cannot be demanded in this realm – that is to say, everything having to do with desire – is nevertheless inscribed and formulated in the register of demand. This neurotic phenomenon appears, more or less sporadically, in the development of all subjects characterized by neurotic structure.

While rereading Jones's work recently, I re-examined every-150 thing he wrote about the phallic phase. What he contributes that stems from his most perceptive and direct experience is always very interesting.

> I could relate cases of a number of male patients whose failure to achieve manhood – in relation to either men or women – was strictly to be correlated with their attitude of needing first to acquire something from women, something which of course they never actually could acquire. [p. 461]

"Why?" asks Jones, and when he asks why in his article and in this context, it is a genuine question. He does not know why, but he underscores it as a point on the horizon, an opening, a perspective, and a point where he no longer has any guide.

> Why should imperfect access to the nipple give a boy the sense of imperfect possession of his own penis? I am quite convinced that the two things are intimately related, although the logical connection between them is certainly not obvious. [p. 461]

At least, not to him.

Even the most superficial phenomenology allows us to see at every moment the necessary preconditions for a subject to be able to fully put his desire into action. We can reconstruct them in detail right up to the point of finding what I would call the labyrinthine pathways into which his desire skids. Here we see what constitutes an essential fact – namely, the position he took up in the structural relation between desire and demand.

This is why people say, for example, that the continued existence of the incestuous position in the unconscious has variously ravaging consequences on the manifestations and fulfillment of the subject's desire. If this proposition has any meaning, it is only inasmuch as this so-called incestuous position, which is supposedly preserved somewhere in the unconscious, is a position characterized by demand. When Jones says that the subject must, at a given moment, choose between his incestuous object and his sexual organ [sexe], 151 and that if he wants to preserve the one he must give up the other, I would say that what he has to choose between at such an early moment is between his demand and his desire.

After these general indications, I am now going to start down a path that is designed to show you the actual structuring of desire at the imaginary level, and what it has in common with imaginary elements that are inflected and taken up in the necessary play of the signifying game, inasmuch as this game is commanded by the twofold structure of the votive and the interrogative.

Let us consider the most banal or common fantasy, the one Freud paid special attention to: "A child is being beaten" [SE XVII, pp. 179–204].

Let us re-examine it from the perspective I am developing in order to see in what respect fantasy is desire's necessary prop.

Freud encountered the Schlagephantasie [beating fantasy], in his own era, in a certain number of predominantly female subjects. When the first phase of the fantasy is remembered, whether in fantasies or in the subject's memories, it is described, Freud tells us, by the following sentence: Der Vater schlägt das Kind [The father is beating the child]. Freud underscores the fact that, in this case, the child who is being beaten is, in relation to the subject, in a position that is expressed by the more complete sentence: "The father is beating the child that I hate."

Freud thus brings us from the initial point to the very heart of being, where the most intense degree of love and hate is situated. In effect, the other child is represented here as being subjected, by the father's violence and whim [caprice], to a maximal fall from grace [déchéance] or symbolic devaluing, as being absolutely frustrated and deprived of love. Hatred targets him in his very being, targeting in him what is demanded beyond all demand – namely, love. The so-called narcissistic injury done to the hated child is utter and complete here.

The child's subjective fall from grace, which is linked for him to his first encounter with corporal punishment, leaves various traces depending on the modalities of its repetition. In the times in which 152 we live, children are mostly spared such punishment. Nevertheless, as everyone can observe, if it happens that a child who has never been beaten is, late in the game, the object of physical chastisement, however justified it may be, this experience has prostrating consequences for him, at least momentarily, that one cannot imagine in advance.

Be that as it may, assuming we agree that the earliest stage of the beating fantasy is as Freud presents it to us, "Profound transformations [take] place between this first phase and the next" [SE XVII, p. 185]. Freud describes the second phase as follows:

> The person beating remains the same (that is, the father); but the child who is beaten has been changed into another one and is now invariably the child producing the fantasy. The fantasy is accompanied by a high degree of pleasure, and has now acquired a significant content, with the origin of which we shall be concerned later. Now, therefore, the wording runs: "I am being beaten by my father." [p. 185]

But Freud adds the following:

> This second phase is the most important and the most momentous of all. But we may say of it in a certain sense that it has > never had [any] real existence. It is never remembered, it has never succeeded in becoming conscious. It is a construction of analysis, but it is no less a necessity on that account. [p. 185]

My sense is that no one gives enough weight to the consequences of Freud's assertion here. In the final analysis, we never encounter the most significant phase. Nevertheless, it has to exist since it leads to a third phase.

Now, the formulation of the second phase is of great interest to us. It is tantamount, in effect, to the formulation of primary masochism. The latter comes in at the precise moment at which the subject gets closest to realizing himself as a subject in the signifying dialectic.

Freud rightly says that something essential happens between the first and the second phase: the subject sees the other being cast down from his dignity as an elevated subject, as a little rival. The opening that ensues makes him perceive that his whole being, qua existing being, resides in the very possibility of subjective cancellation. It is in coming as close as possible to being abolished that he weighs the dimension in which he subsists as a being who is subject to will, a 153 being who can formulate a wish.

We must seek out the phenomenology of masochism in masochistic literature, whether we like it or not, and whether it is pornographic or not. What is the essence of the masochist's fantasy, in the end, whether we look at a classic novel or a recent novel brought out by a semi-clandestine publisher? The subject imagines a series of experiences that go in a direction whose flank, border, or limit is based essentially on the fact that he is purely and simply treated like a thing, like something that, at its most extreme, is negotiated, sold, mistreated, and removed from any and every votive possibility of viewing himself as autonomous. He is treated like a dog, I would say, and not just any old dog – a dog that is mistreated and especially like a dog who has already been mistreated.

This is the turning or pivotal point of the second phase that we can only assume to exist. It is also the transformational base starting from which the subject will seek to enter into the final phase, in order to find therein the swivel or balance [or: tipping] point of his position – namely, $. For once he has entered into the dialectic of speech, assuming he enters into it, he must formulate himself as a subject somewhere.

Nevertheless, in the end, the neurotic subject is like Picasso. Picasso once came out with the following truly sovereign formulation: "I do not seek, I find." In effect, there is a certain type of person who seeks, and another type that finds. Believe me, neurotics – namely, everything man's struggle with speech spontaneously produces in subjects – find.

I would point out in this connection that trouver [to find] comes from the Latin word tropus [trope]. This refers quite explicitly to what I always talk about, the difficulties of rhetoric. It is curious that in the Romance languages the word that designates the fact of finding is borrowed from the language of rhetoric, whereas in the Germanic languages it is a different root that serves this purpose.

Let us stop for a moment at this third phase at which the subject thus gains his balance. It is immediately known to us, but perhaps 154 worth dwelling on nevertheless. What do we see right off the bat in the fantasy On bat un enfant ["A child is being beaten"]?

Who is doing the beating? It is On [the impersonal pronoun One]. When Freud would insistently ask his patient who was doing the beating, this person or that, there was nothing doing, he remained evasive. It was only after a certain amount of interpretive work that the subject could refind a certain paternal figure or image in his fantasy, insofar as the latter served as a prop for his desire when masturbating. But at the outset, the subject of the sentence was completely neutralized: it was On.

As for who is beaten, it is not difficult to grasp. It is multiple – many children, boys when the fantasizer is a girl. But there is no necessary connection between the sex of the child who fantasizes and the sex of the image fantasized about.

The greatest variations and uncertainties center, too, on the position of the child whose fantasy it is. We know that, up to a certain point, the child – in some way, whether it is a or a', $i(a)$ or a – is involved in this fantasy since he is the one who has it. But the child does not situate himself anywhere in a precise, unequivocal manner; his position swivels indefinitely.

I would now like to highlight something that is closely related to what I earlier called the distribution of the intra-subjective elements of the dream. Where is affect emphasized? In the dream about the dead father, this affect is pain and it targets the dreaming subject. Similarly, in the fantasy "a child is being beaten," which is indisputably a sadistic fantasy – and, moreover, in virtually all sadistic fantasies that we can observe, taken in their broadest extension – affect targets the fantasized image of the partner, not so much insofar as he is beaten but insofar as he is going to be beaten or does not know how he will be beaten.

I will come back to this extraordinary element when we talk about the phenomenology of anxiety. But I am already pointing out to you a nuanced distinction found in Freud's text, and which no one naturally has ever brought out regarding anxiety. We must not confuse the pure and simple loss of the subject in the darkness of subjective indetermination with something that is completely different from it: the fact that the subject becomes alert or erect, as it were, when faced with danger.

In Inhibitions, Symptoms, and Anxiety, Freud introduces a still more astonishing phenomenological distinction that is so subtle that it is not easy to translate into French. It is the distinction between abwarten, which I will endeavor to translate by subir [to undergo], n'en pouvoir mais [to be unable to do anything about it], or tendre le dos [brace oneself], and erwarten, which is s'attendre à [to expect]. The affect that is emphasized and attached to the other or partner – attached to he who is across from one, little a – is situated in this register or range in the sadist's fantasy. 155

Where, in the final analysis, is this subject – this subject who, in this case, is prey to something that he does not have [and that he would have to have] in order to know where he is? It would be easy to say that he is between the two [the beater and the beaten]. I would go further still – I would say that he is so truly between the two that he plays, in an exemplary manner, the role of the instrument with which the one hits the other. The subject is identical here to the instrument.

Indeed, the instrument is very frequently the essential personage in the imaginary structure of desire that we are trying to formulate here. We are always flabbergasted to see this, and we always have the best of reasons to be astonished by this, unless we do not want to see it. What is most paradoxical and the biggest warning for us is, in short, that the subject abolishes himself behind this signifier, which is altogether unveiled here in its nature as a signifier, insofar as he recognizes his essential being in it, if it is true that we can say with Spinoza that this essential being is his desire.

It is, in effect, to this same crossroads that we are led whenever a sexual problematic is brought up. The crux of the sexual problematic in women is the phallic phase. We began with this two years ago and Jones returns to it constantly in order to dispute and develop it. Jones's text manifests the kind of working over of a topic that we see in the course of a psychoanalysis.

The central focus of the phallic phase in girls is the relationship between hatred for the mother and desire for the phallus. It is on this very point that Freud bases the requirement [or: demand, exigence] that everyone have a phallus, a requirement that plays a role in the resolution of the Oedipus complex in boys, and a role in the entry into the Oedipus complex for girls. This requirement has a truly fundamental, generative [or: developmental, génétique] character.

The link between hatred for the mother and desire for the phallus is the strict meaning of Penisneid [penis envy]. Jones rightly underscores the ambiguities encountered every time we use this term. If 156 the desire to have a penis is inscribed in a rivalry with another, it presents itself in an ambiguous guise that clearly shows us that its meaning must be sought out beyond this. "Desire for the phallus" means desire mediated by the phallus. The mediating phallus plays an essential role in the mediation of desire.

This leads me to formulate the problem in terms that already introduce what I will later have to develop in my analysis of the construction of fantasy. We will have to figure out how to situate the place of the phallus as a signifier in imaginary experience. The latter, as we know, is profoundly structured by narcissistic forms that govern the relations between the subject and his semblable – that is to say, between the speaking subject, $, and little a, the other that the subject bears within himself.

Today, we have identified it with a. This means that the imaginary other is what the subject has inside himself as a "drive" – I put it in quotes, for what we have here is a drive that is not yet developed, a drive before it is taken up in the signifying dialectic, a drive in its primitive nature where it represents one or another manifestation of the subject's need. Nevertheless, if the subject, through the intermediary of specular reflection, must situate his needs in the image of the other, we see on the horizon what I initially referred to as the first identification with the Other in the radical sense – namely, identification with the Other's insignias. This is, in other words, the signifier capital I over little a.

$$\frac{\mathrm{I}}{a}$$

I am going to put on the board a schema that will be recognized by those who were here for the first year of my Seminar, when we spoke about narcissism. It is the schema of the parabolic mirror thanks to which we can make the image of a hidden flower appear in a vase sitting on a tray, whether it is lit from below or on the tray; owing to the property of spherical rays, this image is projected as a real image. This means that it momentarily produces the illusion that the flower is in the vase.

157 To conjure up this image in space, we must have a little screen over here [Lacan points to a part of the schema]. This might seem mysterious, but it is not. In effect, the illusion – namely the sight of this real image in the air – can only be perceived within a certain spatial field which is precisely determined by the diameter of the spherical mirror and mapped out in relation to the center of the mirror. The upshot being that, if the mirror is narrow, in order to see the image one must place oneself in a field where the rays reflected from the mirror cross anew its center, which assumes a certain lighting up [or: blossoming, épanouissement] of the spatial zone.

What was important in my little explanation back then was the following: if someone wanted to see this fantasized image get produced somewhere in space – inside the vase, or a little to the side of it, it makes no difference – where there is already a real object, and if this observer is situated at S_1, he could rotate the plane mirror in order to occupy the symmetrical and virtual position S_2, which is inside the cone of visibility of the image, and he would see the image of the flower in the plane mirror at the symmetrical point.

158 In other words, the ray of light that is reflected toward the observer is strictly symmetrical to what occurs on the other side, insofar as this observer has virtually come to occupy the place from which he will see the vase in the plane mirror – which he can expect since he is there – and, on the other hand, the real image which is produced in a place where he cannot see it directly.

This optical device is thus apt for representing the relationship or interplay between the subject's imaginary elements and his symbolic identificatory elements. I do not think that the way in which it does so betrays the psychoanalytic tradition, since, in the Traumdeutung, Freud offers up a schema of successive lenses in which the progressive passage from the unconscious to the preconscious is refracted. He was thus looking for analogous references in optics, as he says precisely [SE V, pp. 536, 611].

This is but a metaphor, one that represents the specular pathway by which the subject tries in fantasy to return to his place in the symbolic. Consequently, the $ is something other than an eye. The spherical mirror, which helps him return to his place in the symbolic, represents capital A here – it is a symbolic mirror. It is not the mirror in front of which the small child plays. What we have here is in fact a certain reflection that is constructed with the help of words, 159 in the course of the first learning of language, and thanks to which the subject learns to situate at the right distance the insignias with which he identifies.

These symbolic insignias correspond to what, on the other side, are the first imaginary ego identifications. We thus already find something preformed and open to symbolic fragmentation at the imaginary level, but which only enters into the play of fragmentation inasmuch as the symbolic exists and opens up its field to him. It is inside this field that, owing to the symbolic, a transformation of the imaginary relation occurs which is such, as I am already indicating to you, that there will always be, in erotic relations with the other, however advanced or fully developed we assume them to be, a reduction point that you can grasp as extrapolations of the erotic blueprint [épure] between subjects.

What is the transformation that is undergone by the first, fundamentally specular relationship between a and a' or $i(a)$, which regulates the relations between the subject and the other? The imaginary set of fragmented bodily elements must be distributed across the puppet with which we deal in the symbolic, inasmuch as we are puppets and our partners are too. But these puppets are missing something: the phallus.

The phallus is busy elsewhere, in the signifying function. When faced with the other, the subject identifies with the phallus, but he fragments qua himself when he is in the presence of the phallus. To spell this out as clearly as possible, I will ask you to dwell on what happens in relationships between men and women, even the most loving.

In men, desire is found outside the love relationship. The fully developed form of this relationship assumes, in effect, that the subject gives what he does not have, which is the very definition of love. On the other hand, the ideal form of desire, as it were, is realized in him inasmuch as he finds anew the complement of his being in a woman, insofar as she symbolizes the phallus.

In love, man truly becomes a slave of [s'aliéné à] the object of his desire, a slave to the phallus. But in the erotic act this same phallus nevertheless reduces the woman to being an imaginary object. This is why we find in men a splitting of the object [of love from that of desire], even at the very heart of the deepest, most intimate love relationships. I have often emphasized this when I have criticized the so-called genital relationship.

When we turn, on the other hand, to women's relationships to men, which people like to believe are more monogamous, we see that they present the same ambiguity – except that women find the real phallus in men. They are thus in a position to in fact obtain from such relationships a jouissance that satisfies their desire. 160

But, to the degree to which their desire is satisfied at the level of the real, their love, not their desire, concerns beings who are beyond the encounter with desire – namely, men insofar as they are deprived of the phallus, men insofar as, by their nature as fully developed beings, speaking beings, are castrated.

A DREAM ANALYZED BY ELLA SHARPE

THE LITTLE COUGH AS A MESSAGE

The brilliant Ella Sharpe

Since we spoke about desire quite a lot in the last few classes, we are now going to begin to broach the topic of interpretation. The graph of desire will serve us here, in the following form:

I will talk today about the interpretation of a dream that I will take as an example. I would like to introduce it by making a few remarks about what results from the indications Freud gives us on the topic of the interpretation of dreams.

In Chapter 6 of the Traumdeutung, Freud discusses the subject's mental impressions at the moment at which he recounts a dream.

We find that he has the impression that there is something missing in his narrative, which he has forgotten, or something that is ambiguous, doubtful, or uncertain. He underscores this uncertainty, doubtfulness, or ambiguity by saying things like, "It's not clear," "It was either this or that," "I don't remember now," or "I can no longer say." He even calls into question the degree of reality of what he saw in the dream – whether the fact that something was asserted in it with such realism that he took notice of it or that the dream struck him, on the contrary, as absurd. All of this, Freud tells us, in every case, must be taken to enunciate what he calls one of the "latent dream-thoughts."

In short, everything regarding the dream-text that is said by the subject as an aside – as if in the form of annotations accompanying a musical score to provide accents of tonality, like allegro, crescendo, or decrescendo – is part and parcel of the dream-text. This is truly fundamental.

I believe that for most of you, whom I assume to be already familiar with the Traumdeutung and the technique of dream interpretation, this is not new. I am thus merely recalling it to mind, for I do not have time here to go into the specific examples of this that we find in Freud's work. We see there, for instance, how the feeling of doubt the subject experiences at the moment at which he recounts a dream is integrated by Freud as one of the elements of the dream – indeed, as an element without which the dream cannot be interpreted.

Many of Freud's disciples took this rule of thumb regarding dream interpretation as an article of faith, without looking any further, lending credence, in some sense, to the unconscious. We, on the other hand, cannot simply accept it as it is. We do not take Freud's approach to interpretation as our point of departure without raising questions about what it implies.

Freud tells us that when your memory of a dream begins to fade, or on the contrary is called into question or stressed, this is not due solely to the unconscious tension that is at work there, but is con-
165 nected to the latent dream-thoughts themselves. What does this imply? What we have agreed to call the graph of desire allows us to indicate and articulate it more clearly and surely.

What do we do when we communicate a dream, whether it be in or outside of analysis? What, among all the possible enunciations, specifies the enunciation of a dream? Statements [énoncés] have, in effect, a certain structure with respect to the subject, and people did not wait for psychoanalysis to formulate it.

Among a discourse's event-related statements – I mean the statements that report events – we can legitimately distinguish, with regard to the signifying register, statements that we can group under the general heading of indirect speech [discours indirect]. These are statements that relate the enunciations of other subjects – that is, the signifying articulations of other people. Many things are introduced thereby, including statements involving hearsay: "I was told . . .," "So-and-so said . . .," and "Someone told me that this is what happened. . . ." Indirect speech is the most fundamental, or one of the most fundamental, forms of everyday speech [discours universel], for most of the things that we report stem from what we have gleaned from others.

Let us say that, generally speaking, a statement involves the reporting of a pure, simple, factual statement that we take as our own, on the one hand, and the dimension of enunciation that is latent, that is not necessarily made clear, but that becomes so as soon as we report someone else's statement, on the other hand. But we can also relate one of our own statements: we can say that we said such and such, that we bore witness to something to someone, and we can even enunciate that a statement we made [at a certain time and place] was completely false – in other words, we can admit that we lied.

One of these possibilities will hold our attention for a moment. What do we do when we enunciate a dream? We do something that is not entirely unique, at least not in the way I am going to define it now.

How did people view dreams before we psychoanalysts weighed in on the age-old debate? People objected to Freud that dreams have no signification and that they are simply the product of 166 unfocused [décomposition] mental activity. This so-called scientific position was, as it turned out, maintained for only a short time in history, whereas Freud underscored the fact that he was merely aligning himself with the longer-standing tradition. It is already quite important to know, as I just indicated, that the longer-standing tradition never failed to wonder about the signification of dreams.

In other words, as soon as a subject recounts his dream to someone else, the very form of enunciation in which he states the dream involves a question mark that is not just any old question mark, for it assumes that behind the dream there is something of which the dream is the signifier. We can write this, in our way of formalizing things, as follows: E(e). It involves the enunciation [E] of a statement [e for énoncé] that is itself marked by enunciation – in other words, that is itself assumed to take on a value which, naturally, is not factual or event-related.

In order to remain in the purely descriptive dimension, we must add a supplemental point here.

A small child who begins to tell you his dreams, says, "Last night, I had a dream." His spontaneous attitude is the same as the traditional attitude, but it is highly ambiguous here. If we observe closely, it is as if, at some moment, it had been revealed to the child that he had the possibility to express such things. And it goes so far that quite frequently one cannot truly know, at the age at which the child begins to tell you such matters in confidence, whether what he tells you is truly what he dreamt or something he brings you because he knows that people dream and that people can recount their dreams.

As we observe when we have contact with children, their dreams often seem to verge on fabrication. But if children have and tell dreams in such ways, it is with the lowercase e, marked by enunciation. There is something beyond the statement with which they play a game with you, making you wonder or become fascinated.

In short, every type of statement that recounts a dream, whether it be in or outside of analysis, corresponds to the formula E(e). This formula is not specific to dreams alone. I would say that it is the general formula of enigmas.

What then is signified by what Freud means? Let us look at it 167 on our little graph, which in this case takes the form you see on the blackboard [Figure 8.1]. How are we going to project the different elements of this formalization onto it? We can do so in several different ways.

This graph is of interest to us because it is structural. It is a structure that allows us to map the relationship between the subject and the signifier. In effect, from the very moment at which the subject is caught up in the signifier – and it is essential that he be caught up in it, for that is what defines him, the subject being the relationship between the individual and the signifier, between the individual and the signifier's structure – a network is necessarily imposed that forever remains fundamental. Let us thus try to see here how we can distribute the various functions involved in the enunciation of a dream on the graph.

A dream, which is a spontaneous creation, presents itself at first glance as being relatively total or monolithic – it is, I would say, a total statement. In French we say, "J'ai fait un rêve" [literally: "I made a dream," instead of "I had a dream" as in English], and we distinguish the dream from the one that followed it, which was not the same. A dream has the character of a discourse. At the moment at which we have/make a dream, nothing reveals the fragmentation or decomposition of the signifier in it. We have all sorts of retroactive indications that the fragmentation is there, having an impact on the function of all discourse, but at the moment at which the subject generates a discourse, and inasmuch as he cleaves to it, the choice he makes at each moment among signifiers remains in abeyance and unnoticed – otherwise it would be far more arduous for him to communicate it.

Insofar as it is given to us as a whole, a dream is the statement or signifying chain that is produced at the lower level of the graph, and that presents itself in the usual form of language, a form that is all the more global since it is closed. Nevertheless, the subject must make his report, must produce an enunciation about this statement; he must situate himself in relation to it, and stress certain portions of it to you in accordance with the greater or lesser degree of conviction he has about them. All of that, which accompanies the dream and which, in some sense, comments on it from a position for which the subject assumes more or less responsibility, is inscribed at the level of discourse for the Other, which is also the discourse in which the subject assumes responsibility for his dream.

In other words, when he tells you his dream, the subject himself is already present within the statement. And it is in the discourse in which the subject assumes responsibility for the dream vis-à-vis the person to whom he tells it that, as we see, he stresses certain things 168 and downplays others, expressing his greater or lesser assumption of responsibility for the narrative. He says, "It seemed to me, it appeared to me, that this was what happened at that moment." "At that moment, it was as if the person in the dream were at the same time someone else or turned into someone else."

These are what I am calling "stresses" [accents]; they are the different modes of enunciation according to which the subject assumes more or less responsibility for the lived experience of his dream, of this psychical event. These modes are situated on our graph on the line of the I of enunciation, a line that is fragmented and discontinuous. The graph indicates to you that this fragmentation is a feature of what is articulated at the level of enunciation, insofar as it involves the signifier.

I placed at the lower level the retroactive effect of the code [C] on the message [M], which, at every moment, gives meaning to a sentence. Let us note that phrasal units come in different sizes. At the end of a long lecture [discours], at the end of one of my classes here, for example, or at the end of one of my year-long Seminars, there is something that retroactively closes [boucle] the meaning of what I enunciated to you previously. But, up to a certain point, a similar loop [boucle] forms after each of the parts of my lecture, after each of the paragraphs.

We might want to know what the smallest unit is in which we find the effect that I call a "signification effect" – which must, in order to deserve its name, be a new creation, something made of language that goes beyond the usual ways of using the signifier. The smallest unit is obviously a sentence.

Let us ask now how this unit presents itself when a dream is reported to us. It is altogether clear here that what the subject does or does not assume responsibility for, believes or does not believe, or calls into question is not necessarily the whole of what he tells us. The subject's enunciative grip [prise] may be of a smaller scope: he may take responsibility for or challenge but one single sentence or even just fragments of a sentence.

In other words, the retroactive loop introduces the possibility of a much smaller degree of fragmentation at the upper level than at the lower level.

This remark puts us on the scent of what Freud implies when he 169 says that when the dreamer stresses the fact that he does or does not assume responsibility [for certain details], it is connected to the latent dream-thoughts.

Which tells us that this stress is situated at the level of enunciation, inasmuch as it is there that the importance of the signifier implied by free association is highlighted.

The signifying chain has two facets.

The first is the unity of a sentence's meaning, its phrasal signification or monolithic nature – in short, its "holophrastic" character. More accurately put, a sentence can be taken to have a meaning that is unique, to be something that forms a [single] signifier, even if it is transitory, but which stands on its own two feet, as it were, for as long as it exists.

The other facet of the signifier is what we call "free association." The latter is such that, for each of the elements of a sentence – no matter how minutely we break it down, stopping only when we reach its phonetic elements – something can intervene that makes one of its signifiers disappear and puts another signifier in its place. Therein lies the essential property of the signifier.

This is related to the aspect of the subject's will [vouloir] that is indicated by the retroactive loop. Without the subject knowing it, in a way of which he is unconscious and which is beyond his intention, his speech is at every moment affected by some parenthetical clause [incidente] that intervenes in the choice of elements in the signifying chain. We see the effects of this emerge at the surface, for example in the form of a phonemic slip of the tongue – this is the most elementary form. The simple change of a syllable in a word suffices to show that another signifying chain is present and active there, this second signifying chain having interrupted the first one in order to implant another meaning in it.

At the level of the assuming of responsibility for the statement by the subject, which is apparently the most developed level, the interpretive rule proposed by Freud implies that the I is posited as conscious. Nevertheless, we shall not say that the statement is produced by this I, since the enigma here remains complete: whose statement is it that we talk about at the level of enunciation? The subject does not come down on any one side; but if he says "I dreamt," it is with a characteristic connotation and stress that shows 170 that he who has dreamt nevertheless presents himself to the subject as problematic.

Who is the subject of enunciation contained in the statement in question? Thus far, we are still at the stage of wondering about this. This subject was long considered to be a god, before becoming, more or less with Aristotle, the "himself" of the subject.

As for what lies beyond the subject – that is to say, the Freudian unconscious – the question of its alterity is no less perennial. An entire oscillation or vacillation is produced around it. What the subject then takes up from this beyond is of the same fragmenting nature and has the same value as a signifying element, as what is produced in the spontaneous phenomenon of substitution or malfunctioning of the signifier, which is what Freud shows us to be the normal pathway for deciphering the meaning of a dream.

In other words, the fragmentation that occurs at the level of enunciation, insofar as the latter implies assumption of responsibility for the dream by the subject, is situated for Freud at the same level and is of the same nature as the pathway of the dream's interpretation – namely, the maximal breaking down [décomposition] or spelling out of signifying elements. This spelling out highlights the dream's possibilities, which appear only inasmuch as the signifying chain is intersected by all the other chains that can cross it and interweave with it, at each of its elements and at each of the gaps that it leaves.

When does interpretation most nearly approach what Freud considers to be unconscious? When, in the subject's discourse, we make the current signification vacillate in order to allow the signifiers that are involved in the enunciation to become detached from each other. This is true of dreams in a still more exemplary fashion than of any other sort of discourse.

What are we on the trail of in psychoanalysis? What are we analysts seeking? We are looking for something essential that happened in the subject that keeps certain signifiers repressed. Well, this unconscious lies precisely in the gaps where the signifier is involved. The signifier also puts us on a path toward the subject's desire.

Desire is the x in the subject that is caught up in the signifying 171 network, in the links in the signifying system, that is subjected to the filtering and sifting of the signifier. Our goal is to reveal and restore it in his discourse. How can we do so? What does it imply that we can do so?

According to Freudian theory and practice, as I have told you, the status of desire is to be excluded and enigmatic. With respect to the subject, it is essentially tied to the existence of repressed signifiers as such, and restoring desire involves the return of these signifiers. But this is not to say that restoring these signifiers purely and simply enunciates desire.

What is articulated in repressed signifiers, which is always a demand, is one thing; desire – inasmuch as desire is that by which the subject situates himself, owing to the existence of discourse, with respect to this demand – is another. It is not so much a matter of what he demands but of what he is as a function of this demand.

To the degree to which his demand is repressed or masked, the subject's being is expressed in a closed way in his desire's fantasy. There would be no question of the subject's being if there were no demand or discourse. It is fundamentally language that introduces the dimension of being for the subject and at the same time robs him of it.

The restoring of the meaning of the fantasy – that is, of something that is imaginary – is inscribed on the graph [see Figure 2.2] between the two lines: between the statement of the subject's intention, on the one hand, and the enunciation in which the subject reads his intention in a profoundly decomposed, fragmented, and refracted form through spoken language [langue], on the other. Fantasy – in which the subject usually suspends his relationship to being – is always enigmatic, more enigmatic than anything else. And what does the subject want? That we interpret it.

To interpret desire is to restore something to which the subject cannot gain access by himself – namely, the affect that designates his being and that is located at the level of the desire that is truly his. I am referring here to the precise desire that intervenes in one or another of his life events – whether masochistic desire, suicidal desire, or even selfless [oblatif] desire. What must happen is that something that occurred in a way that was closed off to the subject take on anew its meaning in relation to the masked discourse that is involved in this desire, take on anew its meaning in relation to being, confronting the subject with being.

This true meaning is, for example, meaning that is defined by what I would call "positional affects related to being." These are 172 the affects that we refer to with essential terms – "love," "hate," and "ignorance" – but there are many others as well which we should catalogue and examine.

What people refer to as affect is not something that is purely and simply opaque and closed off, not something that is somehow beyond discourse or a nucleus of lived experience that comes to us out of the blue. Affect is something that is always and very precisely connoted by a certain stance the subject adopts with respect to being. I mean, with respect to being insofar as what is proposed to him is, in its fundamental dimension, symbolic. But it also happens that, on the contrary, affect constitutes, within the symbolic, an eruption of the real that is highly disturbing.

It is hard not to see that a fundamental affect like anger is nothing but the following: the real that intervenes at the very moment at which we have woven a fine symbolic web, where everything is going well, order, law, our merit, and our pleasure [bon vouloir]. We realize suddenly that the square pegs do not fit into the round holes. That is the origin of anger as an affect. All is well on the bridge formed by the ships on the Bosphorus, but a tempest blows in that whips up the sea. All anger involves whipping up the waters.

Affect can also be related to the intrusion of desire itself. This intrusion gives rise to a form of affect to which we will return.

But when it comes to a whole category of fundamental affects at least, affect is essentially the connotation that is characteristic of a stance adopted by a subject – a stance that involves, among other possible stances, putting himself into play or putting himself to work in relation to the necessary lines that are imposed on him by his envelopment in the signifier.

Let us now turn to an example.

I have selected this example from someone posterior to Freud. It allows us to clearly articulate what we mean in psychoanalysis by the desire in a dream. And in order to proceed in a way that leaves no room for an overly arbitrary choice, I selected Chapter 5 of the 173 book entitled Dream Analysis by Ella Sharpe, in which she proceeds to analyze a single, simple dream, one whose analysis she takes as far as possible, as far as is possible for her, that is.

In the preceding chapters, she discusses a certain number of perspectives, laws, and mechanisms, examining, for example, the impact of dreams in psychoanalytic practice, and – going further still – the problems posed by the analysis of dreams or of what happens in the dreams of people who are in analysis. But Chapter 5 is the crux of the book, for in it she provides a singularly exemplary dream. She uses it to bring in and illustrate everything she has to say regarding the way in which analytic practice shows us that we must in fact be guided when we analyze dreams.

What this practitioner contributes that is new – in other words, that is not already included in Freud's Traumdeutung – is essentially the idea that a dream is not simply something that turns out to be significant, but that it plays a role in the ongoing analytic dialogue, which is not the same at one moment in the analysis as it is at another. In short, dreams accompany analytic discourse in an active, determined way that clarifies and extends the work accomplished. Briefly stated, dreams are dreamt not only for the analysis but often for the analyst, and they bear a message within the analysis.

Ella Sharpe, like a number of other authors, should be credited for not shying away from dream analysis, whereas certain analysts believe they have no need to concern themselves with dreams – I drew this to your attention in the talk I gave at Royaumont on the direction of the treatment – because they believe they involve some sort of intellectual activity.

The status of thought with regard to dreams is no inconsiderable question. It is all a matter of how we stress it. If dreams present themselves as the subject matter of discourse or discursive elaboration, this fact is in itself important as regards the nature of the unconscious. The unconscious is not located in some sort of psychical pouch [besace] in which it is found in some unconstituted state, but is rather located in the latencies of discourse. Is it shy of or is it immanent in what the subject formulates, with respect to his discourse or his enunciation? That is another question. The fact 174 remains that it is legitimate to take dreams as they have always been taken – that is, as "the royal road to the unconscious" [SE V, p. 608].

To come now to the dream that Sharpe presents us, I will begin by reading it to you, before showing you the problems that it poses. I will highlight a brief warning she provides about the topic, and will, in fact, highlight the whole chapter. Our coordinates apply, as you will see, better than any others, to what she enunciates, while allowing us to better orient ourselves in it.

The patient in question arrives at his session one day – I will mention various circumstances that help us contextualize the dream later, for he only recalls them after having certain very important associations [– and eventually proffers the following]:

> I do not know why I should now think of my dream last night. It was a tremendous dream. It went on for ages and ages. It would take me the rest of the hour to relate it all. But don't worry; I shall not bore you with it all for the simple reason that I cannot recall it. But it was an exciting dream, full of incident, full of interest. I woke hot and perspiring. It must have been the longest dream I ever had. [p. 132]

He says that he does not remember the infinity or flood of elements in the dream he had, but brings up a rather short scene instead.

"I dreamt I was taking a journey with my wife around the world. . . ." There is a subtle nuance here that is perhaps not sufficiently emphasized. The order in which the circumstantial complements appear is worth noting, for it is not, it seems to me, the normal order in French, which would be: "I was taking a journey around the world with my wife." I do not believe that I am mistaken in saying that the patient's wording might be striking even to an English ear.

> I dreamt I was taking a journey with my wife around the world, and we arrived in Czechoslovakia where all kinds of things were happening. I met a woman on a road, a road that now reminds me of the road I described to you in the two other dreams lately in which I was having sexual play with a woman in front of another woman. [p. 132]

Here, Sharpe switches from italics to Roman type to indicate that 175 the patient is making a tangential remark about the dream.

> So it happened in this dream. [Then back to the dream itself in italics, interspersed with associations in Roman type:] This time my wife was there while the sexual event occurred. The woman I met was very passionate looking and I am reminded of a woman I saw in a restaurant yesterday. She was dark and had very full lips, very red and passionate looking . . .

The patient thus describes them both as passionate looking.

> . . . and it was obvious that had I given her any encouragement she would have responded. She must have stimulated the dream, I expect. In the dream the woman wanted intercourse with me and she took the initiative which as you know is a course which helps me a great deal. If the woman will do this I am greatly helped. In the dream the woman actually lay on top of me; that has only just come to my mind. She was evidently intending to put my penis in her body. I could tell that by the manoeuvers she was making. I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her.

Here again the patient editorializes: "It sounds quite wrong to use that verb transitively. One can say 'I masturbated' and that is correct, but it is all wrong to use the word transitively" [pp. 132–3].

In effect, the English verb "masturbate" does not take on the reflexive form as in French. The English "I masturbate" means "Je me masturbe" in French [the latter is a reflexive construction]. The analyst immediately picks up on this remark. The patient then adds a few confirmatory remarks, beginning to associate to his own masturbatory activities. He goes further into things later, too.

So there we have the statement of the dream. It gives you an inkling of why it will be of interest to us here.

I am, I must say, adopting a thoroughly arbitrary mode of exposition here, and I could just as easily approach things differently. Don't think that the pathway by which I am proceeding here is one that I am recommending you follow systematically when you interpret dreams. I am doing so here simply in order to provide a quick sketch of what we are trying to see and demonstrate.

In the dream about the dead father, I was able to designate – following Freud, and in such a way that you could see my approach was not devoid of artifice – the signifiers "as he wished," "he" referring here to the son. Similarly, we shall see in the dream reported by Sharpe's patient with what signifier the fantasy in the dream [fantasme du rêve] culminates. This fantasy is expressed in the following words: "I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her." The subject immediately remarks that it is altogether incorrect to use the verb "to masturbate" transitively. The entire analysis of the dream will show us that the true meaning of what is at stake here can be found by re-establishing the intransitivity of the verb.

She is "so disappointed" by what? The whole text of the dream indicates it well enough: she is disappointed by the fact that our subject is barely participating, even though, according to what he says, everything in the scene in the dream is designed to incite him to do so, such that he would normally be greatly aided by the position she assumes. This is no doubt what is at work here, and I will say that the second part of the sentence ["I thought that I would masturbate her"] presents itself as having an understandable content, a feature that closely corresponds to what Freud articulates as being one of the characteristics of dream formation – namely, secondary revision.

Nevertheless, the subject himself observes that this is not as straightforward as it seems because his use of the verb does not sound quite right. It suffices for us to follow the rule of thumb given by Freud to realize that this observation puts us on the trail of the dream-thought. And therein lies the desire.

In effect, the subject tells us that one would usually say, 'I thought she could masturbate,' which is the normal form in which the wish would present itself: 'She can just go ahead and masturbate if she isn't happy!' The subject indicates rather energetically that masturbation is an activity that is not transitive, in the sense that it is not carried out by one subject on another, but rather intransitive, which means in this case something done by the subject to himself, since "I masturbated" means "Je me suis masturbé." It is important not to come down on any particular side here; we must simply note that the first indication given by the subject immediately goes in the direction of rectifying a signifying articulation.

We are now going to turn to an earlier part of the chapter – prior 177 to the narrative of the dream, before the arrival center stage of this scene, and before the account of this particular session – where we find a short preamble by the author regarding the patient's psychical constellation. What she puts into her premises are found anew in her results. And we will find reasons to critique these results.

Let us turn immediately to what will allow us to move forward here. Ella Sharpe comments that the patient is obviously very bright. We will get a better and better sense of his behavior as we focus in on things.

He is a man of a certain age who is married and works as a lawyer. What she tells us is worth being highlighted word for word. "When the time came for him to practise at the bar he developed severe phobias. Put briefly this" – this is all she tells us about the mechanism of his phobia, but we lend credence to what she says because she is one of the best analysts, one of the most intuitive and penetrating who ever lived – "meant that he dare not work successfully but that he must stop working in reality because he would be only too successful" [p. 127]. The comment the analyst makes here – that it was not that he had an affinity to failure, but rather that he stopped short, as it were, when the immediate possibility of throwing his ample gifts into relief presented itself – is worth keeping in mind. You will see how we shall make use of it in what follows.

Let us leave aside what the analyst tells us right from the outset about how this might connect up with his father – we will return to it later. We simply need to know that his father died when the patient was three years old and that he had said nothing about him in his analysis for a very long time other than that he "is dead" [p. 126]. This rightly draws the analyst's attention. She hears – and it seems hardly possible to dispute this – that he does not wish to recall that his father ever lived. When he recalls that his father was alive, it is, she tells us, an altogether "startling"* event for him that frightens him [p. 126].

The subject's stance in the analysis is immediately taken to imply that the death wish he had toward his father is the mainspring both of this forgetting of his living father and of any and every articulation of his desire, inasmuch as the dream reveals it. Nevertheless, nothing indicates to us in any way that this aggressive intention is at 178 the origin of a fear of reprisal. An attentive study of the dream will allow us to show this in detail.

What else does the analyst tell us about this patient? She tells us that that day, like other days, she did not hear him arrive at her office, and on this score she provides a short paragraph that is truly brilliant on the topic of the patient's nonverbal presentation. Her description corresponds to the recent trendy practice of noting in patients all the little behavioral details that an attentive analyst knows how to detect. She tells us that she can never hear this one arrive.

The reader grasps from the context that people reach her office by climbing a flight of stairs. She can easily detect a patient of hers who climbs the stairs two at a time, because he makes an "extra thud"* [p. 129]. The English term here has no equivalent in French, designating as it does a flat, dull sound, the sound that might be made by a foot on a stair covered with carpet, a sound that gets a bit louder when one goes up the stairs two at a time. "Another [patient] hurries and I detect the hustle. . . ." The whole paragraph runs on in this vein and is quite delectable, literarily speaking. It is nevertheless but a tangent, for what is important is what this particular patient does.

The patient is perfectly polite, a bit uptight, and always does things in the exact same way:

> He never varies. He always gets on the couch one way. He always gives a conventional greeting with the same smile, a pleasant smile, not forced or manifestly covering hostile impulses. There is never anything as revealing as that would be. [p. 130]

The analyst's sensibility keeps her well oriented here: "There is no sign of hurry, nothing haphazard, no clothes awry; no marks of a quick toilet; no hair out of place. [. . .] He lies down and makes himself easy" [p. 130].

And he never immediately mentions any sort of upsetting event, for example, that his maid did something that made him late for his session – if she did, it will only be mentioned after quite a while, at the end of the session or even at the next session. "He talks the whole hour, clearly, fluently, in good diction, without hesitation and with many pauses. He speaks in a distinct and even voice for it expresses thinking and never feeling" [p. 130].

As for what should be made of the distinction between thought and feeling, we will all naturally agree [that it is spurious]. What is important here is obviously to know what is signified by the specific mode of communication adopted by the subject. We see here a sort 179 of sterilization of the text of the session that makes the analyst wish that something more deeply felt would come out. Nevertheless, the fact that the subject expresses himself in this way must naturally have a meaning. Any analyst would think that the patient must be afraid of something. The absence of feelings, as the analyst puts it, does not necessarily imply that there is absolutely nothing to include under the heading of feeling.

I spoke earlier about affect as concerning and revealing the subject's relation to being. We must wonder what, in this case, can be communicated by the pathway of affect. It is all the more germane to wonder about this as the session that day opens with a communication regarding affect.

The discordance that exists between the analyst's silence when faced with something she had already noted a few days earlier, and the surprise she experiences, as she herself notes, the day the patient begins talking about it to her of his own accord, clearly shows what additional step must be taken with respect to the analyst's ordinary stance in order to gauge what is at stake in this particular case. For what begins to open up here, is going to open up more and more, as we shall see, right up until the analyst's final interpretation and its astonishing effect. What is truly astonishing is not the simple fact that this interpretation was made, but that it is classified by Sharpe as a satisfying and even exemplary interpretation owing to its fruitful nature.

What happens? In this context, which is characterized by the subject's perfect politeness – he keeps his nose completely clean – something has been happening for the last few days. He has been arriving at his analyst's door, and just before entering he has been going "Uh, hum!" That is even saying too much, for it is, as Sharpe tells us, the "discreetest of coughs" [p. 130].

Ella Sharpe was a brilliant woman, as every aspect of her style indicates. She was some sort of elementary school teacher before becoming an analyst, which is very fine training for being able to see deeply into people's psychology. She was certainly a very talented woman. She hears this "little cough" as though it were the arrival of the dove at Noah's Ark. The cough announces that, hidden somewhere, there is a place where feelings live. Oh, she tells herself, I 180 would never speak to him about that, because if I did he would tuck it all away again.

This is the classic analytic stance in such cases. The rule is to never make comments to a patient about his physical comportment at a certain stage of his analysis, when it is important to simply observe it. I mean, his way of coughing, lying down, buttoning or unbuttoning his jacket, everything that his ingrained motor bearing says about him – inasmuch as this attitude can take on the value of a signal and inasmuch as all of that goes right to the quick of his narcissism.

Yet, this rule in no wise applies to something like this little cough. Here we see the symbolic power and dimension insofar as it extends to everything in the vocal register. Regardless of the fact that a cough may give the impression of being a purely somatic event, it is situated in the same dimension as sounds like "Uh, huh" and "Yes . . ." that certain analysts sometimes make, quite authoritatively, and that clearly have the effect of encouraging the patient to say more.

The best proof of this is that, to the analyst's great surprise, the cough is the first thing the patient speaks to her about that day. In his "customary even and deliberate voice," he tells her:

> I have been considering that little cough that I give just before I enter the room. The last few days I have coughed I have become aware of it, I don't know whether you have. To-day when the maid called me to come upstairs I made up my mind I would not cough. To my annoyance, however, I realized I had coughed just as I had finished. It is most annoying to do a thing like that, most annoying that something goes on in you or by you that you cannot control, or do not control. One would think some purpose is served by it, but what possible purpose can be served by a little cough of that description it is hard to think. [p. 131]

The analyst advances with snakelike stealth, and asks, well, "What purpose could be served" by it?

He replies, "Well, it is the kind of thing that one would do if one were going into a room where two lovers were together." He recounts that he once did something like that when he was a child 181 before entering a room where his brother was with his girlfriend – he coughed just before entering because he thought they were perhaps kissing and that it would be better if they stopped before he came in, for they would then feel less embarrassed than if he surprised them.

The analyst then asks, "And why cough before coming in here?" He replies:

> That is absurd, because naturally I should not be asked to come up if someone were here [. . .]. There is no need for a cough at all that I can see. It has, however, reminded me of a phantasy I had of being in a room where I ought not to be, and thinking someone might think I was there, and then I thought to prevent anyone from coming in and finding me there I would bark like a dog. That would disguise my presence. The "someone" would then say, "Oh, it's only a dog in there." [pp. 131–2]

"A dog?" the analyst cautiously inquires. The patient continues:

> That reminds me of a dog rubbing himself against my leg, really masturbating himself. I'm ashamed to tell you because I did not stop him. I let him go on and someone might have come in. [p. 132]

Then he coughs lightly and recounts the dream I mentioned earlier.

We will come back to this in detail next time, but can't we already note that the dream comes to his mind right after the coughing episode? In all probability, the little cough is a message. Sharpe herself suspects as much, moreover, since she brings it into the analysis of the dream and even places it in the spotlight. The little cough is a message, but we want to know about what.

Secondly, we can observe that it is a message twice over [or: to the second power, au second degré], insofar as the patient speaks about it explicitly and not unconsciously, and it is by this very pathway that he introduces the dream. Were he simply to say, "I coughed," it would already be a message, but he does not simply say that he coughed, he says, 'I coughed, and that means something.' And immediately afterward, he begins telling stories that are singularly

182 suggestive. The cough obviously means 'I am here. If you're doing something fun but that you would rather not have somebody else see, it's time to cut it short.'

But we will fail to see what is at stake in this cough if we do not take into account the narrative that is provided at the same time. He tells us that he thought of dissimulating his presence in a room – his presence as such, I would say – by doing the very thing that would obviously attract attention, namely, barking. This presents itself with all the trappings of fantasy.

First of all, it is the subject himself who presents this as a fantasy, one he had in his childhood. Moreover, nothing shows better than this fantasy in what way the subject fills out his empty form – namely, that he must adorn himself [or: invest or protect himself, se parer] with a signifier, that he finds himself adorned by the effect of the signifier. Indeed, we find anew here all the characteristics of the use made by children of what present themselves as natural signifiers, when they use them as attributes to signify something – a dog, for example, which children sometimes call a bowwow. But here, where the subject is included in a fantasized activity, he attributes the bowwow to himself.

In this fantasy, in short – a fantasy that is altogether unrealizable [inapplicable] – if he signals his presence it is insofar as he makes himself into something other than what he is. He is supposed to manifest himself as other than he is; he makes himself absent; he even banishes himself from the realm of speech, making himself into an animal, literally naturalizing himself. No one will go check to see if he is there because he will have presented and articulated himself in the most elementary signifier [barking]. They will not think "There's nothing there," but literally that "There is no one there [Il y a personne]." This is truly what the subject announces to us in his fantasy: Inasmuch as I am in the presence of the Other, I am no one. This is Odysseus' response, "οὔτις" [meaning nobody or no one] when asked his name by the Cyclops.

These are no more than the subject's associations to his dream. We will have to take the analysis further in order to see in what sense and how the subject is no one [personne]. There is of course something correlated to this on the side of the other who must be warned and who turns out to be, in this case as in the dream, a woman. His relation to women in general certainly plays a role in the situation.

To articulate the something that the subject is not, and that he 183 cannot be, will direct us, as you shall see, toward the most fundamental of symbols involved in the subject's identification.

If the subject absolutely wants, and everything points to this, his female partner to masturbate, to take care of herself, it is assuredly so that she will not take care of him. Why doesn't he want her to take care of him? In what way doesn't he want it?

The usual time granted to us for this class does not allow us to articulate it today, so we shall put it off till next time.

THE FANTASY ABOUT THE BARKING DOG

The cough, a signifier of the Other
Analyzing the fantasy without understanding it
Dogs go meow, cats go bowwow

Masturbating dog = ego-ideal

When we ended last time, we were in the middle of analyzing a dream that Ella Sharpe calls "single" – that is, singular or unique. She devotes an entire chapter to it; it is a chapter on which the whole earlier part of her book converges, and she [then goes on to] add to it in various ways.

Her book, which is made up of lectures given to analysts-in-training and based on some thirty years of wide-ranging psychoanalytic experience, is original in that it is explicitly devoted to the analysis of dreams, which is why it is important to us.

This extremely interesting dream was the main topic of one session she had with a patient. Her discussion of it – along with the connections she establishes, not merely among the dream associations and her interpretations, but also among all the messages of the session taken as a whole – demonstrates that she has considerable sensitivity regarding the direction and meaning of the analysis.

She interprets the dream line by line, as one should. As we shall see in detail, she interprets it as though it were a desire linked to her patient's wish for omnipotence. Whether this is justified or not, you should already realize that, if this dream can be of interest to us, it is with respect to the angle by which I tried to show you what is ambiguous and misleading in the one-sided notion according to which – in the wish for omnipotence, this wish for the possibility or perspective of potency that one might call the neurotic wish – it is always the subject's omnipotence that is at issue.

For it is quite obvious that the omnipotence at issue is the omnipotence of discourse. This does not imply in the least that the subject feels himself to be the mainstay or guardian of discourse. If 186 what he is dealing with is the omnipotence of discourse, it is via the Other that he proffers it.

This is especially forgotten in the way Ella Sharpe orients her interpretation of the dream.

I will begin by indicating to you what we will see at the end, because we will probably not manage to finish our discussion of the dream in today's class. Such an elaborate piece of work brings up a host of things – and a still greater host of things when we realize that, in the final analysis, almost nothing has been said on the topic [of dreams], even though we operate in this realm every day.

Ella Sharpe thus argues with her patient about his wish for omnipotence, and as she puts it, his aggressive omnipotence [p. 145].

To begin with, this patient, about whom she absolutely does not give us all the background information, has in his profession – he is a lawyer – major difficulties whose neurotic character is so obvious that she goes into them in detail. Indeed, she indicates that it is not so much that he is afraid of failure but rather of success, of having too much success. It is by modulating the very definition of his symptom that she highlights a split and introduces into the analysis a nuance that warrants our attention owing to its obviously subtle nature.

She mentions that the patient has other difficulties as well that go beyond his professional activities, extending to the whole of his relations with other people. They manifest themselves especially in games – in tennis, for instance. The sorts of difficulties he has concern, for example, the fact that he has a hard time doing what is necessary to win a game or a set – namely, to corner his adversary at one end of the tennis court and, as people often do, hit the ball to the opposite end of the court where his opponent cannot reach it. The highlighting of such symptoms by the analyst is quite helpful in confirming that the patient suffers from a problem manifesting his potency, or more accurately stated, his power.

This leads her to intervene in a certain way, which elicits in the patient a certain number of reactions in which she clearly rejoices, 187 in a word. This is the crowning moment at which she indicates where his desire lies, and it is truly in the sense in which we define desire here. One might almost say that she aims at desire in its relation to demand – as you will see, this is truly what she does.

The problem is that she interprets this desire as if it were an aggressive conflict, situating it at the level of an imaginary conflict. She thinks essentially and primarily in terms of dyadic relations. I will show you what justifies her in broaching things in this way, but I want to immediately raise the question here whether the appropriateness of this type of interpretation is truly legitimated by the two reactions with which she justifies it.

The first reaction comes three days after the session in which the patient related to her the lovely dream we discussed, which was a crucial moment in the analysis and one in which she delivered the first sketch of her dyadic-type interpretation that his aggressiveness was grounded in a [feared] repercussion or transference of his wish for omnipotence. The patient tells her what resulted from this – for the first time in ages, since childhood, he wet his bed! This is striking and astonishing in an adult patient. We will come back to this in detail in order to indicate the problem that is raised by it.

The second reaction occurs in the course of the week that followed the session in which he recounted the dream, on the occasion of a game of tennis that he lost. He happened to have one of those difficulties well known to tennis players who have the opportunity to glimpse the way they put their abilities to work, who are sometimes unable to garner the reward for their obvious superiority, for they are unable to manifest it. One of his usual partners teased him regarding the lost game, with a sensitivity to his unconscious impasses that in the end constitute the fabric of this game, and that are reflected in the skirmishing dialogue between the players, joking and teasing each other about which one got the upper hand. At that point, the patient became so furious he grabbed his opponent by the neck and cornered him in the back of the court, ordering him to never tease him like that again [pp. 147–8].

I am not saying that the general direction of and order in which Ella Sharpe made her interpretations have no foundation whatsoever. We shall see that she employed elements that ring true on the 188 basis of the minutest dissection of the material. But she also has preconceived ideas. The latter are, after all, often founded – for an error is never generated except through a lack of truth – but they are grounded in another register that she knows neither how to articulate nor how to handle, even if she provides us with the necessary elements, which is what makes this case study precious to us.

The point on which her interpretation bears is at a lower degree of complexity, since she situates everything at the level of imaginary rivalry and power struggles. Yet if we carefully sift the material included in her text, we will see – and in a striking manner, I believe – what she leaves out. What is at work in the session she analyzes, and the dream that lies center-stage in that session, manifests itself with so much coherence that it incites us to see if we cannot center things better with the help of the categories that I have been proposing for a long time, and whose map I have tried to give you in the form of the topological schema, the graph, that we use.

Let me remind you that in the dream the patient takes a journey with his wife around the world. He arrives in Czechoslovakia, "where all kinds of things were happening" [p. 132]. He underscores the fact that there were plenty of things that took place before that moment in the dream, but that he has forgotten them, such that the dream does not take very long to recount.

He meets a woman on a road, and the road reminds him of another road he has dreamt about, which he already described to his analyst in two recent dreams. On this road, there had been "sexual play with a woman," and this had occurred "in front of another woman" [p. 132]. The same thing happens in this dream, as he tells us in a digression.

> This time my wife was there while the sexual event occurred. The woman I met was very passionate looking and I am reminded of a woman I saw in a restaurant yesterday. She was dark and had very full lips, very red and passionate looking, and it was obvious that had I given her any encouragement she would have responded. She must have stimulated the dream, I expect. In the dream the woman wanted intercourse with me and she took the initiative which as you know is a course which helps me a great deal. If the woman will do this I am greatly helped. In the dream the woman actually lay on top of me; that has only just 189 > come to my mind. She was evidently intending to put my penis in her body. I could tell that by the manoeuvers she was making. I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her. [pp. 132–3]

Immediately thereafter comes the remark that only makes sense in English: "It sounds quite wrong to use that verb transitively. One can say 'I masturbated' and that is correct" [p. 133]. We shall see in what follows in the text another example that clearly shows that when you employ "to masturbate" in English, in French it means "se masturber." The originally reflexive nature of the verb is so strong that the patient makes on this score what is, strictly speaking, a philological remark, and it is obviously no accident that he does so at that very moment.

As I said last time, if we proceed as we did in the previous dream, we can complete this sentence by restoring the avoided signifiers, as follows: "she was so disappointed" to not have my penis, or to not have a penis, that I thought 'she should masturbate,' and not "I would masturbate her." She can just go ahead and masturbate! You will see in what follows what allows us to complete things in this way.

After that, we have a series of associations and a dialogue between the analyst and the patient. They do not go very far, but nevertheless give us quite enough food for thought. As there are almost three pages of them in all, I will pick up on them later so as not to tire you.

Ella Sharpe wrote this chapter for pedagogical purposes. Finding herself in a didactic role, she summarizes what we read in the session and establishes a catalogue of what the patient brought her, in order to show to those she is teaching exactly what the material is from which she makes a choice in order to ground both the interpretation that she has in mind and her selection of a part of the interpretation to convey to the patient. She emphasizes the fact that the two are far from coinciding, since what should be said to the patient is probably not all of what there is to say about the patient. In what the patient brought her, there are things that are worth saying and others that should not be said.

The first thing he brought up was the cough, the little cough that 190 the patient gave that day before entering the consulting room, and that she had already heard him give at the same moment for the past few days.

Given the way the patient behaves, which is so contained and uptight, so obviously indicative of defense – Sharpe senses this very clearly and she is far from reducing it to a defense like "defense against his own feelings" – she sees in this cough a manifestation, that she considers spontaneous, of a more immediate presence than his attitude in which everything is reflected upon and in which nothing is reflected. This "little cough," as the patient calls it, might have given no pause for thought to others, whereas for her, however miniscule it may be, it is literally like an olive branch. In this cough she hears the announcement that some sort of drop in the level of the floodwaters has begun. Thus it is as if she says to herself, "Let's respect that," and refrains from pointing it out to him.

Then the unexpected happens: the patient himself begins talking at great length about the little cough. I discussed this with you last time, and we will return to it and to the way in which Ella Sharpe understands it – and to the way in which we should, in my view, understand it.

In this crucial session, the patient does not bring up the dream he had right away. He begins by recounting the series of associations that came to him after having noticed the cough he was giving before entering the consulting room, whereas he had always climbed the flight of stairs so discreetly that the analyst did not hear him. He had resolved not to cough again this time, but a cough came out all the same. It bothers him a lot that there is something in him that he cannot control, and he wonders what it might mean.

We are now going to return to what he says by following the way in which Ella Sharpe registers it in her own perspective. She establishes a catalogue of what she calls the "ideas concerning the purpose of a cough" [p. 136].

First of all, this cough brings with it "thoughts of lovers being together." What did the patient say? After having spoken about his cough and wondered what purpose it might have served, he said the following:

> Well, it is the kind of thing that one would do if one were going into a room where two lovers were together. If one were approaching such a place one might cough a little discreetly and so let them know they were going to be disturbed. I have done 191 > that myself when, for example, I was a lad of fifteen and my brother was with his girl in the drawing-room I would cough before I went in so that if they were embracing they could stop before I got in. They would not then feel as embarrassed as if I had caught them doing it. [p. 131]

It is not insignificant to underscore in this regard that the cough is a message. The patient indicated this, and we suspect as much anyway because everything that followed corroborated it. Let me immediately comment on this.

Even if this seems a bit persnickety, consider nevertheless that the order of the remarks that I am going to make now will show you that starting from here, everything else follows – namely, what I called the drop in level that characterizes Sharpe's interpretation. Given the way she analyzes things, she does not grasp, or at least does not highlight, what it is important to bring out. Which is that the subject did not simply cough but that he in some sense came to tell the analyst – to her great surprise, even she mentions this – that it was a message. She leaves this out.

We need but look at the catalogue she establishes of her total number of kills [or: of hits, tableau de chasse] – we are not yet at the stage of examining what she chooses to put in that catalogue, which depends on what she at first recognized – to observe that she takes note of the cough, but that she elides the fact, which she herself nevertheless underscores, that the subject wonders what its purpose is, what it announces. Yet this is the important point regarding this message-bearing cough, assuming it is a message: the subject literally begins by saying that the cough is a message; he marks it as a message. Moreover, in the dimension in which he announces that it is a message, he wonders what the purpose of the message is.

What happens in analysis, according to the definition and articulation that we are trying to give of it? An analysis is first and foremost a discourse. We cannot forget its structural framework. Our requirement that this discourse be dissected [désarticuler] does not proceed from any particular persnicketiness, but merely reflects our interest in analyzing it, strictly speaking.

We are going to see what its importance is. Up to a certain point, 192 we can already begin to get our bearings thanks to our graph. When the patient wonders what his cough is about, it is a question raised to the second power [au second degré] regarding the event. He raises this question using the Other as his starting point [à partir de l'Autre; see Figure 9.1], since it is insofar as he is in analysis that he raises the question.

I would say that, in this case, the patient shows himself to be further advanced than Sharpe imagines he is, as is witnessed by her surprise. This reminds us of how parents are always behind the curve regarding what their children do and do not understand. Here the analyst is behind the curve, for the patient had long since figured out that it was important to wonder about symptoms that arose in connection with the analysis, and that the slightest hitch gave rise to a question.

In short, the question regarding the cough as a message is clearly presented in the form of a question mark in the upper part of the graph [Figure 9.1]. In order to allow you to locate the point we are at, I am also including the lower part of the graph, which I defined in another context by telling you that it was the level of the Other's discourse.

It is quite clear here that the subject has entered into analytic discourse and that he literally raises a question concerning the Other that is in him – namely, his unconscious. This level of articulation is insistently present in every subject inasmuch as he asks himself, "But what does this Other want?"

This is not an innocent statement that is supposedly made within the analysis. There is absolutely no doubt but that this question is 193 enunciated at a level that is distinguished from the first verbal level, that of innocent statements, and that it clearly indicates the locus where we situate what must in the end be the shibboleth of analysis – namely, the signifier of the Other [or: the Other's signifier, le signifiant de l'Autre]. This signifier is precisely what is hidden from the neurotic, inasmuch as he does not know its impact and he wonders about it. In this case, he recognizes it but he is far from having an answer. Hence the question, "What is this signifier of the Other doing in me?"

Let us say, in short, in terms that are suitable here at the beginning of my exposé, that the subject is, and for good reason, far from being able to recognize that the Other is castrated, but no further than he is from being able to recognize that he himself is. For the time being, from this position of innocence or educated ignorance [ignorance docte], which is constituted by the fact of being in analysis, he simply wonders what this signifier is insofar as it signifies something in his unconscious which is the signifier of the Other.

This is what is elided in Sharpe's way of proceeding.

She enumerates his "ideas concerning the purpose of a cough" – this is her way of approaching things. Naturally, they are ideas concerning the cough, but they already give us a great deal more than a simple linear chain of ideas.

Something is already sketched out, which is mapped, here in particular [Lacan is undoubtedly pointing to part of the graph], on our graph.

Sharpe tells us that the cough first brings with it "thoughts of lovers being together" [p. 136].

I read you what the patient said, and in my view it can in no wise be summarized in that way.

If we listen to him, he imagines someone who arrives as a third party, interrupting lovers who are together. He arrives as a third party, but not in just any old way, since he orchestrates things so as not to arrive as a third party in an overly embarrassing way.

In other words, it is very important, right from the outset, to point out that if there are three people involved, the being together 194 [of the two lovers] involves variations over time, coherent variations – namely, they are together as long as the third party is outside. Once the third party has entered, they are no longer together – that is plain to see.

It should be clear to you that if it took us a week of meditation to get to the bottom of what the patient tells us – as it is going to take us two classes to cover the material this dream brings with it and its interpretation – the analysis of it might appear to be something insurmountable, especially because things could only expand still further and we would be quickly overwhelmed. But in reality, this is not a valid objection at all, for the very good reason that, to a certain extent, what is essential is in the schema that has already been traced out. That is to say that, when the third party is outside, the two are together; when the third party is inside, the two are no longer together.

I am not saying that everything we are going to see regarding the dream is already contained in this, for that would be a bit simplistic. But we are going to see the following develop, extend and, in short, become involute like a leitmotif that is indefinitely reproduced and enriched at every point of the fabric, eventually constituting the entire texture of the whole. You will see what that texture is.

Which idea does Sharpe highlight next? The "rejection of a sexual phantasy concerning the analyst" [p. 136]. Does that account for what the patient brings up?

Immediately after he explains to her what purpose the cough might serve if there are lovers in the room, the analyst asks him the following question: "And why cough before coming in here?" He replies,

> That is absurd, because naturally I should not be asked to come up if someone were here, and I do not think of you in that way at all. There is no need for a cough at all that I can see. It has, however, reminded me of a phantasy I had of being in a room where I ought not to be . . . [pp. 131–2]

This is what Sharpe summarizes by saying that we have here the "rejection of a sexual phantasy concerning the analyst." Is this sound?

It seems to me that we are not dealing with an absolute rejection here, but rather with an admission; it is a roundabout admission, naturally, but an admission nonetheless owing to the associations that follow it. One cannot say that the subject is in a position of pure and simple negation, that he is purely and simply rejecting the analyst's proposal, which seems like it could serve, on the contrary, as a model interpretation in being so opportune, since it leads to everything that follows. A sexual fantasy associated with the patient's entrance into the analyst's office, where she is supposed to be alone, is clearly what is at issue, and you will see quickly enough that it does not take a genius to shed light on it. 195

The third element the patient's associations bring us is, according to Sharpe, a fantasy: the "phantasy of being where he ought not to be, and barking like a dog to put people off the scent" [p. 136]. "To put off the scent" is a metaphorical expression, and there is always a reason why one metaphor is used instead of another; yet there is no trace of the word "scent" in what the patient tells us. We have no means of knowing whether it is repressed or not. I am saying this because scent is what certain analysts joyfully look forward to. Let us confine our attention here to what the patient tells us about the dream.

In response to the analyst's question, he says: "It has, however, reminded me of a phantasy I had of being in a room where I ought not to be" – this conforms to what the analyst surmises* – "and thinking someone might think . . ." [p. 131].

The structure here is twofold, as it refers to the subjectivity of another person: 'I think that someone might think. . . .' This is what I will emphasize, for is absolutely rampant [in this patient's discourse], it is what is constantly at work here, and it is here alone that we can focus in on his desire. This is also what is constantly left out of Sharpe's account, and of the way in which she accounts for the different impacts of need [incidences tendancielles].

The patient proffers the following: I had a fantasy in which I was "thinking someone might think I was there, and then I thought to prevent anyone from coming in and finding me there I would bark like a dog. That would disguise my presence. The 'someone' would then say, 'Oh, it's only a dog in there'" [p. 131].

The patient clearly indicates that this fantasy dates back to late childhood or early adolescence. Despite the not very coherent, paradoxical, and even absurd nature of the fantasy, Sharpe nevertheless perceives its full value, and includes it in her catalogue of important ideas. She thus summarizes it in the terms I mentioned: "Phantasy of being where he ought not to be, and barking like a dog to put people off the scent" [p. 136]. 196

This is correct, except that, if he imagines being where he ought not be, the goal of the fantasy – its meaning or obvious content – is to show that he is not where he is. This is the flip side. It is very important because, as we shall see, it characterizes and is the very structure of every subjective assertion made by the patient.

To cut to the chase, as the analyst does, and tell him that he wanted, at some point, to kill his fellow man, and that what he fears here are repercussions and reprisals, is assuredly to take a stand, and under conditions in which your chances of being wrong and of succeeding at the same time – in other words, your chances of in effect getting him to subjectively adopt or subjectify what you are cutting to the chase about – are particularly obvious. This is what makes Sharpe's text interesting.

In any case, this interpretation brings out his structure insofar as it manifests itself here, and already appears in the fantasy – namely, that he is not where he is. We are going to see both the meaning this interpretation may have and a completely different interpretation to which this could perhaps lead.

Whatever the case may be, he does not employ just any old means to make himself not be where he is; he sets about barking like a dog. To do so in a room where one ought not to be is certainly not the best way of going unnoticed. From the vantage point of reality, it is only too clear that this fantasy is untenable.

The only value of this sentence [describing the fantasy] is to get us to observe that we are not in the realm of the comprehensible but of imaginary structure. When we hear things like that during sessions, we believe we understand, but this is a retroactive effect – the patient seems to understand and that is good enough for us. Being understandable is, as I have already told you, a characteristic of any and every affect, of the whole margin, accompaniment, or fringes of inner discourse – and, especially, such as we can reconstruct it when we have the feeling that it is not as continuous as we think. Continuity is an effect that is primarily obtained by means of affect. It is a law: the less affects have an explainable cause [sont motivés], the more understandable they appear to be to the subject.

197 But there is no reason for us to follow his lead here. This is why the remark I made, as obvious as it may seem, nevertheless has its import. What we need to analyze is the fantasy, and without understanding it – in other words, by finding within it the structure it reveals.

Now what does this fantasy mean here? Earlier, it was important for us to see that the subject told us that his cough was a message. Similarly, it is important to perceive that this fantasy truly makes no sense, owing to its totally impossible efficacy, and that by barking, the subject simply says, "It's [only] a dog."

Here, too, he makes himself into something other than what he is [il se fait autre], but that is not the point. He does not wonder here what the signifier of the Other in him is – he has a fantasy.

Nevertheless, when such fantasies are brought up in analysis, we should perceive what precious material we have been given.

He makes himself into something other than what he is with the help of what? A signifier, precisely. Barking is the signifier here of what he is not. He is not a dog, but thanks to this signifier, in the fantasy, he obtains the desired result: he is other than what he is.

Although we have not exhausted everything that came out solely in association with the cough – for there is yet a fourth element that we will examine later today – I am going to turn to a different topic: the function of the signifier in fantasy.

We are going to set this dream aside in order to come back to a small, elementary, clinical observation that I alluded to at the end of a recent scientific paper, which I mentioned I would bring to you here.

It must be said that, given how abundant psychoanalytic material is, what should be taught is so incommensurate with what is taught – in other words, with what gets repeated over and over – that some days I truly feel ridiculously crushed by the task I have undertaken.

In the case of Ella Sharpe's patient, it is clear that he considers himself to be sufficiently hidden by his fantasized barking. Consider his words: "It's [only] a dog" [p. 132]. I would like to draw your 198 attention here to a point that concerns child psychology.

We would like to understand children, so we try to construct a psychology about them that is referred to in French as "genetic" [génétique, referred to in English as "developmental"]; it consists in wondering how the dear little ones, who are so dumb, begin to acquire their ideas. We wonder how children proceed. We say that their world is initially autoerotic, and that objects only come into view later. I hope that you all have enough experience with children, thank God – if not directly, at least via patients who tell you stories about their children – to see that no one is more interested in objects and in the reflections of objects than very young children.

But let us leave that to one side, for the point, for the time being, is to perceive how the signifier begins to operate for children. I say that we can see it operate in children, at the source or origin of its grasp on the world that is offered to them; this world is above all a world of language, a world in which people speak to them, which obviously requires a rather astounding adjustment [or: confrontation or alignment, affrontement] on their part. How does the signifier enter into their world?

I have already alluded to the following fact that people can take note of, on the condition that they have an attentive ear rather than trying to confirm at any cost the preconceived notions with which they begin to broach children.

A friend of mine recently made the following comment to me: having decided to look after his child himself, a child to whom he devotes a lot of time, he had only ever spoken to his child about the family dog by calling it "the dog." He did not fail to be a bit surprised at the fact that the child, who had clearly figured out what was designated by the adult's initial name for the animal, began to call it a "bowwow."

"Bowwow," which the child used solely to designate the dog, is the feature that was first chosen by the child among the dog's myriad characteristics. And why should we be surprised by this? The child obviously is not going to begin by listing his dog's qualities. Well before being able to handle any sort of attribute, he begins to bring into play what he can say about it – namely, that by which the animal presents itself as itself producing a sign, which is not a signifier.

199 Let us note that language is served here by a boon offered to it by something that is rather isolated in what manifests itself – namely, the animal's presence – in order to furnish material, something that is already laryngeal. The child takes this material as what? As something that replaces "the dog," a term that he has already clearly heard and understood, to such an extent that, when one says "dog," he can just as easily direct his gaze at the dog as at a picture of the dog. To replace "dog" by "bowwow" is to create a first metaphor, and it is here that predication first begins to operate. Nothing is closer to the true genesis of language.

People have noticed that, in primitive forms of language, metaphors are what play the role of adjectives. This is confirmed in this child, except that we do not find ourselves faced here with some mysterious primitive operation of the mind, but rather with a structural necessity of language, a necessity which is such that in order for something to be generated in the realm of the signified, one signifier must be substituted for another.

You will ask, "Why assert that it is the substitution of 'bowwow' for 'dog' that is essential? How do you know that?"

I will answer first by a common enough observation that was recounted to me not long ago by people who speak to me at times, in a way which, although it is not directly clarified by the investigative maps I provide, is oriented by my teaching. From the moment a child has learned to call a dog "bowwow," he will call a slew of other things "bowwow" that have absolutely nothing to do with dogs.

This immediately shows you that what we are talking about here is the transformation of a sign [the dog's barking] into a signifier, and the power of the signifier being put to the test. It is put to the test of all sorts of substitutions and thus it is of little importance whether it is substituted for other signifiers or for real things.

The culminating point of this process is the decisive moment that I highlighted at the end of the aforementioned scientific paper, in which the child declares with the greatest authority and insistence that "dogs go meow" and "cats go bowwow." This is an absolutely decisive culmination, for it is at this moment that primitive metaphor – which is purely and simply constituted by means of signifying substitution – engenders the category of qualifiers [or: attribution, qualification].

Pay close attention here. We can, in this case, formalize the step or progress that is being made here. 200

I would say that a monolinear chain is at first established, which says "dogs" = "bowwow." Next, the child superimposes and combines one chain with another; he makes one chain, "dogs go bowwow," intersect another chain, "cats go meow." In short, by substituting "meow" for "bowwow," he creates the possibility of a division of each of the chains into two parts, one of which will provisionally be fixed in place and the other of which will no less provisionally be mobile. One part of the chain will remain, and the part that can be exchanged will revolve around it.

In other words, the signified S' of cats is associated with S, "bowwow," which is the signifier of dogs [i.e., which signifies dogs]. This presupposes that below – and to begin with, there is no below – the child links "meow," the signifier of cats, with the signified of "bowwow," that is, dogs.

$$\frac{S' \ . \ S}{S \ . \ S'}$$

Crossing and exchange

The importance that the child gives to this exercise is quite obvious and it is demonstrated by the following fact: if the parents are so tactless as to intervene and to correct, reprimand, or berate him for proffering such nonsense, the child reacts very emotionally – in short, he cries. For he knows perfectly well what he is doing, unlike the adults who think that he is uttering stupidities. He is constructing a metaphor.

According to the formulation that I have given of it, a metaphor, from the vantage point of the graph, consists essentially of the following: something at the level of the upper line is displaced or elided with respect to something that in the lower line, that of the signified, is also displaced. The enunciation "dogs go bowwow" is a simple imitative connection with respect to reality. From the moment the game begins, from the moment "dogs go bowwow" and "bowwow," which is elided, sinks into the what lies below the enunciation concerning the dog, the latter becomes a true signifying enunciation.

201 Whether the dog is indicated or named makes no difference. But when a quality is attributed to him, it is literally not on the same line; it is on that of quality as such, where there are those who go "bowwow" and those who go "meow," and there are also all of those who make other sounds, all of which are implied in the vertical schema [of paradigmatic relations]. Here the dimension of adjectives begins to be born from metaphor.

As you know, such things have been glimpsed for quite some time – Darwin discussed them long ago. But, having no linguistic theory at his disposal, such things remained very problematic to him. But it is such a general, essential, and functionally dominant phenomenon in child development that Darwin, even though he was mostly inclined to provide naturalistic explanations, did not fail to be struck by the following fact.

He found it quite funny that a child, who was already astute enough to detach the "quack" from the duck that made it, applied this "quack" to a whole series of objects whose generic nature is sufficiently indicated by the fact that, if I recall correctly, wine and a sou were included among the objects.

I am not too sure what the term "sou" designated, if it was a "penny"* or something else; I did not verify what it meant at Darwin's time, but in any case it was a coin. Darwin, floundering around for an explanation, observed that the coin had the image of an eagle in one corner, thanks to which one could explain that the quack was unified and tied in general to volatiles. The wine obviously still posed a problem, but perhaps we could simply assume that there is some relationship between wine and, let us say, liquids, insofar as ducks paddle around in them.

Nevertheless, even if we would like to believe that it is its liquid nature that allows the child to apply the duck's quack to wine, and that he applies it to the coin because an image as ambiguous as that of an eagle with its wings spread on the coin can be, by a child, assimilated to his apperception of ducks, the fact remains that we observe once again that what is at stake is far more marked and shot through and through with the signifying element than it is associated with the contiguity of perception. In any case, it is in the register of the signifying chain that we can grasp what grounds the child's apprehension of the world as a world structured by speech. 202

It is not that he is seeking the meaning or essence of birds, fluid, or coins. It is that he literally finds them through the use of nonsense. If we had time, we would raise questions regarding what nonsense is technically – I mean, "nonsense"* as it is understood in English.

Nonsense is a [literary] genre. The English language has two eminent examples of nonsense: Edward Lear, the author of books of nonsense that he defined as such, and Lewis Carroll, whose Alice's Adventures in Wonderland I think you all know, at the very least.

If I had an introductory book to recommend to anyone who was going to become a child psychiatrist or psychoanalyst, I must say that, rather than any of the books by Jean Piaget, I would recommend beginning by reading a book which I have the best reasons to think, given what we know about the author, is based on profound experience of children's mental play – namely, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland.

There he would grasp the value, impact, and dimension of nonsensical play as such. Today I can do no more here than mention this.

I brought all of this up as a kind of parenthesis regarding the comment made by Sharpe's patient, "It's only a dog."

We shall return to him now in concluding today's class.

"It's only a dog" must be interpreted in a signifying manner.

Some facet of the fantasy is sketched out here.

Indeed, you will find anew here what I proposed as the formula of fantasy – namely, that the subject appears elided in it. It is not him, inasmuch as there is another there, an imaginary other, little a. This is a first indication, which will allow you to see that there is a fantasy as such in this scene, and which will assure you of the validity of our mapping of the fantasy.

Let me turn to the fourth association that Ella Sharpe lists in her catalogue of ideas. "Dog again brought memory of masturbating a dog" [p. 136]. 203

As we have seen, the verb "to masturbate" in fact has a naturally intransitive use. We have here a dog that is masturbating, given that the patient recounted this memory right after talking about the scene involving "It's only a dog": "That reminds me of a dog rubbing himself against my leg, really masturbating himself. I'm ashamed to tell you because I did not stop him. I let him go on and someone might have come in" [p. 132].

The "memory of masturbating a dog" in Sharpe's list takes on the connotation of an element that should be placed at the end of the chain [of associations]. Is that something that should completely satisfy us here? I don't believe so. This element allows us, in effect, to go a bit further into what is at stake in the message that brings the dream in its wake.

Nothing is clearer in this case than the line that is followed by the patient's associations. Where is it? It is in the subject's enunciation. This first loop of associations is drawn on the graph [Figure 9.2] with a dotted line.

As in ordinary and normal speech, the signifying elements of this dotted chain pass through the two landmarks of the message and 204 the code. But at the upper level where we are, the message and the code are of a different nature than they are at the lower level, where the Other, A, merely designates the partner who speaks the same language as the subject.

The upper line of associations arrives at the point S(Ⱥ), the signifier of the Other which is in me. That is the question. What the subject begins to spill out regarding this does no less than pass through the point ($◊a) – we will return to this – and then through d, the level at which the question of his desire is located.

What does the patient do by giving a little cough at the very moment he enters a place where there is something he knows nothing about? "Sexual phantasy concerning analyst," says Sharpe [p. 136], but what fantasy is it? What is shown by the associations that follow is his own fantasy – namely, that if he were in the place of the other person, he would think first of all about not being there, or more precisely, about being taken for something other than himself.

So what do we arrive at now? We arrive at something that actually happened. A scene is suddenly revealed here. It is related by the patient. What happened?

The dog, insofar as it is [the patient] himself, was not there. Now we have a dog, and this time he is no longer fantasized but real. This time, it is an other who is no longer a signifier at all, but who is an image, a companion in the room, and a companion who is all the more obviously close to him, likened to him, as it is against his own leg that the dog masturbates.

How can we schematize what happened at that moment? We know that the other – in this case, the animal qua real – had a relationship with the subject, because the latter took the time to tell us about it beforehand. The subject could be this animal in his imagination, on the condition of taking on the signifier "barking." This other who was present masturbated. He showed the patient something – he showed him, very precisely, how to masturbate.

Was the situation then over with? No. As the patient himself tells us, there was the possibility that someone else might come in. And then, how shameful! The situation would no longer be tenable. The subject would literally die [disparaître] of shame if someone witnessed what was happening.

In other words, this is what is articulated here: 'Show me what I must do, on the condition that the other – insofar as he is the Other with a capital O, the third party – not be there. I watch the other that I am, this dog, on the condition that the Other not come in, otherwise I would die of shame. But on the contrary, this other that I am – namely, this dog – I view him as the ego-ideal, as doing what I do not do' – as an ideal of "potency," as Sharpe puts it later. 205

Assuredly this must not be taken in the sense in which she understands it, because this has nothing to do with words. It is inasmuch as the dog is not a speaking animal that he can be the model and ideal image here, and that the subject can see in him what he wants to see – namely, that he be shown what he must do and what he can do, as long as he cannot be seen by the Other, the one who might enter and who speaks.

Otherwise stated, it is insofar as I have not yet entered my analyst's office that I can imagine her, Ella Sharpe, the poor, dear woman, showing me how to masturbate. And I cough in order to warn her that she must get back into her normal position.

We have here an oscillation [or: game, jeu] between two figures of the other – the one who does not speak and that we imagine, and the one to whom we are going to speak, but who is asked to ensure that the confrontation not occur too quickly, that the subject not start to disappear [disparaître].

It is in this oscillation that we find the pivotal point where the patient suddenly remembers the dream he had.

We will come back to the dream next time, and we shall see that it runs quite counter to the patient's fantasy that was created in the waking state, whose main lines we homed in on today.

The narcissistic relationship to the penis
Separating the male and female principles

We already make use of the notion of desire, practically speaking, in our analytic work.

What am I trying to do here? I am trying to show you that, in the use we make of it, we unwittingly presuppose a number of coordinates that are always the same, coordinates that I am attempting to situate.

It is worth recognizing them, for when we fail to do so, our thinking always slips a bit to one side or the other, and gets caught up in ill-defined relationships. This can put us at a disadvantage when it comes to interpretation.

Today I am going to continue to analyze the dream that I chose from Ella Sharpe's work owing to the fact that it is exceptionally well elucidated. And we shall see things from two different perspectives.

On the one hand, what is most acute, astute, and remarkable in what she says – in her account of the session in which this dream is analyzed and of the two following sessions – fits so well into the categories that I am trying to teach you how to use, that these categories allow us to give their full value to the elements she assembles. Nevertheless, on the other hand, in failing to perceive the originality of these elements, she minimizes their import, in a sense, taking their color and relief down a notch. She mixes them up and reduces them to more rudimentary and simplistic notions, which stop her from getting as much out of what she has in the palm of her hand as she might otherwise.

In order to help you firmly fix in your mind something that should 208 continue to get a bit better and more precisely sketched out, I will begin by turning to the graph again for a moment.

I think you are beginning to glimpse what the two different levels of the graph mean.

What, in short, does this trajectory [Lacan is pointing at a part of the graph] – which loops back on itself, and which is that of analytic enunciation insofar as it is liberated, I would say, by the rule of free association – tend to do? It brings out, as far as possible, what is included in every discourse – namely, a signifying chain insofar as it breaks down into what we are all familiar with: interpretable elements. These interpretable elements, insofar as they are pinpointed, appear precisely to the degree to which the subject tries to recover [se reconquérir] what he originally was, tries to be beyond what demand has frozen or imprisoned in him when it comes to his needs.

In effect, in the expression of his needs, the subject finds himself initially caught in and poured into [the mold of] necessities that are characteristic of demand, and that are based on the following: the form of demand is already altered and alienated by the fact that we are obliged to think in (the form of) language, and that demand must already be inscribed in the Other as a register and in the Other's code. What need is at its core cannot be the same as it is at its point of arrival where it can only be reconquered, or conquered beyond demand, in a linguistic guise, in the form of the subject who speaks.

It is at this level that the initial gap or distance arises between the subject and need. The subject of need [or: the subject as need, le sujet du besoin] is in a relationship that is in some sense immanent in life; he is entirely coextensive with his participation in life. On the contrary, the x that is called "what the subject wants" refers to the subject insofar as he constitutes himself by declaring himself to be and by being in a certain relationship to being.

There is a gap between the purely and simply interrogative language of demand, on the one hand, and the language with which the subject answers the question of what he wants and constitutes himself in relation to what he is, on the other. It is in this gap that what is known as desire arises. This is why, in the bipartite nature of the graph, desire finds its place somewhere in the upper part.

There is some sort of homology between desire and the function played by the ego.

The ego, which is constituted in a certain imaginary relationship to the other, the little other, then finds itself caught up in the Other's 209 discourse, the discourse of the Other with a capital O. In effect, to call on the Other is not merely to aim at the satisfaction of need; the call loops back on itself [il se reprend lui-même] in order to instate itself in what I have sometimes called "full speech." This is committed speech in which the subject constitutes himself in relation to another person by telling the latter, "You are my master" or "You are my wife."

You can follow its trajectory on the graph: the ego [m on the graph; see Figure 2.2] is caught up in the Other's discourse [A], which instates it in relation to an object [i(a)], before returning here in the form of a message [s(A)]. The simple fact that I speak of myself as me [de moi comme moi] is based on the capturing of the ego in the Other's discourse. It is a statement that is articulated in a fragmentary way and requires a special type of deciphering in desire.

Where is desire inscribed [on the graph]? With respect to the upper level of discourse – where the subject, through a lifetime of effort, tends to develop fully in something in which his being declares itself – desire, inasmuch as it is a reflection or effect of this effort, situates itself halfway to it. Just as the ego is constituted in a certain relationship to the imaginary other, desire is instituted and fixated in a certain relationship to fantasy.

The subject qua vanishing, the subject insofar as he vanishes in a certain relationship to his elective object, is what I designate for you as fantasy. Fantasy always has this structure. It is not simply an object-relation. It is something that cuts. It implies a certain vanishing or signifying blacking out [syncope] of the subject in the presence of an object.

Fantasy involves a certain adjustment [accommodation] by the subject to or fixation of the subject on an object that has an elective value.

The elective nature of this value is what I am trying to demonstrate to you this year with the help of a certain number of examples.

The most recent, which I borrowed from Ella Sharpe, requires a demonstration that I must now conclude.

In the fantasy that is recounted by Sharpe's patient as a sort of preface or prelude to the dream, the oppositional relationship between the subject and a certain object is implicit.

The patient arrives for his session and begins to speak about his cough, providing a message about a message. His cough is designed 210 to mysteriously warn two people who might be in an amorous embrace in a room, before he enters, warning them that it is time to separate.

Secondly, his associations show us that this cough is closely tied to a fantasy that he immediately recounts. In a past fantasy, he imagined that, being somewhere and not wanting to be found there – because he ought not to be there, wherever that was – he could bark like a dog. And everyone would say to themselves "Oh, it's [just] a dog!" The barking thus turns out to be the signal by which the subject profoundly absents himself from where he is, signaling that he is other than what he is. The cough, for its part, is correlated with the following: the fact that a couple of others, alone together in a room, are doing something pleasurable [prend du plaisir].

But a third association shows us that the subject himself is included in this couple. The dog that he pretended to be, barking in order to make himself into something other than he was, emerges in a memory of a real event, one in which a dog began masturbating on his leg. What would have happened if someone had come in and seen them?

In short, something structural is sketched out here.

What is at stake in the fantasy of the two, the one across from the other in a certain enclosed space, in the imaginary relationship, is adequately clarified by the memory – which comes back to him right after recounting this fantasy – of the dog, who is, after all, himself imaginary, masturbating on his leg. Masturbation thus shows that he is not absent from the pair of lovers.

As we might have expected, the subject identifies with all parties to the fantasy. The subject is both the one who is outside and announces himself, and the one who is inside and is involved in a couple relationship, with all that the couple relationship brings with it by way of shared imaginary fascination. But that is not what is essential here.

It is the structure that we must bring out. Either the two elements of the imaginary, dyadic couple remain together in a shared fascination with the act – including embracing, coupling, and specular fascination – and the other must not be there; or the other shows himself, the two then separate, and the couple dissolves.

But this structure also distorts the problem.

What does the subject tell us? He tells us that he gave a little cough before entering his analyst's consulting room, whereas it is 211 clear that if he was invited to go up the stairs, it was because no one else was there – she was all alone. Moreover, he says, these are not things that I would allow myself to think about you. Which is precisely the problem.

By coughing, the subject does something whose signification he himself is not aware of, since he wonders what this cough can mean. Let us say that with this cough, as [when he imagines] barking like a dog, he makes himself other than he is. He himself does not know what the message is and yet he announces himself by coughing. What does he imagine in announcing himself by coughing? What does he imagine there is in that room?

He tells us that this cough is, in this case, an impulse or compulsion that escaped him, and it bothers him that it did so. I highlighted in this regard how striking Sharpe's attitude about it is – she feels that she certainly must not talk with him about it because the subject is not conscious of it, and he must not be made conscious of it. In fact, he is so conscious of it that it is he himself who talks to her about it and who underscores the fact that it is a message but that he does not know what the message is.

What does he imagine there is in the room? What object lies behind the door while he is outside, announcing himself, in a way that alienates him, with his little cough, with this message he does not understand? His association that leads from the cough to barking like a dog shows us that he manifests his presence by the cough in order to announce himself as an other – that is, as someone other than himself.

In a vague and ambiguous way, the subject in some sense traces out a first loop here. First he speaks of his cough as a message. Then he has an association, which is the fantasy in which he imagines being a dog. Next comes the memory of something that really happened, his coupling with a dog in a room. He thus goes successively through something that reflects his desire and then incarnates his fantasy. The circle closes on itself there. Then he changes register.

It was on this point that my last class on this patient ended. Sharpe notes that, at this very moment, the subject gives another little cough, as if to punctuate what he just said, and begins recounting the dream that I already read to you.

I want to tell you what our aim is now going to be. We are going to juxtapose the fantasy and the dream – in other words, we will examine which aspect of the relationship between desire and fantasy 212 is manifested in the dream. We will then see, as I already told you, that the dream and the fantasy emphasize things very differently.

In the fantasy, what is emphasized is the subject.

The subject barks like a dog. The barking is both a message or announcement and what disguises him. By barking, he announces himself as other than he is. He does not know why he proceeds in this way, but his associations to the cough indicate that the point for him is to put himself in the position of either not being there or, if he is there, of announcing himself as other than he is, in such a way that the couple separates and that what there was to be seen behind the door disappears. What does he imagine was going on in the room before he entered? Therein lies the enigma.

The enigmatic character of what is hidden from him is clearly underscored by the fact that at the moment of entering the analyst's consulting room, he gave this confounded little cough. Why does he want to announce his presence in this way? What can there be behind the door? What can he imagine? What is veiled is the right-hand side of the formula for fantasy [($\lozenge a$)], the object, x. This object is not, I would say, his analyst, but what is found in the room.

Let us now turn to the dream. What is foregrounded there is an object.

This object is an imaginary element, but not just any old which one. As this object figures in a dream, you must expect it to be marked by a certain function, and what I have taught you about dreams would have no meaning if this function were not a signifying function. As we know, what is on the right of the relationship inscribed in the formula for fantasy has a complex function – it is not simply an image, but a signifying element. Nevertheless, this remains veiled and enigmatic to us, and we cannot articulate it as such.

On the other side of the relationship, on the left, there is the subject [$].

All we know about him is that in the fantasy he announced himself as other than he was – in other words, as a subject marked by the signifier, as a barred subject. In the dream, on the other hand, we have an image [of the object, i.e., the woman], and what we do not know is who is on the other side – namely, the subject.

213 What is he in the dream? This is what Sharpe tries to articulate for him in her interpretation.

We will now turn to the associations the subject has to his dream.

The narrative of the dream concludes with the patient's remark about the use of the verb "to masturbate."

He employed it transitively in the sentence "she was so disappointed I thought I would masturbate her," whereas it is the intransitive use that is correct. Something different is obviously at stake here – namely, the fact that the patient masturbates. This is clearly what the analyst thinks, for she suggests it to him immediately; he acquiesces and notes that he almost never masturbated anyone else, recalling that he did it but once with another boy. Then he continues:

> The dream is in my mind vividly. There was no orgasm. I remember her vagina gripped my finger. I see the front of her genitals, the end of the vulva. Something large and projecting hung downwards like a fold on a hood. Hoodlike it was, and it was this that the woman made use of in maneuvering

– he used the same term, "maneuvering," in his narrative of the dream – > to get my penis. The vagina seemed to close round my finger. The hood seemed strange. [p. 133]

The analyst asks, "What else do you think of – let the look of it be in your mind."

> I think of a cave. There is a cave on the hillside where I lived as a child. I often went there with my mother. It is visible from the road along which one walks. Its most remarkable feature is that it has an overhanging top to it which looks very much like a huge lip. [pp. 133–4]

A cave with a part that projects forward is something like the grotto of the Cyclops in Capri, the coast of which is strewn with such caves.

Here he has a remarkable association:

> There is some joke about the labia running crosswise and not longitudinally, but I don't remember how the joke was arranged, some comparison between Chinese writing and our own, starting from different sides, or from bottom to top. Of course the labia are side by side, and the vagina walls are back and front, that is, one longitudinal and the other crosswise. I'm still thinking of the hood. [p. 134] 214

The best-known "jokes,"* those that are part of Britain's cultural heritage, usually take the form of limericks.* A limerick* is something that is very important and revealing, I will do no more than indicate this. I looked through a rather large collection of some 3,000 limericks to find the one mentioned by the patient. It surely exists, for some of the ones I saw were quite similar to it.

I do not know why the theme of China comes into it. The inversion of the direction of writing refers back to the similarity, and at the same time to the difference, between the genital slit and the mouth. There is also what is presupposed regarding the transversal nature of the vagina behind the line of the genital slit. Stated otherwise, all of this is highly ambiguous.

Limerick number 1,381 of a special collection I consulted is the one that most closely approximates the patient's joke.* It is amusing owing to the fact that it is not clear why China comes into the limerick.* It is rather remarkable that one finds in it, as in the one we are looking for, the essential superimposition of the image of a mouth and of a genital image.

There was a young lady from China
Who mistook for her mouth her vagina.
Her clitoris huge
She covered with rouge,
And lipsticked her labia minor.

215 [Lacan provides a French translation of it.] It loses a good deal of its zest in translation.

What am I going to highlight here? This is the kind of thing that makes analysts immediately slip into thinking in terms of imaginary elements alone – associating, for example, the mouth with the vagina, or the mother's breast with the earliest sense of being swallowed up or devoured. One can, indeed, find all sorts of ethnological, folkloric, and psychological evidence that shows that the earliest relationship between the child and what one might call the maternal image is a relationship of content and container.

But I ask you, doesn't it seem worth retaining here something that has much the same inflection as when, a couple of years ago, I drew your attention to the big giraffe and the small giraffe in Freud's case of little Hans? What was essential was not that these elements were the mother and the phallus, but what little Hans did with them – he could sit on them or crumple them up. I told you at that time that the giraffes were symbols. One might say – in a way that is more nuanced, more interrogative, and easier to confirm – that, in fantasy, they were already things that were transformed into paper.

In order to underscore what is at stake, it is not pointless to introduce here the imaginary element that is so remarkable in the dream, and that was very precisely depicted as the fold of a hood. This is not negligible. It is something that already has a certain structure, that covers, that crowns, and that is also feared. The finger introduced into this sexual, vaginal element, which seems to "close round" it, gives us a very precise image. There is no need to drown it in a general structure of envelopment, devouring, or swallowing up, especially given the fact that it is explicitly connected in the dream to the patient's finger.

I would even say that the essential question is, does he or doesn't he put his finger there? It is clear that he does put his finger there and that he does not put anything else there; he specifically does not put his penis there, even though his penis is clearly present in this relationship with what comes to envelop or act like a glove on his hand. This is quite salient and brought center stage as a result of "[considerations of] representability" in the dream, as Freud puts it, in order to designate the third element at work in the Traumarbeit – that is, the dream-work.

The question is what we should do with it. Should we immediately reduce it to a series of time-tested [rédimées], preformed significa- 216 tions? Should we place behind this image everything we are used to finding there, having put it there ourselves, as if we were pulling it out of a magician's hat? No. We are going to stop and respect it as something that has a specific value.

Assuming you have a little bit more in your head than novelistic notions about what such a fantasy can be, you should realize that such an elaborate image warrants time and attention, and that it is important above all not to submerge it – for example, in the very general notion of being inside the mother's womb, which people talk about so much in relation to fantasies. Moreover, what the dream presents us with here is certainly not the inside of the uterus, since it is "overhanging,"* there being an edge that projects outward.

Sharpe, because she is very astute, underscores a bit further on, in a passage we may turn to later, that we find ourselves presented here with something remarkable – namely, a "projection,"* she says, and she announces immediately thereafter that it "is equivalent to a penis" [p. 144].

That is possible, but why be in such a rush? All the more so in that she also underscores that it is difficult not to consider this projection as related to the presence of the vagina. This is quite seriously emphasized in the dream, and when we consider the very maneuver that the patient engages in – I would say that he substitutes himself for himself by placing his finger and not his penis there – how can we fail to see that this so-to-speak localized thing in this fantasy indeed has, as the patient articulates it, the closest relationship with the front and back wall of the vagina?

In short, to a physician whose profession it is to practice medicine – which was not the case of Sharpe who taught in the humanities, which gave her a fine perspective on psychology – it sounds like vaginal prolapse. It sounds like a prosection or downward displacement of the vaginal walls, the front wall first of all, and then perhaps the back wall, and at a still later stage, it is the extremity of the cervix that appears in the genital orifice. This is extremely common and poses all sorts of problems to surgeons.

This immediately brings into play, of course, the fantasy of the phallic woman. This is so true that I wanted to remind you of an 217 episode from the life of Christina, Queen of Sweden, who was a friend of Descartes' and, like all the women of her time, tough. The women from that marvelous half of the seventeenth century had an influence on history that one cannot overemphasize. I was not able to go back and check the passage, but the fact is well enough known not to be new, I believe, to some of you.

One day, the Queen herself saw appear, there, in the orifice of her vulva, the tip of her uterus which, without us knowing why, turned out, at that particular moment of her life, to hang down. It was a very typical case of uterine prolapse. Seeing this, and lapsing into unbelievable flattery, her doctor fell to his knees before her and said, "It's a miracle! Jupiter has finally given you your true sexual organ." This proves that the fantasy of the phallic woman was not born yesterday in the history of medicine and philosophy.

Now that is not what is going on in the dream in question. It is found neither in the narrative nor in the associations, and, even though the subject must have seen, according to the analyst, his mother's genitals, there is no reason to assume, for example, that the patient's mother had a uterine prolapse. Although you never know.

Whatever the case may be, in Sharpe's articulation of her understanding of what happens, she brings out the following: that certain of the patient's imaginings lead her to think that he likely saw quite a number of things from below. It is in order for her interpretation to be coherent that Sharpe must necessarily assume that he had a certain apprehension of female genitalia, and specifically of his mother's, from under the skirts. Why shouldn't we go in this direction? You will see that we are far more justified in doing so than the analyst herself, but we are not at that point just yet.

Before going any further, I will simply indicate to you that, when we refer to body images, and we have them play a role in interpretation, it is important to be precise. One must especially not confuse dread, desire, or fear of the return to the womb with the relationship with the vagina. The latter is not something that the subject is incapable of having some direct or indirect apprehension of, as the case study we are examining clearly shows, after all.

218 I will highlight now the point on which it is worth dwelling. The patient immediately associates the dream image that is given special emphasis, as I said, with something from an entirely different register, with a ditty. Whether we call it a "joke"* or a "limerick"* makes little difference.

It was not simply to amuse myself that I gave you an example of a limerick*; it was to give you an idea of the style of the thing, which is characterized by extreme literary rigor. It is a defined genre in literary history, a genre that has the strictest of laws, laws that concern writing. We did not find a direct reference to writing in the limerick* that I managed to dig up for you, but the patient asserts that there was a reference to writing in the one he heard. The reference was to the different direction of the lines of writing in our way of writing and the Chinese way. He mentions it at the very moment at which it suddenly comes to his mind that the word "labia" means lips, which creates a connection between the labia majora and the lips of the mouth. It is this same reference to writing that leads him to compare the labia majora to the vaginal walls.

Let us chalk these connections up to the symbolic order, for there is nothing more symbolic than the lines of Chinese characters. This reference is well designed to indicate to us that, in any case, this dream element has a signifying value. It is precisely at this point that some aspect of the relationship between desire and fantasy manifests itself in the dream, insofar as desire must adjust and adapt to it.

Fantasy finds its place on the graph of desire halfway between the signifier of the barred Other, $S(\not A)$, and the signified of the Other, $s(A)$ [see Figure 2.2].

Don't you see that what I am saying here merely expresses in a more articulated way something about our experience when we try to focus in on what the subject's desire is? We are always trying to home in on the subject's position in relation to a certain object that lies midway between a pure and simple signification – that would be owned by him, that would be clear and transparent to him – $s(A)$, on the one hand, and something closed and enigmatic that is not at all a fantasy, or a need, pressure, or "feeling,"* but that is always something akin to a signifier as such, $S(\not A)$, on the other hand.

Between these two poles, there is the object.

The object appears here in the form of an extremely clear and precise visual representation, but at the same time, with his associations, the patient alerts us to the fact that it is signifying. 219

3

What shall I do now? Shall I enter into the way the analyst interprets it? Yes? [The audience acquiesces.] In that case I must make known to you all the material we have at our disposal.

When the patient says "I'm still thinking of the hood," the analyst asks, "Yes, how now?" The patient replies, "A funny man at one of the earliest golf courses I remember." The man ran after him and, the patient adds, "He said he could get me a golf bag cheaply and the material would be 'motor hood cloth'" [p. 134]. That is the fabric people used for the hoods of cars. "It was the accent I remember. I shall never forget it." Here he imitates the man's accent. "Imitating him like that reminds me of a friend who broadcasts impersonations" – "broadcast" is the operative word here – > which are very clever, but it sounds "swank" to tell you, as swanky as telling you what a marvellous wireless set I have. It picks up all stations with no difficulty.

> My friend has a splendid memory. She remembers her childhood too, but mine is so bad below eleven years. I do remember, however, one of the earliest songs we heard at the theatre and she imitated the man afterwards. [p. 134]

It is a tasteful British music-hall song called "Where did you get that hat, where did you get that tile?" The word "tile" especially designates what was known at the time as a "tube," meaning a top hat. It can also mean hat or a man's hat.

The patient continues, "My mind has gone to the hood again and I am remembering the first car I was ever in, but of course they were 220 called motors then when they were new." The patient is undoubtedly somewhat advanced in years. "I remember the hood of it, that's 'motor hood' again you see." Here he describes the remarkable features of the hood. "It was strapped back when not in use. The inside of it was lined with scarlet." And he continues:

> The peak of speed for that car was about sixty [miles per hour], as much as is good for the life of a car. Strange how one speaks of the life of a car as if it were human. I remember I was sick in that car, and that reminds me of the time I had to urinate into a paper bag when I was in a railway train as a child. Still I think of the hood. [p. 135]

We will stop our examination of his associations here, even though they do not go very far yet, because I want to juxtapose what I am bringing you here with the way in which the analyst begins to interpret the material. She says:

> The first thing of importance is to find the cardinal clue to the significance of the dream. We can do that by noting just the moment when it came to the patient's mind. He had been speaking of the incident of a dog masturbating on his leg. The > moment before he had been speaking of imitating the dog himself, that is, he identified himself with the dog. Then he gave a cough. Then he remembered the dream, a long and exciting dream from which he awoke hot and perspiring. The deduction concerning the significance of the whole dream is that it is a masturbation phantasy. [p. 138]

I couldn't agree more. "That is of first importance." I concur. "The next thing to notice in connection with this masturbation fantasy is the theme of potency." By this she does not mean sexual potency, but power in the most general sense of the term, "omnipotence," as she puts it later on. "He is travelling around the world. It is the longest dream he has ever had." That is what the patient said:

> It would take a whole hour to relate. Correlate with that his deprecation of "wind" regarding his friend's impersonations which are broadcast to the world, and his own wireless set which picks up every station. Note his own imitation of the man whose accent attracted him, a strong colloquial accent, 221 > and incidentally he said with regard to this man "he had once been a butcher."
> Impersonation here, whether via friend or himself, has the significance of imitating a stronger or better-known person. [pp. 138–9]

Is she mistaken? "This is again a further clue to the meaning of the masturbation phantasy, that is, a phantasy in which he is impersonating another person, one of immense power and potency" [p. 138].

The simple fact that, regarding these impersonations and the possession of a radio, the patient excuses himself for bragging or putting himself forward a bit too much signifies that we have here a fantasy of omnipotence, behind which his masturbation fantasy supposedly lies. Omnipotence has to be of primary importance. This is what the analyst considers to be self-evident. Can we endorse that?

Once again, I ask you to simply note the facts of the case. The least one can say is that there is perhaps some confusion in maintaining that what is at stake here is an omnipotence that is wished for or more or less secretly owned by the subject, whereas, if we stick with a first take on the dream – that is, its manifest content – it seems that, rather than expanding, the subject shrinks. Moreover, the analyst herself underscores this shrunken side of the subject when "hood" reappears in another context.

In fact, the analyst goes much further in her speculations than in the interpretation [she proffers to him]. For she is so influenced by a certain apprehension of the shrunken nature of the subject's presence in his hood fantasy that she always says that he saw or perceived this or that when he was a "tiny" boy. But what do we in fact see? We see that the subject shrinks in the presence of this vaguely tentacular appendix. He dares at most touch it with a finger, without knowing whether his finger will be covered and protected by it or squeezed, imprisoned, and ripped off by it. In any case, the patient pushes this signifying object away from him and from the exercise of his potency, at least from his sexual potency.

It is perhaps going a bit far to say so, but I see the same confusion here between the omnipotence attributed to the patient, even when it is more or less denied by him, and the omnipotence of speech, 222 which is, on the contrary, altogether clear in this case. Yet there is a world of difference between them. For it is precisely in connection with speech that the patient has difficulty.

He is a lawyer and has plenty of talent, but he is plagued by very severe phobias whenever he has to appear in court and speak. We are told at the outset that his father died when he was three years old and that the patient [referred to in the case study as Robert] had a great deal of trouble remembering him. What is the only memory that remains absolutely clear to him? It is when his family told him his father's final words. They were, "Robert must take my place." What did he mean by that? Was the son afraid of his father's death? The dying father spoke; he said, "take my place." But which place? The one I occupy here [in the family] or the one in which I am dying?

The subject's difficulty with respect to speech, the distance which is such that he uses speech in order to be elsewhere, and, conversely, that nothing is more difficult for him than not simply to speak but to say something about his father's speech – this was only very recently accomplished, the analyst tells us, and it was "startling"* to him "when he thought that he must have heard his father speak" [p. 126] – shouldn't all of that incline us to be at least a bit circumspect here? Shouldn't that incline us to highlight in him, more than in others, the division between the Other qua speaking and the other qua imaginary?

The analyst finds confirmation of the patient's omnipotence in the fact that he refers to the dream as "tremendous" [p. 132]. We can only know that it was tremendous from the patient. He is the one who tells us he had a tremendous dream, that there were many scenes before this one, that there was a whole journey around the world, and a hundred thousand adventures that would take forever to recount, but that he will spare the analyst an account of them. But in the end, the mountain turns out to be a molehill: a very short story. We are told that there is a horizon of omnipotence indicated in the narrative, but it is never narrated. Omnipotence is always connected with the Other, with the world of speech as such.

Must we rush, as Sharpe does, to attribute to the patient's structure not simply a fantasy of omnipotence but also the aggressiveness that it implies? The bias that sometimes colors her interpretations 223 is often based on the fact that she overlooks a difference in level, which, when it is sufficiently emphasized in the structure itself, must be respected. It is, moreover, on this condition alone that we know that this difference in level exists.

> The next question that arises from that is why this phantasy of extreme power? The answer is given in the dream. He is going round the world. I would put as commensurate with this idea the actual memory that came to him when he was describing the hood in the dream which was so strange, for it brought out not only the fact that he was describing a projection, a fold of a hood, but that the hood was also overhanging like a lip of a cave. So that we get directly the hood and lips of the vulva compared with the great cave on the hillside to which he went with his mother. Hence the masturbation phantasy is one associated with immense potency because he is dreaming of compassing mother earth, of being adequate to the huge cave beneath the protruding lips. That is the second thing of importance. [p. 139]

When you examine the analyst's train of thought here, you cannot fail to sense that a jump has been made. The fact that there may be a relationship between the childhood memory in which he gets coverage [subit une couverture], as they say, and the signifying value of what I will call the fantasy of prolapse need not be ruled out, naturally, there obviously being some relationship owing to the fact of his free association. But to consider on this basis that we are dealing with the classic topic of the Oedipal relation, as it were, the one that rises to the level of embracing one's mother – which here becomes embracing mother earth herself, embracing the entire world – a step has nevertheless been made which seems to me to have perhaps been made a bit too quickly.

It is important not to overlook the fact that, alongside the grandiose schema of the Oedipal hero who proves himself to be at his mother's level, Freud clearly isolated this moment from a phase of development in which the owning of his actual sexual organ is precisely related in the male child to a feeling of inadequacy – which runs counter to what Sharpe says – regarding what he has at his disposal compared to what would be required by an enterprise like conquering or having sex with his mother. This element plays an 224 indisputable role, which is manifested quite insistently, in a very large number of cases concerning the subject's narcissistic relationship to his penis, insofar as it is considered by him as more or less insufficient, as too small.

And we must not believe that the only thing that comes into play in this regard is the relationship with his semblables: his male rivals. Clinical practice shows us, on the contrary, that the inadequacy of the penis with respect to the female genitalia, assumed to be altogether enormous compared to the male organ, is much too important for us to proceed so quickly.

The analyst continues:

> Next I would draw your attention to the associations concerning lips and labia. The woman who was a stimulus for the dream had full red passionate lips. In the dream he had a vivid picture of the labia and the hood. The cave had an overhanging lip. He thinks of things longitudinal like labia and then of cross-wise things – where I would now suggest the mouth as compared with the vulva. [p. 139]

No comment.

> He thinks, moreover, of the first motor he was in and of its hood and of the scarlet lining in that motor. He then thinks immediately of the speed of the car, and says "the peak of its speed" was so many miles an hour, and then speaks of "the life of the car" and notices that he talks of a car as if it were human.
>
> From the fact of the dream picture of the vulva and the hood . . . [p. 140]

I am going to skip here a little,

> I should deduce that the memory of the actual cave which he visited with his mother also acts as a cover memory [i.e., a screen memory]. I would deduce that there is projected on to the motor with its scarlet lined hood this same forgotten memory and that the peak of speed has the same significance as the projection in the genitals in the dream – it is the peak of the hood. I infer there is an actual repressed memory of seeing the genitals of someone much older than himself; of seeing them when he was very tiny and I infer this from both the car and the cave and going round the world in conjunction with the immense potency required. The peak, the hood, I interpret as the clitoris. [p. 140]

I was saying earlier that the mountain made of the dream gives 225 rise to a molehill. We have something analogous here, in what I would almost call the analyst's droning on and on.

I am willing to admit that this "peak of speed" can be identified with the peak of the hood, but if it is truly so peaked and enormous, how can we associate it with a real, lived, childhood memory? There is something excessive here in concluding so brazenly that we have here a screen memory related to an actual sight of the female genitalia and especially of the clitoris. This is nevertheless what the analyst comes to, by highlighting, as a key element, the fact that:

> The patient's sister is eight years older than himself. Considering the references made to his woman friend's voice, that is to sound, accent, sound of a man's voice, and considering that the reference to her is in connection with male impersonation, I deduce that at least when very tiny he saw her genitals, noticed the clitoris, and heard her urinate. [p. 140]

And right after that she has to mention the following: "But considering all the work in analysis we have done so far I believe in addition there was some babyhood situation in which he had a quite definite opportunity of seeing his mother's genitals" [pp. 140–1].

All of these details make the analyst surmise that at such a moment he would have been "laid on the floor on a blanket" [p. 141].

Why am I making all of these critical remarks? I will have to show my cards here and tell you where I am going with this.

My goal is to teach you how to spell out, as it were, the direction taken by a certain number of inflections that the analyst imposes on the comprehension of the material that she presents to us, inflections that, far from making that material seem all the more limpid to us, stop us from providing an accurate interpretation of it.

The path her thought process takes leads her to extremely active and even brutal interpretations. She suggests to the patient that 226 the crux of the matter is the aggressive nature of his own penis. His penis as an aggressive organ brings into play the harmful and deleterious nature of the water it releases when he urinates [p. 146]. The analyst thus obtains an effect that should not surprise us much, which is that an adult patient, who is somewhat advanced in years, ends up urinating in his sleep the following night [p. 147]. You have already heard me mention it, but let us leave that to one side.

To get a little bit ahead of myself regarding what I believe I can demonstrate to you by continuing this slow and painful job of analyzing line by line, where does the question arise in what one might call the patient's fundamental fantasy, inasmuch as it is rendered present in the transference? The patient imagines something, we do not know what, about his analyst. I will tell you later how the analyst herself conceptualizes the point they are at in the transference. In any case, at the moment of the session in which he recounts the dream, the transference is of a clearly imaginary type.

The analyst is essentially focused and centered, with regard to the patient, on the dyadic relation, that of one ego to another. The analyst senses very clearly everything rigid, measured, and defensive in the patient's attitude in her presence. This implies that he is in the closest of specular relations with her. But, as opposed to what she says, this is far from indicating that there is no transference – it is a certain type of transference, a type that is fundamentally dyadic and imaginary.

So what is this analyst, who is but a reflection of the patient, doing in her consulting room? This is indisputable: he is clearly warning her with his little cough not to get caught masturbating. That is what he assumes her to be doing.

But how do we know this? We do not know it immediately, and that is very important. How can we know it? We know it from the dream, where it is altogether clear, since it is exactly what the patient says – namely, that someone is masturbating.

The analyst correctly recognizes that the masturbator in question is the patient – that is, the dreamer [p. 138]. Yet the fact that, in the narrative of the dream, the patient manifests his intention to 227 masturbate the woman, while adding that "to masturbate" is an intransitive verb, tips us off. That is to say that the signifying fantasy in question is one of a close connection between a male and a female element, caught up in a sort of envelopment.

Let me explain. I do not mean that the patient is simply caught or contained in the other, but that, inasmuch as he masturbates her, he himself masturbates, but also does not masturbate. In short, the fundamental image presented in the dream is that of a sort of glove or sheath turned inside out.

Sheath and vagina are, moreover, the same words: gaine [sheath] is the same word as vagin [vagina]. We have here a linguistic coincidence that is not lacking in signification. There would be a great deal to say, from a linguistic perspective, about sheaths, gloves, and scabbards [la gaine, le gant, le fourreau]. And it is extremely important to map an entire chain of images, because they are constantly present, not only in this specific case, but in many others as well.

What is involved here is both the imaginary and the signifying character in the dream who is the central image with which the subject in some sense sees that any and all possible expression of his sexuality is enveloped or caught up. It is in relation to this image that he situates his desire. It is there that his desire is in some sense stuck.

I will try to show this to you because I must do a little bit more to justify this notion.

In his series of associations, an idea arises that had flashed through the patient's mind, the analyst tells us, during the preceding associations. The patient "attended a function at which the King and the Queen were to be present" [p. 143]. He was haunted by the idea of his car breaking down in the middle of the road and thereby blocking the way for the royal automobile.

The analyst sees in this yet another manifestation of the patient's omnipotence that he fears will be used against him. She even goes so far as to see in it the fact that the patient must have taken the opportunity to interfere in some primal scene by stopping his parents from having intercourse [p. 145]. We will see all of this in detail next time, but what is quite striking, it seems to me, is the function of the car.

The patient is in a car, he is afraid it will break down, but with this breakdown, if it occurs, he is far from separating anyone at all. He 228 blocks traffic, he undoubtedly blocks others, he blocks everything – this we know because that is what is at stake, that is why he is in analysis – everything stops, he stops the royal, parental couple, who are together in one car, a car that envelops them, like the hood of the car he mentions in his associations as having the same characteristic as the cave's cover.

Sharpe is writing at the time at which Melanie Klein began to come to prominence in English society and began to articulate things of high clinical caliber. Was it truly worth Klein's while to have spoken so much about the "combined parent" – that bi-parental monster, so to speak – if we cannot recognize here the incredibly specific presence of an ambiguous character related to a certain way of apprehending sexual relations?

Let us say, to take this a step further, that what is at stake in the subject is precisely this: to separate the parents, to separate the male and female principles in them. I would say, in a certain way, that what is proposed here – what is targeted on the horizon by psychoanalytic interpretation – is nothing other than a kind of psychical circumcision. For in the final analysis, what is this protruding, prolapsed vagina?

It is over there, it comes over here, and moreover it presents itself in the form of something that is nowhere, that slips away. I spoke earlier of the magician's hat, but in truth we are familiar with this sort of magic trick; one such trick is called the "egg bag." You turn a specially designed bag inside out and right side in over and over, and first you find nothing in it and then you find in it what you slipped into it with a deft movement.

This sort of perpetual presence and non-presence of the subject has yet another facet, which we find in masturbation as well, inasmuch as masturbation already implies the presence of a certain female element. This is why I speak of a certain circumcision. This protruding element in his dream is also, in certain ways, the foreskin.

Another set of his memories brings out for us the fact that there is a certain relationship between him and the sexual act. There was indisputably one in his childhood. But where was he? He was in his bed and, as you will see, tightly tucked in with pins securing his sheets [p. 141]. There are other elements that also show us the patient 229 strapped into his pram [p. 136]. To the degree to which he himself is bound and blocked, he cannot enjoy his fantasy and participate in it except through a supplemental, derivative, displaced activity: compulsive urination. The sort of supplement or false jouissance he gets from urination is something that we frequently note in patients who have been in close proximity to parental coitus.

What does he become at that moment? He becomes the female partner about whom he tells us that she has such a need for him that he must show her [how to do] everything, and he must do everything, becoming feminized in the process. Insofar as he is impotent, as it were, he is male. And it is clear that this brings him some compensation at the level of his ambition to garner power. But inasmuch as he is liberated, he is feminized.

The problem lies in this duplicitous game of hide and seek or of the non-separation of the two facets of femininity and masculinity in him; it lies in a type of unique fantasized apprehension of genital desire, which is fundamentally masturbatory.

I hope to show next time just how justified I am in orienting my interpretations in this direction, in order to allow the subject to take the next step forward.

SACRIFICING THE TABOO QUEEN

Aphanisis, Jones's term
Where is the phallus?
Cons abound
Chess as a metaphor
Countertransferential pickles

We have now arrived at a point at which we can try to interpret the dream that Ella Sharpe's patient recounted.

This is an enterprise we can only undertake, and for theoretical purposes alone – that is, as an exercise – thanks to the exceptionally detailed discussion of the dream in her book.

According to Sharpe, and I take her word for it, this dream occupied a crucial point in the analysis.

Her patient had a "tremendous dream," and it would take him hours to recount it. But he forgot most of it, remembering only the following.

It takes place on a road in Czechoslovakia. He finds himself there, having undertaken a journey around the world with his wife. I even highlighted the fact that he said "a journey with my wife around the world" [p. 132].

On this road, he is prey to the sexual undertakings of a woman who, let me point out, presents herself in a way that is not indicated in the initial dream-text. The patient says, "the woman actually lay on top of me; that has only just come to my mind. She was evidently intending to put my penis in her body." He adds that "the woman [was] maneuvering to get my penis" [pp. 132–3], an expression we will have to come back to later.

Naturally, he adds, "I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her" [p. 133]. He makes 232 a remark here about the fundamentally intransitive nature of the verb "to masturbate" in English [p. 133]. It is already in our interest to realize that what is involved here is, of course, masturbation on the part of the patient himself. Sharpe herself realizes this, although she does not stress as directly as I do the fact that this is based on the grammatical nature of the patient's remark.

Last time, I highlighted the value of an image that appears less in the associations than in the narrative of the dream – namely, the fold, as in the fold of a "hood."* And I showed that resorting to the stock images taken into account by classical psychoanalytic doctrine – even though these manifestly stem from experience – perhaps leads analysts to force things a bit when these images are made to serve as so many separate objects, without very carefully situating their function in relation to the subject. I thus underscored what is paradoxical in the overly hasty interpretation that this odd appendix, this protrusion from the female genitalia, is a sign that what we are dealing with here is the maternal phallus.

Such haste also led Sharpe to take another leap, it being so true that, as opposed to what people say, one imprudent step can only be corrected by another. We learn less from our mistakes than people think, for the only way of saving ourselves from a mistake is to make another one that compensates for it.

I am not saying that Sharpe is completely wrong. I am trying to articulate better ways of proceeding, which might have allowed for greater accuracy. With the caveat, of course, that we can never actually confirm this since we will never have the experience with the patient we would have to have in order to do so.

What is the next leap I mentioned? It concerns the phallus, less that of his imagined partner in the dream than his own. The analyst agrees that the dream has a masturbatory character to it, because everything that comes out in the patient's speech corroborates this. But the patient's phallus is immediately viewed by her to be an instrument of aggression and destruction of an extremely primitive type, such as we find in what we might call psychoanalytic imagery [p. 143].

This is the direction in which Sharpe's thoughts run right from the outset, even though she is far from communicating to him the 233 whole of her interpretation [pp. 144–5]. In the first place, she points out to him elements of what she calls "omnipotence." Secondly, she says that what appears in the dream is masturbation. And thirdly, that this masturbation is omnipotent, in the sense that the patient's phallus is a "biting and boring thing" [p. 146].

We have here a true theoretical extrapolation on the analyst's part! In truth, there are no grounds – either in the dream or the associations – for immediately asserting that the patient's phallus is an aggressive organ here and that the subject is afraid of the possible repercussions of his aggression. When we read such a formulation in Sharpe's case study, we cannot help but realize that it is in no wise justified by the case at hand and that it is motivated instead, without her telling us so, by her theory.

To her credit, she informs us so amply and carefully about her patient – as regards the major issues in his life and what she sees in front of her, which she senses in such detail and with such finesse – that we are justified in saying she is clearly taking a leap. I readily concede that this leap seemed necessary to her. But whether this leap seems necessary to us is another question, and it is here that we will try to re-examine the analysis.

My goal is not to replace the imaginary equivalents she prioritizes with other interpretations, in the sense in which it is ordinarily understood, as in "this bit of data must be understood as follows." The point is not to know what each element of the dream means at one moment or another. On the whole, we can even say that these elements are quite correctly gauged by her, given the tradition of psychoanalytic experience in force at the time at which Sharpe is working, and they are, moreover, perceived with great discernment and finesse.

The point is to see if the problem cannot be clarified by being articulated in a way that better links the interpretation with what I am trying to stress here – namely, the intersubjective topology. This is what I am always trying to construct or reconstruct for you, in various forms, inasmuch as this topology is the very topology of our experience. In psychoanalysis, the places of the subject, the little other, and the Other with a capital O must always be indicated for each phenomenon if we wish to avoid getting bogged down in a sort of tangle, knotted up by a thread that no one knows how to untie, and which forms the daily bread, as it were, of our psychoanalytic explanations. 234

I have already discussed this dream, and in several different ways, enough to be able to begin to articulate something simple and direct, something that is not at all absent from the case study, but that emerges from the reading I have provided of it.

I would say that in reading the preamble that Sharpe provides to her account of the session in which the dream was recounted, where she details the reasons that led the patient to analysis, a word immediately comes to mind – and it is not impossible that it came to her mind, as it is not peculiar to the terminology we use here. To mention it is not to bring in a notion that was beyond her ken, for when she wrote this text, in 1937, the British psychoanalytic scene was dominated by discussions I have spoken to you about regarding the phallic phase and the phallic function in female sexuality, especially the discussions that took place between Ernest Jones and Joan Riviere, whose article "Womanliness as Masquerade" we have explored here [in Seminar V, pp. 254–5].

Jones introduces a term at one point, which he considers necessary if we are to begin to understand what, in psychoanalysis, is truly the most difficult thing to understand, not simply to bring into play – namely, the castration complex. The word Jones introduces is "aphanisis," a word he introduced into psychoanalytic terminology in an interesting way. We cannot consider it to be absent from the British scene, as a great deal was made of it at the time.

Jones understands this term to mean disappearance. We will see further on what he means by that. But I am going to use the word in an entirely different way for the time being – in short, in an impressionistic way – regarding what Sharpe presents us, that is, regarding what is constantly found in the dream material and what surrounds it, as well as in the patient's behavior.

The patient presents himself to her in a way that she describes very prettily – namely, with a sort of profound absence that gives 235 her the sense that there is not a single one of his remarks or gestures which has not been thoroughly thought out or which includes any affect. He keeps his nose completely clean. Moreover, he does not announce his arrival – he simply appears, and as soon as he appears he is even more unfathomable than if he were not there.

Let us first consider what he brings up during that day's session prior to recounting the dream.

The patient himself tells us that he is wondering what purpose his little cough might serve [p. 131]. It is designed to make something, which must be there behind the door, disappear. He does not know what it is. He says so himself: regarding the analyst what could there be there that would have to disappear? He recalls in this connection that, in other circumstances, in another context, coughing served as a warning: he coughed to tell a pair of lovers to separate, to move apart, for the situation would otherwise have been embarrassing when he entered, and so on and so forth.

What about the dream itself?

Here, too, we are in the presence of three people, for, above and beyond his sexual partner and himself, there is his wife. She must not be forgotten, even though the subject, after having mentioned her once, says nothing further about her. What exactly does he do with his partner? In a word, he slips away [il se dérobe].

But is it so clear that he slips away? What he enunciates next proves that he is far from being completely absent, since he tells us that he put his finger in this sort of protruding, inside-out, prolapsed vagina that I highlighted. Questions arise here, too, and we are going to raise them. What is at stake? What is the crux of the scene? I am raising the question inasmuch as one can raise such a question about a dream. I am raising it only insofar as all of Freudian theory requires us to raise it.

'What come next in his associations are memories connected to the hood constituted by the female genitalia: the cave and Chinese writing. He then recalls someone who, on a golf course, offered him a golf bag.

The patient found him to be quite a character and speaks about him with a kind of amused joy [pp. 134 and 139]. The way he talks 236 about him suggests that the guy was truly the kind about whom one could wonder where he had been knocking about up until then. With a face like that and such a gift of gab, what must he have been? "He had once been a butcher," the patient says in passing [p. 139]. God only knows why he was a butcher! The style and general tenor of the scene, and the fact that the patient immediately begins to imitate the guy's accent, shows that the guy was a conman,* some sort of swindler.

' This scene brings up the idea of imitation, which leads the patient to think of his female friend who does such fine imitations of men and who has such talent, talent that she uses in "broadcasting."* Now the first thing that comes to his mind about this is that he is talking too much about knowing such a remarkable person, and that he seems to be bragging or laying it on a bit thick. I checked the word he uses: "swank" is a word that had only recently come into use at that time, and that one might almost consider to be slang.* He uses it to say that he has the impression he is showing off by talking about his friend.

In sum, he does not want to take up too much space on this occasion – he shrinks and disappears. Briefly stated, what we see at every moment and what constantly returns as a theme or leitmotif in the patient's remarks brings to mind the term "aphanisis" – except that its meaning here seems more like "to make disappear" than "to disappear." There is a perpetual game here in which we sense that, in various forms, something that I will call, if you will, the interesting object is never there. The patient is never where we expect him to be, he slips from one point to another in a sort of conman's game. I highlighted this last time. I am going to highlight it again and you will see where this will take us. It will take us to what characterizes what the analyst is confronted with at every level. The patient never puts anything out there without immediately, in some way, taking the essential part of it back.

Here let me comment on the use made by Jones of the term "aphanisis," inasmuch as we find a reversal of perspective in his work that is open to criticism.

Jones studies his patients as they approach the castration complex. What he sees in them at that moment, what he understands or senses, is the fear of aphanisis in the sense of a fear that their desire will disappear. In a sense, he tells us that castration is the 237 symbolization of the loss of desire, although he does not formulate it in this way, since he does not have the theoretical means by which to do so.

It is clear, and I have already emphasized this before, that from any sort of developmental perspective it is very difficult to explain how someone, at a moment of his development at which he is supposed to be at some sort of animal level of subjectivity, begins to see need [tendance] detach from itself and become a fear of its own loss. Yet it is here that Jones proposes to make aphanisis into the substance of the fear of castration.

I will point out that this should be broached from the exact opposite direction: it is precisely because there can be castration, it is precisely because the play of signifiers is involved in castration, that a dimension develops in the subject whereby he can become fearful and alarmed at the possible future disappearance of his desire.

Let us begin by observing that it is difficult to conceive how something like desire – if we give it its full meaning, the meaning of need at the level of animal psychology – can be altogether accessible in human experience. Thus, to speak not only of the presence of desire, but of the fear of its absence [défaut] as well, constitutes a step that must be explained. In order to explain it, I tell you that the human subject, insofar as he must become inscribed in the signifier, finds a position there on the basis of which he can effectively call his need into question, inasmuch as that need is caught up, modified, and identified in demand. In this context, everything can be quite easily conceptualized.

How do we explain the function of the castration complex? We have to know in what way the assumption by the subject of a position in the signifier implies the loss or sacrifice of one of his signifiers.

I will leave this question to one side for the time being. I will confine myself to saying that, as opposed to what Jones believes, the fear of aphanisis in neurotic subjects must be understood from the perspective of an insufficient articulation or partial foreclosure of the castration complex on their part.

It is because the castration complex does not shelter a subject from the sort of confusion or provoking of anxiety that is manifested in the fear of aphanisis that we effectively see it in neurotics.

We are going to have the opportunity to verify this regarding Sharpe's patient.

Let us return to the dream-text and to the images we spoke about last time – namely, the representation of the female genitalia in the form of a prolapsed vagina.

This sort of scabbard, sack, or sheath constitutes a rather strange image here, although it is not at all an exceptional or unique case. But we still do not encounter it often and it has not been described in any sort of standardized way in the psychoanalytic literature.

This image is employed here in the signifying articulation of the dream, which means that it takes on its value on the basis of what occurs, on the basis of the reason why it is used. One can raise a question about it: what does it mean to the characters who are present? What we in fact see is that the subject puts his finger in there.

He does not put his penis in there, certainly not, but he puts his finger in there. He turns inside out, re-sheaths, or "reinvaginates" what is "devaginated," and it is almost as if some kind of con [geste d'escamoteur] were taking place. In effect, he puts something in there in the place of what he should put in there, but he also shows that something can be put in there.

Assuming that something can in fact be suggested by the shape of what is presented, namely, the female phallus – this phallus being clearly at stake in the phrase "to get my penis"* – we are justified in wondering what the patient is showing us, since it is as if what were involved here were more an act of exhibitionism than an act of copulation. Let us not forget that this occurs in front of a third party.

I have already mentioned the prestidigitator's move in the trick known as "the egg bag." It involves a wool bag in which the magician alternately makes an egg appear and disappear, making it appear when one does not expect to see it and disappear just when one does.

The showing in question is all the more striking in that the patient's associations have shown us very clearly that he always warns people when he is about to appear, such that nothing of what was there before is seen; or else, as in his fantasy, he has himself taken for a barking dog such that people say, "Oh, it's only a dog." 239

The same sort of conning [escamotage] is always going on, in which we do not know what is being hidden [escamoté].

It is assuredly and above all the subject himself who is being hidden. But if we seek to locate exactly in the dream what is at stake in this conning, the phrase "to get my penis"* allows us to say that it is certainly the phallus that is at stake. We are, I would say, so habituated and hardened by analytic routine that we almost do not stop and take notice of this particular facet of the dream.

The verb chosen by the subject to designate what the woman here intends to do, "get," has many different uses, all of which go in the sense of obtain, win, grab, grasp, or engage. In general, it concerns something that one obtains. We naturally hear this with the note and echo of femina penem devoret [the woman devours the penis], but it is not as simple as all that. Indeed, what is involved in this case is, in the final analysis, far from falling under any such heading. If what is at stake is to get the penis, in any form whatsoever, real or imaginary, the first question we must raise is, "Where is this penis?"

It seems self-evident that it is there, since the patient, according to the account given of the dream, said that the woman was maneuvering "to get [his] penis." We are led to believe from the outset that his penis is situated somewhere in the dream. But if one takes a close look at the text, absolutely nothing indicates this. We cannot conclude that the patient's penis is there just because the partner is trying to get it. This does not in any way suffice to tell us where it is. It is perhaps somewhere else altogether than where our need to complete the scene – in which the subject seems to slip away from the woman's efforts to get his penis – makes us see it. It is not as simple as all that. Where is it? Indeed, we see that therein lies the question.

It is from this starting point that we can realize what is at stake in the odd discordance or strangeness presented by the enigmatic sign that the dream proposes to us – namely, the relationship that indubitably exists between what happens in the dream and masturbation. What does this mean? It is worth looking at the exact 240 passage, for it is highly instructive, even if it is not elucidated or even formulated in the analyst's comments.

What we see is that masturbating the other and the patient masturbating are one and the same thing. Generally speaking, one can even go so far as to say that whatever resembles masturbation here effectively involves a secret narcissistic identification on the patient's part with the other. This involves less a body-to-body identification than an identification of the other's body with the penis. A whole set of stroking [caresse] activities bring the phallus into play, inasmuch as, as I have shown you already, it imaginarily emerges in what is beyond the natural partner.

I will add that the more the stroking takes on the character of pleasure that is detached, autonomous, and insistent – and even verges on what is called in this case, more or less correctly, a certain sadism – the more obvious this becomes. In effect, the fact that the phallus is involved as a signifier in the relationship between the subject and the other is such that it can be sought out in the realm beyond the embracing of the other where every kind of standard form, that is more or less accentuated in the sense of perversion, begins. It is in this respect that, to the subject, to masturbate the other subject is completely different from allowing his own phallus to be grabbed by the other. This then allows us to posit that, to this patient, masturbating the other is strictly equivalent to engaging in masturbation himself.

I have shown you the meaning of the partner's actions that the subject qualified with the phrase "to get my penis." They are almost tantamount to checking. The point is to ensure that what lies opposite is something terribly important to the subject, something that certainly has the closest connection with the phallus; but these actions show, too, that the phallus is not there, that it is something that flees and slips away, not simply owing to the subject's will, but owing to some structural feature.

This is what is truly in question here, and it colors everything that comes up in his associations to the dream. We find it again both when he is talking about his female friend who behaves so remarkably when she imitates men's voices perfectly, and when discussing this sort of incredible conman [escamoteur], this false nice guy whom the subject remembers after all those years. With his unbelievable gift of gab, this character offers him something that is again, oddly 241 enough, one thing instead of another – namely, an envelope in which to wrap up something, but it is a bag made of a material that is designed for some other purpose, it being designed to make a car top ["hood" in the patient's 1930s' vocabulary]. And what is the bag for? To put his golf clubs in.

To the patient, things always present themselves in a problematic form. Regardless of what element is involved, it always takes on the same character. Whatever presents itself is never altogether what it seems to be; it is never the real deal.

Let us examine what comes immediately thereafter. Everything that occurs to him is problematic in nature. Childhood memories emerge suddenly. Long ago he had another compulsion, different from the compulsive little cough just before his sessions. Why the devil did he have to "collect leather straps"* and cut up his sister's sandals?

> I thought I wanted the strips to make something useful but I expect something quite unnecessary. I dislike thinking it was a compulsion; that's why the cough annoys me. I suppose I cut up my sister's sandals in the same way. I have only the dimmest memory of doing it. I don't know why nor what I wanted the leather for when I had done it. [p. 135]

Here again, we find ourselves faced with a sort of slipping away [fuite]. Another one will follow. "I suddenly thought of straps that one sees a child fastened by in a 'pram.'" He curiously and negatively introduces the notion of pram: "immediately I wanted to say there was no 'pram' in our family, and I then thought how silly you are, you must have had a 'pram'" [p. 135]. The analyst notes that there must surely have been one since there were two older children 242 in the family [p. 138]. The same style dominates all of the patient's associations: one thing appears in the form of something else that is missing.

What is the next step that is directly connected to this? "I've suddenly remembered I meant to send off letters admitting two members to the Club. I boasted of being a better secretary than the last and yet here I am forgetting to give people permission to enter the Club" [pp. 135–6]. Immediately thereafter comes a citation – which is put in quotes in Sharpe's text, even though she does not highlight it, as it is well known to the British reader – from the "General Confession," namely one of the prayers found in The Book of Common Prayer, which lays out the religious duties of members of the Church of England.

I did not come across The Book of Common Prayer for the first time in reading Sharpe's text. I will simply mention here a very pretty object that was created twenty or twenty-five years ago in the surrealist community by my friend Roland Penrose. He showed the inner circle a Common Book of Prayer which, when you opened it, had a mirror on each side of the flat inside cover.

This is highly instructive, for the only fault one can find with Sharpe, to whom this text was certainly much more familiar than it is to us, is that she does not mention that the citation given by the patient does not match the text of The Book of Common Prayer. He says, "We have undone those things we ought to have done and there is no good thing in us" [p. 136], whereas the original says, "We have left undone those things . . ."

A minor detail, you might say. But after that a whole sentence is missing from the "General Confession" which is in some sense the counterpart of the prior one: "And we have done those things which we ought not to have done." The patient feels no need to confess this, and for good reason: in the final analysis, his only concern is with not doing things. Doing things is not his thing! This is why he says he is altogether incapable of doing anything, for fear of succeeding all too well, as the analyst points out. 243

This is one point, and not an insignificant one at that. But I want to get to another point. Instead of the missing sentence, the patient adds, "and there is no good thing in us" [p. 136]. This is a total invention on his part. In The Book of Common Prayer we find no such thing. We find instead, "there is no health in us." I believe that the "good thing" that he substituted for it is what is truly at work: the good object is not there. This is truly what is involved. He confirms once again for us that what is at stake is the phallus.

It is very important to the subject to say that the good object is not there. We again come across the expression, "it is not there" [i.e., the good thing is not there in us]. It is never where we expect it to be. It is assuredly a "good thing," which is of the utmost importance to him, but it is no less clear that what he tends to show or demonstrate is always one and the same thing – namely, that it is never there. It is never where one could get it or take it. This is what dominates all of the material.

He could not stop himself from cutting the leather straps of his sister's sandals. In light of what I just said, it is possible that the connection with the other compulsion, the cough, now seems less surprising to you. The compulsion to cut has, in effect, a relation with something that, like everyone else, we are only too happy to associate with the theme of castration.

This is a very common psychoanalytic interpretation. If you read Fenichel's work, you will see that boys who cut girls' braids off do so because of their castration complex. But how can we know what exactly is going on without considering each case in great detail? Is it retaliation for castration that involves castrating someone other than oneself? Or is it, on the contrary, the taming of castration by subjecting the other to a castration that is not a true castration and thus does not seem to be as dangerous as all that? Could it be a domestication, as it were, or devaluation of castration, all the more so in that it is always possible that the cut braids will grow back – in other words, reassure you against castration? In short, one could bring to this everything that the sum total of psychoanalytic experience allows us to connect up with this theme. 244

If we force ourselves not to be hasty, and to maintain things at the level at which we have formulated them heretofore, we will say the following: there is no doubt but that there is some link with castration here. It is obvious that castration is part, as it were, of the context, and that the subject has some relation to castration. But nothing thus far allows us to postulate that castration is the effect here of the patient's aggressive intention primitively turned back against himself; and we would have even less reason to indicate this to the patient as directly as the analyst did.

Isn't it far more interesting to raise and continually renew the following questions: "Where is the phallus?" "Where must we theorize it to be?" and "What do we know about it?"

The analyst goes out on a limb when she says to the patient that the phallus is somewhere very far back in you; it is part of an old rivalry with your father; it is there at the crux of your primordial wishes for omnipotence; it is there at the source of your fear of retaliation for your own aggression. Nothing in the text allows us to articulate any such thing.

Let us try to raise these questions ourselves and perhaps even answer them a bit more brazenly than we might normally be wont to.

It seems to me that we cannot react to a case study that was written up and that we read in the same way as we talk to our students about their cases. If I were dealing with a student, I would speak much more severely in such an instance. I would say, "What could have possibly inspired you to say such a thing?" I would inquire as to where the countertransference came in.

It may seem brazen to raise such concerns about the text of an author who was, at that point in time, someone we would have had good reason to lend credence to overall. I smiled to myself 245 when I wondered about this, because she struck me as a bit over the top here. Well, one is never wrong, in the final analysis, to be a bit overly audacious, for it sometimes happens that we find what we are looking for in that way. And in this case I had to look prior to finding. I mean that I had read the first few pages of Sharpe's chapter somewhat distractedly – for, as usual, one never reads very well – whereas there was something quite lovely there.

You recall the passage about the dead father, the father whom the analyst cannot manage to bring back to life in the patient's memory. She says that she had recently gotten things moving a bit such that the patient marveled at the thought that he must have heard his father speak when he was little. Right after that she notes that the patient has the same difficulty with her: "He has no thoughts about me."

That is something that might already have grabbed our attention.

"He has no thoughts about me. He feels nothing about me. He cannot believe in the theory of transference" [p. 126]. It must be admitted that this is worrisome. But the fact that the patient is not aware of it doesn't mean there isn't any manifestation of transference, for there is, all the same, a kind of obscure gathering of anxiety here and there. This comment escaped me because I had not clearly realized the import of what was to follow.

When you read this you think that it is a general observation of the kind Sharpe sometimes makes.

> I think the analysis might be compared to a long-drawn-out game of chess and that it will continue to be so until I cease to be the unconscious avenging father who is bent on cornering him, checkmating him, after which there is no alternative to death. [p. 127]

This curious reference to the game of chess, that nothing seems to hint at in the case study, should give us pause for thought. When I read that page I did not immediately consider its import as regards the transference.

As I was reading this passage, it led me to think, "That's very nice. One should compare the whole unfolding of an analysis to a game of chess." Why? Because what is most beautiful and salient in the game of chess is that each of the pieces is a signifying element. The game involves a series of moves that respond to each other, based on the 246 nature of these signifiers, each having its own characteristic movement based on its position as a signifier; and what occurs is the progressive reduction of the number of signifiers left in the game. One could, after all, describe an analysis in the same way, by saying that what we need to do is eliminate a sufficient number of signifiers for there to remain few enough of them for us to clearly sense where among them the subject's position within the structure lies. Having returned to this notion since then, I believe that it can, in effect, take us quite far.

Regarding Sharpe, everything that I know about her work from other texts or have been able to find out about her indicates that there is in her conception and interpretation of psychoanalytic theory a profound highlighting of the signifying nature of things. She accentuates metaphor in a way that is in no wise discordant with what I teach you. She always knows how to underscore the kind of substitution in symptoms that is, strictly speaking, linguistic in nature, and she employs this in her analyses of literary themes that constitute a considerable part of her work. Similarly, all of the rules regarding technique that she provides are profoundly marked by her experience and apprehension of the play of signifiers as such.

One might say that she misrecognizes on this occasion that, at the level of speech, which is of primary importance in this case study, it is her own intentions that are expressed in the term "corner." She herself mentions "cornering him" [p. 127] in the text, before it appears in the patient's discourse when, two sessions after the one in which she provides the interpretation of the dream, he mentions, as I have already indicated, that he finds it impossible in another game, that of tennis, to corner his opponent and deliver the final blow by sending a ball where his opponent cannot reach it. The analyst shows her true colors here.

I am not, for all that, saying that the patient sees them. It is clear that Sharpe is a good analyst.

She tells us in detail how she operates in this analysis. You may have noticed, she says to her students, that it is a case in which I 247 make only the briefest of remarks or else I stay quiet. Why? Because absolutely everything indicates to me that this patient's professed wish to be helped implies the exact opposite – namely, that above all, he wants to remain sheltered, with his little cover or car top [or: hood, capote] over him.

To be under the hood* is a thoroughly fundamental position for this patient. Sharpe senses that. Everything related to the effaced memory of the pram revolves around the fact that he was "pinned in bed." He also seems to have very precise notions about what being tied up like that can lead to in a child, even though he can find nothing in his memory that allows him to recall it. Yet he is assuredly wedded to the position of being tied up.

The analyst is, therefore, far from allowing this countertransferential element, which would be too interventionist and aggressive, to appear in the game of chess. But my point is the following: it is precisely because she so clearly senses the aggressive import of the analytic game for this patient that she does not see its exact import. Namely, that what is at stake has the closest relations with signifiers. If we wonder where the phallus is, it is in this direction that we must search for it.

Consider, if you will, the quadrangular schema on which we find the subject, the other, the ego qua other's image, and the Other with a capital O [the L schema]. Here the question is where the signifier as such appears. The phallus is never where we expect it to be, but is there all the same. It is there like the purloined letter, where one least expects it and yet where everything points. To put it the way the metaphor of the game of chess allows us to formulate it, I would say that the subject does not want to lose his queen [dame].

Let me explain. In his dream, the phallus is not what is present or what the subject is looking at. That is not where the phallus is. The analyst, in her interpretation, perceives this obscurely, as if through a veil – the subject has a certain relation to omnipotence, to potency in short, to power. His power, in this case the phallus, is what he has to preserve at any cost. He must keep the phallus on the sidelines, because otherwise he might lose it in the game.

So this phallus that is kept on the sidelines is, in the dream, represented quite simply by the person who would seem least likely to represent it – namely, his wife. 248

His wife is far from being what she appears to be, a witness to the masturbation scene, for nothing actually indicates that seeing plays an essential role here.

Keep the following in mind, because it is such a clinically obvious fact that it is absolutely unbelievable that it is not common knowledge in psychoanalysis: the female partner qua Other is precisely what represents to this subject, as to many subjects, what is in some sense most taboo in his power and which thus turns out to dominate the entire economy of his desire.

I would say that it is because his wife is his phallus that he made the infinitesimal slip that I mentioned in passing when he spoke about making "a journey with his wife around the world," and not a journey around the world with his wife. Sharpe sees a hint of omnipotence in the phrase "around the world." I believe that the secret of omnipotence in this patient lies in the phrase "with my wife." What is crucial for him is that he not lose her.

This is, in the final analysis, what he must misrecognize, and it is precisely what must be called into question in the analysis. But in order to do so, he would have to realize that his wife is, in this case, the analyst.

The subject does not want to lose his queen, I would say, because he is like those second-rate chess players who believe that to lose their queen is to lose the game, whereas to win at chess is to arrive at what one calls an endgame. In an endgame, your ability to move is the simplest and most reduced, you have a minimum of choices – I mean that your king cannot move to a square that is controlled by your opponent's pieces – and the point is to maneuver in such a way as to get the upper hand. At times, it is advantageous to sacrifice one's queen. This is what the subject absolutely does not want to do.

Why? Because for him the phallic signifier is identical to everything that transpired in his relationship with his mother. The case study clearly hints at the shaky and deficient nature of what the father was able to contribute. We fall back, of course, onto an already known facet of the subject's relation to the parental couple. 249

What is important, however, is not to go down this particular path, but rather to stress the very hidden, secret relationship between the subject and his partner. This relationship is what must be brought out at the moment at which it appears in the analysis. This moment is the one at which the subject, with his little cough, warns his analyst – if she had, as occurs in the dream, happened to turn her bag inside out, as it were, or showed her cards – to turn it right side in before he arrives; because were he to see that, were he to see that there is nothing but a bag, he might lose everything.

The prudence the patient shows is exactly what keeps him in a relationship to his desire that restrains him like a tightened strap, like the pram-pinned* position of his childhood, and that can only be fantasized. Namely, that he himself must be tied up, in a pram* or elsewhere, truly squeezed and swaddled, so that the signifier or image of his dreamed-of omnipotence can be elsewhere.

This is also how we must understand the whole discussion of automobiles in which omnipotence plays a capital role.

Everyone senses the connection between power and these problematic instruments of our civilization, automobiles – their horsepower, speed, and "peak of speed"* – and everyone obviously considers them to be phallic equivalents, the backup potency of those who are impotent. But at the same time everyone knows that automobiles are coupled with their drivers and that cars are infinitely feminine in nature. It is no accident that in French automobile is a feminine noun. And we just so happen to give all kinds of little nicknames to our cars that make them sound like partners of the fairer sex. The patient himself makes problematic remarks on this topic; you recall this one: "Strange how one speaks of the life of a car as if it were human" [p. 135].

This is old hat, of course, but it is no less obvious that there is something quite odd about automobiles – namely, the signifying ambiguity which is such that they are simultaneously what protect 250 him, what strap him in, and what envelop him. In relation to him, they have the exact same position as the protruding hood in the dream – the same word is employed in both cases – this bizarre sexual protuberance in which he happens to place his finger, and which is, moreover, not red-striped but rather lined with red fabric [p. 135]. I had underscored this before but poorly translated it.

Let us turn now to what his analyst tells him.

During the session in which he recounts the dream, she begins to talk to him about his aggression. The next day, we learn that what resulted from this was a curious manifestation on his part, the nature of which she does not completely pick up on, and which one might call psychosomatic: prior to entering the consulting room that day, instead of a cough he experienced a "slight colicky pain" [p. 146]. God only knows if he had to clench his sphincter at that moment. As I said earlier, this is because, at the moment of entering the analyst's consulting room for the next session, he has everything to lose.

Yet it is not that day but the next that Sharpe makes the interpretation that she herself considers to be the most illuminating.

The patient tells her that the night before he had already had "a colicky pain" upon leaving the house. What does he speak about next? He says that "he had been unable to use his car because certain repairs had not been finished." He could not ball his mechanic out, because "[t]he garage man was so very good, so very kind; it was impossible to be angry with him." And Sharpe tells us that he added, no doubt with a note of irritation in his voice: "Not that the car was imperative for him at the moment; it was not a necessity, but he wanted it, he liked it" [p. 146].

The analyst plainly perceives that libido is involved here. "For once," she says, "I was able to deal with the libidinal wishes" [p. 147]. Here we could not agree with her more. If I am critiquing Sharpe's work, it is because I find that she is admirably sensitive at every point in this case study. She understands the importance of the desire present in the patient's life, desire being characterized by its unexplained nature [son caractère non-motivé]. In this case, he has no need for the car. She clearly realizes that this is the first time she has heard something like this from him, the first time he has declared a desire to her, a desire that is explicitly presented by the patient as unreasonable.

She jumps on this – in other words, she underscores it to him. Curiously enough, there is some sort of problem with the projector here, and the image suddenly becomes fuzzy. Whereas Sharpe 251 always very precisely recounts what she said to the patient, even the most audacious or risky things, here we do not know exactly what she said. This is very annoying! What we surmise is that she was, in short, overjoyed and said something like, "You have finally admitted that you desire something," and then compared the mechanic to his father. But we will never know the exact words she uttered.

What we do know is that she told him something that was similar enough to what she had already told him that, the next day, the patient comes in and reports, half-contentedly, half-wryly, that the night before he wet his bed.

As I already told you, such a transitory symptom – however much it signifies that a nerve has been hit and has certainly reverberated – cannot in and of itself be considered to absolutely confirm that what was said went in the right direction, assuming something was said.

Bed-wetting, assuming we have some notion of what it represents, is certainly an activation of the penis that I would qualify as personal. But it is nevertheless not a genital activation. It is the penis as a real organ that, as clinical work shows us, is very frequently activated in children in response to their parents' sexual activity. It is inasmuch as children, whether male or female, are at a point at which they are profoundly interested in the sexual interactions between their parents that bed-wetting incidents occur that activate the real [i.e., biological] organ as such.

If the activating of the organ as real, not as signifying, shows us that Sharpe's intervention had a certain import, the question is to know whether its import was opportune. This remains to be seen in greater detail.

Yet another reaction follows this intervention. The patient recounts, not without a modicum of self-satisfaction, or so it seems to me, that he was no longer allowing his tennis partners to mock him; he had, in fact, grabbed one of them by the collar and squeezed his throat in the back of the court forcefully enough to stop him from ever mocking him again.

252 It is quite clear that this can in no way be considered to be the type of reaction we should truly wish to obtain. We should not in any case confuse cornering the other during a match and "cornering" him by grabbing his throat [because of his mockery] about the match. These are by no means one and the same thing.

Cornering your opponent after a match and grabbing him by the throat is not a suitable reaction here. It does not even for an instant make you more able to corner him during the game itself – in other words, when relations with the Other occur, the Other as the locus of speech, the locus of the law, the locus of the rules of the game. This is precisely what is missed by this slight drop in the level of Sharpe's analytic intervention.

I think that we have taken things far enough today.

Next class will be the last on what can be gleaned from the analysis of this case in the literature regarding desire and its interpretation. With the help of the graph and related notions, I will try to provide you with several formulas indicating how we should conceptualize the function of what we should very precisely attribute to the phallic signifier in all its generality.

I will also endeavor to show you how you can try to situate the phallic signifier in this schema, in order to help you map this out in your own analytic work.

Furthermore, I will provide you with something that is borrowed from the writings of an author whose work I have already mentioned here, Lewis Carroll. "He thought he saw a Garden-Door" – that famous door to the heavenly garden known as the womb, on which all psychoanalytic theories are currently centered or by which they have been swallowed up:

He thought he saw a Garden-Door
That opened with a key:
He looked again, and found it was A Double Rule of Three.

Next time, I will show you what this "rule of three" is.

THE LAUGHTER OF THE IMMORTAL GODS

To be and not to be the phallus
To be not without having it Being and the One
Critique of Melanie Klein
The other's image and capital I

I announced last time that today I would wrap up our study of the dream that we have gone through quite thoroughly as regards its interpretation, but I will be obliged to devote yet one more class to it.

I will begin with a brief reminder.

It was dreamt by a patient who is a lawyer who has serious difficulties in his profession. Ella Sharpe approaches things with circumspection, the patient having every appearance of keeping his nose clean, even though one cannot exactly call his behavior rigid. She does not fail to underscore that everything he recounts is thought out, not felt.

At the point they are at, he has a remarkable dream, which was a turning point in the analysis. The patient boils it down into a few words, even though it was, as he says, "a tremendous dream," so tremendous that, had he remembered it, he would never finish recounting it. Only a fragment of it emerges, and this fragment presents, to a certain degree, characteristics of a recurring dream – I mean, a dream he has already had.

He undertook a journey, as he says, "with his wife around the world" – I highlighted that – and he finds himself in Czechoslovakia. This is the only point on which Sharpe tells us that she obtained insufficient clarification, not having asked the patient what the word Czechoslovakia meant to him, and she regrets having failed to do so. We, however, might have some thoughts about it.

"Sexual play with a woman in front of another woman," his wife, occurs there [p. 132]. The woman with whom this sexual play occurs adopts a dominant position with respect to him. Moreover, 254 she tries to maneuver in such a way as "to get [his] penis." He does not mention this while recounting the dream, but it comes up in his associations.

I mentioned the very specific nature of the verb "to get" in English. To get is to obtain, but in all sorts of possible ways. "To get" is a verb that is far less limited than obtenir [obtain] in French – it is to obtain, catch, grasp, and finish off [en finir avec]. And if the woman managed "to get [his] penis," that would mean she had it.

Nevertheless, his penis enters even less into action as the dream ends on the following wish: given how disappointed the woman was, he thought that she should masturbate. As I told you, this is the secret meaning of that moment in the dream, for, in the patient's telling of it, it manifests itself in the following form: the patient thinks that he would be willing to "masturbate her."

There is, in fact, a true exploration of something that is presented to us by the patient as "hoodlike,"* which is interpreted by Sharpe, with a great deal of insistence and care, as being equivalent to a hood. When we look closely, as we have, what should attract our attention is that a female sexual organ is there and not a hood. It is a sort of inside-out or prolapsed vagina, and it is as if the patient's pseudo-masturbation were nothing but an attempt to verify that the phallus is absent.

This is the sense in which I said that the imaginary structure, the manifest articulation, should at least oblige us to limit a bit the extension we give to the register of the signifier. This is in short why I raise the question whether, by using a more prudent method, which might be considered stricter, we cannot arrive at greater precision in the interpretation.

Yet this cannot spare us from taking into account the structural elements with which we have decided to familiarize ourselves. Indeed, we must do so extensively enough that these signifiers allow us to differentiate the meaning of each individual case. In doing so, we see that the most particular cases are always those whose value is the most universal.

Nothing included in this case study should be overlooked, because what we want to do is no less than indicate in this case that 255 without which one cannot give the function of the phallus its true position – namely, its character as a signifier.

Whereas the function of the phallus is always so important, so immediate, and so much at the crux of things in psychoanalytic interpretation, its handling always leads to impasses.

The most striking among them are those that Melanie Klein's theory translates and betrays [traduit, trahit], when, as we know, she makes the phallus into the most important object.

In Klein's theory, and in her interpretation of psychoanalytic experience, how is the phallic object introduced? It is the substitute, she tells us, the first substitute that lies within a child's grasp concerning its own experience, whether we are talking about a little girl or a little boy. It is a sign that is more convenient than others, easier to handle, and more satisfying. This conception is well designed to raise questions about the status and exact role of this entity, about the mechanisms at work, and so on.

Klein describes for us an altogether primordial fantasy in which the subject is in a conflictual and profoundly aggressive relationship with the mother's body, which Klein conceptualizes as the container of good and bad objects, which are there inside of her in a sort of primitive jumble. The subject covets these objects, desires them, and wants to rip them away – these radically different terms are all unfortunately juxtaposed, and this creates difficulties. But Klein does not tell us how to conceptualize the outcome of this conflict, nor does she tell us why such precedence is granted to the phallic object within the mother's body.

Moreover, all of this is conveyed to us with a tone of the greatest authority, and in a startlingly cut-and-dried style. Her statements are so categorical that I would almost say they are not open for discussion. Nevertheless, after having heard them, one cannot fail to recover one's presence of mind and wonder at every moment what she is aiming at. Is it the child who is corroborating the predominance 256 of the phallic object or is it Klein herself? What is it that signals that a specific object takes on the meaning of the phallus? I must say that in many cases we are not enlightened as to how to interpret her remarks.

As it turns out, people wonder about my remarks too. I am aware that some of you wonder where the sign of the phallus must be placed among the different elements on the graph on the basis of which we are trying to orient our experience of desire and its interpretation. I have had a few echoes regarding the questions this has given rise to for some of you – for example, what is the relationship between the phallus and the Other with a capital O that we speak about as the locus of speech?

There is, indeed, a relationship between the phallus and the Other with a capital O. But it is certainly not a relationship that places the former beyond the latter, in the sense in which the phallus would be the being of the Other with a capital O – assuming someone raised the question in these terms. If the phallus has a relationship with something, it is with the subject's being.

This is the new and, I believe, important point that I am trying to make about the subject's entry into the dialectical movement that occurs during the unconscious development of various stages of identification, running from the earliest relationship with the mother to the beginnings of the Oedipus complex and of the Law. Although what I have highlighted here is quite palpable in case studies, especially in those concerning the origin of perversions, the relationship between the subject and the phallic signifier nevertheless often remains veiled.

Two years ago, when I began to re-examine the function of the phallus, I took as my point of departure the following: things are very different depending on whether what is involved is for the subject to purely and simply be the phallus in relation to the Other, or whether the relationship to the phallus is already there in the Other, having been established by some pathway, mainspring, or mechanism whose impact on the subject's further development remains to be indicated. In the latter case, as the mother herself already has a certain relationship to the phallus, the subject can only manage to get himself valued in this context by entering into competition with it.

Next, I juxtaposed the two possible forms that can be assumed by the relationship between the subject and the phallic signifier, by introducing an essential distinction: that between being and having. It is essential inasmuch as being and having do not arise at the same 257 stage of identification; the impact is not the same in the one case as in the other. There is a true dividing line between the two: one cannot both be the phallus and have it. In order for the subject, under certain conditions, to come to have it, he must give up on being it.

Nevertheless, things are far less easy to formulate if we try to home in as closely as possible on the dialectic that is at work. When I say that the phallus has a relationship to the subject's being, I am not referring to the pure and simple subject, the so-called subject of knowledge who is a noetic prop for all objects. I am referring to a speaking subject, a subject insofar as he takes on his identity in the field of language. In this regard I would say that the subject both is and is not the phallus. This is why the phallus serves an essentially signifying function.

I will ask you to excuse the algebraic tone things will take on today, but we must learn to set ideas out clearly, since, for some of you, questions arise. In my notation, ($◊a), something presents itself as being a barred subject – namely, a desiring subject [or: subject of desire, sujet du désir] – insofar as, in his relationship to the object, he himself is profoundly called into question. This is what constitutes the specificity of his desire. And it is to the degree to which the subject is a barred subject, insofar as he is a speaking subject, that one can say that it is possible, under certain conditions, to designate him with the phallic signifier [lui donner comme signifiant le phallus].

The subject both is and is not the phallus. He is it, because it is the signifier with which language designates him, and he is not it inasmuch as language and the law of language take it away from him.

In fact, these things do not take place at the same level. If the law takes it away from him, it is precisely in order to make things work out; it is because a certain choice is made at that moment. In the final analysis, the law brings a definition, distribution, or change in level into the situation. The law reminds the subject that he has it or does not have it. But what happens in fact occurs entirely in the interval between this signifying identification and this distribution of roles: the subject is the phallus, but the subject, of course, is not the phallus.

258 In the usage of the verb être [to be] in French, there is a certain slippage that the very form of the play of negation in speech allows us to grasp in a formulation that I will emphasize, inasmuch as it expresses what happens at the decisive moment, the one around which the assumption [assomption] of castration revolves. The formulation is as follows: one can say that the subject both is and is not the phallus, but "he is [also] not without having it."

It is in the inflection of "not being without" – it is around the subjective assumption that is inflected between being and having – that the reality of castration is played out. The central value that the phallus takes on is based on the fact that, in a certain experience, the subject's penis has been weighed in the balance against the object, and has taken on a certain function as an equivalent or standard in the relationship with the object. And one can say that, up to a certain point, it is to the degree to which he gives up his relationship to the phallus that the subject can possess the infinity of objects that characterize the human world.

Note that the formulation, "he is not without having it," whose modulation and stress I beg you to retain, can be found in other forms in all languages – we will come back to this.

Now this is valid only for men. For women, relations to the phallus and to the phallic phase, which has an essential function in the development of female sexuality, must be formulated in the exact opposite manner. This suffices to indicate that, when it comes to sexuality, male subjects and female subjects begin from different points.

A female subject's relation to the phallus can be formulated as follows: "She is without having it." This is the only precise formulation that allows us to leave behind the ambiguities, contradictions, and impasses around which we revolve concerning female sexuality. It is this "being without having it" that gives a woman's position its transcendence and that will later allow us to theorize the relationship between a woman and the phallus, a relationship that is highly specific and permanent, whose irreducible nature was insistently underscored by Freud, and that is psychologically translated by him in the form of Penisneid [penis envy].

To state things in an extreme manner in order to get them across as clearly as possible, I would say that the penis is restored to a man by a certain action that one can almost say deprives him of it.

This formulation is not exact. I am providing it in order to get 259 you to open up your ears – the second one should not lead those who heard the first one to disparage it – but it nevertheless has its importance because it indicates where the junction occurs between the phallus and what are known as the first relations between the child and the maternal object.

These relations are usually broached developmentally. This is precisely what we must re-examine, and I am going to try to do so with you right now.

The question for us is to know how to use our algebraic elements to formulate what is involved in these much talked-about relations. Once we have such a formulation, we will be able to conceptualize how these relations are linked to the privileged signifier whose function I am trying to situate here.

If we endorse what psychiatrists claim, the relationship between the child and the mother comes first. Melanie Klein adds to this the notion that the child's first relations are established with the mother's body.

These relations, which are considered to be imaginary, are said to find their ideal locus, as it were, in her body. This is why, as everyone knows, Klein locates the relationship between form and symbol in the earliest experience of the mother's body, even if it is always an imaginary content that she brings out. Nevertheless, when reading her accounts thereof, one has a hard time grasping what the relationship between image and symbol is supposed to be here.

Whatever the case may be, whether it is an image or a symbol, the mother's body is assuredly a sort of One. The opposition between image and symbol almost completely overlaps the philosophical opposition between Being and the One laid out in Plato's famous text, the Parmenides. Moreover, the child's relationship with its mother is entirely centered around an apprehension of her unity or totality.

Indeed, according to Klein, the child, as I have told you, apprehends primordial objects as being contained, outside of himself, 260 in the mother's body. The latter presents itself to the child as the universal container of all objects, both good and bad, which reside there, if not in a chaotic state, at least in one of primal disorder. The child's experience progressively teaches him to grasp the plurality of these multiple relations and various fragmented objects in the unity of the privileged object – that is, the maternal object – and this will pave the way for him toward his own unity. What Klein believes is essential to the child's development is this early shift from fragmentation to unity.

How can we formulate this in our algebra? Let us begin by noting that there are obviously not just two terms here, but four. The primordial relationship between the child and the mother's body is the framework in which relations between the child and his own body come to be inscribed.

I have for a long time been trying to explain these relations to you with the notion of specular affect, inasmuch as this term designates the structure of what is known as narcissistic affect. You know that I refer in this context to a very early [originale] experience, which occurs at a specific moment of development, and in which the subject recognizes himself both as separate from the image of his own body and as having a special relationship with that image. He accedes to this specular relationship either owing to an experience involving a mirror or in a certain transitive identificatory relationship in the course of games of bearing with the little other – the word "little" indicating here the fact that it involves young comrades.

It is not with just any little others that the subject can have this experience. Age plays a role here that I have stressed when I have written about it. The comrades must be around the same age as the child, indeed quite close to the same age, and their motor development must not go beyond a certain limit. Thus, the mother cannot play this role for the child.

Eros or libido plays a special role here, in the sense that this first relationship holds up only when it is linked to a second one.

The couple involving the child and the little other who represents his own image to him [a–a'] becomes juxtaposed to a second relationship in which this couple interferes and under which it becomes subsumed. This second relationship, which is going to come to regulate what happens in the specular couple [a–a'], is the larger and more obscure relationship between the child – whose primitive endeavors are motivated by need-based propensities [or: (pre)disposition, tendances] – and the mother's body, insofar as the 261 latter is, in effect, the imaginary object of primal identification.

Our point of departure here thus includes two elements: on the one hand, the subject in this primitive, not yet constituted state witnessed by the unconstituted form in which the newborn's cry – his first wailing, or his need-based calling for something – presents itself, and, on the other hand, his mother's body, this universal container which presents itself as a One at the level of the Other. It is the way in which relations between these two elements are established that regulates the relationship of the other two elements [a–a'] right from the outset. These latter elements are, on the one hand, the subject insofar as he constitutes himself specularly – namely, as an ego, and let us not forget that the ego is the other's image – and, on the other hand, a certain other who must be different from the mother: the little other.

The first correspondences between the subject and his own identity do not develop in a simple specular relationship. They develop in a quadripartite relationship. Do not forget that all psychoanalytic authors situate the locus of psychotic or parapsychotic anomalies – which have an impact on the integration, at the borders of the bodily image, of one or another term of the subject's autoerotic relations with himself – in the central relationship between mother and child.

One can easily conceptualize this with the help of the little schema I have used in the past and that I recently recalled to mind, that of the well-known concave mirror [see Figure 7.4]. It involves making appear at the center of a spherical mirror, not the fantasy of a flower, but a real image of a flower inside an actually existing vase. This is achieved only if one looks on from a specific vantage point that is situated in an area determined by lines extending from the mirror's edges. This setup allows us to imagine what is involved in the relationship between mother and child. Just as you must situate yourself in a certain position with respect to the mirror to see the illusion materialize [se réaliser], it is inasmuch as the child identifies with a certain position of his being within the mother's powers that he comes into being [se réalise].

This is underscored by everything I have said about the importance of the first relations between mother and child. A child must become satisfactorily integrated into the world of insignias that are represented by all his mother's behaviors. If he has situated himself favorably with respect to his mother, then the x that is hidden from 262 him – namely, his tendencies, drives, or desires – can be situated either inside himself, outside himself, or be missing altogether [manquant à lui], so to speak. If he has not situated himself favorably, his relationship with his drives will be more or less distorted or deflected right from the outset.

It is not that complicated to imagine this. Recall to mind the manifest, crucial experience described long ago around which my explanation of narcissism revolved. It is the famous example given by St. Augustine in his Confessions, that of a child who sees his foster brother being nursed. He writes, "Vidi ego et expertus sum zelantem parvulum: nondum loquebatur et intuebatur pallidus amaro aspectu conlactaneum suum," which I have translated as follows: "I saw with my own eyes and knew very well an infant in the grip of jealousy: he could not yet speak, and already he observed his foster brother, pale and with a bitter look." In Latin, amaro is a bit different from the French amer [bitter]; one might translate it as empoisonné [poisoned or envenomed], but that does not quite satisfy me either.

Once this experience is formalized, its absolutely general scope appears. It involves the relationship of the subject to his own image – that is, to his semblable – but only inasmuch as the subject sees this semblable in a certain relationship with his mother, his mother serving as the earliest [primitive] ideal identification here, the first form of the One.

Analysts speak more readily of the mother as a totality than as the One. Ever since they began exploring children's earliest experiences with their mothers, they have been making such a big deal out of totality that they no longer talk about anything else: totality this, realization of totality that. It is as if they were so caught up in this aspect of things that they have forgotten what psychoanalytic experience shows us when it is pursued tenaciously to the outer edge of what we see in the phenomena – which is that it is impossible for human beings to accede to an experience of totality, because they are divided and ripped apart, no analysis being able to restore totality.

The reason for this is that another factor is involved in the dialectic of this experience. If I try to delineate this dialectic as I do, it is because this way of delineating things is literally imposed on us by experience – and, in the first place, by the fact that human 263 beings cannot help but consider themselves to be nothing more than beings who are, in the end, missing something. Whether they are male or female, they are castrated beings. This is why, in our experience of the One, the phallus is essentially related to the dialectic of Being.

Let us come to the moment at which the subject has managed, not without dragging his feet, to overcome fragmentation and assume totality. This is the crucial moment known as the "depressive phase" around which the child's development revolves, according to Klein. This moment arrives when the mother as a totality has finally been perceived by the subject and the subject's first ideal identification occurs.

What happens to the specular couple given this new relationship with the mother? As I told you, the other – the little other or semblable – is in possession of the mother's breast. I add that, owing to this fact, the subject becomes aware of the desired object as such.

I ask you to dwell on this experience, which will be essential to our formalization. It is crucial because it grants the object, which is in this case the mother's breast, the special value of being desired at the same time as it makes the subject conscious of himself as deprived.

According to Ernest Jones – and he says this, naturally, in his discussion of the phallic phase – all deprivation generates a feeling of frustration. Whereas it is exactly the opposite. It is to the degree to which the subject is imaginarily frustrated that his first apprehension of the object, insofar as he is deprived of it, is born.

The subject first has an experience of his semblable, the one who is relating to his mother in a way that should be his, the one who is usurping his role. He feels this imaginary gap as a frustration. He thus experiences himself as deprived. I say that the gap is imaginary because, after all, nothing proves that the subject himself is deprived – some other may be being deprived, he may be taken care of once his turn comes, etc.

With deprivation, a process begins that will allow this object to enter into a new relationship with the subject. Must we put an index on this subject, a little i to show that he is imaginary, given the sort of passionate self-destruction that is absolutely characteristic of the pale, distraught visage depicted to us by the literary brush of he who tells us this story, namely St. Augustine? Or is he a subject whom 264 we can already conceptualize as, strictly speaking, inscribed in the symbolic order? We do not yet know.

As for the object, on the other hand, it is clear that it is symbolized and that it has taken on signifying value in this experience. The object involved – namely, the mother's breast – can be conceptualized not only as being there or not being there, but it can also enter into a relationship with something else that takes its place; and, by dint of this fact, it becomes a signifying element. In any case, Klein, without realizing the import of what she is saying at that moment, asserts that there can be something better than the mother's breast – namely, the phallus.

She does not tell us why, however. The point remains mysterious. I say that it all depends on the essential moment that I have pointed to: the moment in child development that involves the birth of metaphor.

Recall what I told you recently about the specific forms of children's activity that disconcert adults and make them react awkwardly, the example I gave you being of a child who – not content to call what you always told him was called "dog" by a signifier he himself picked, "bowwow" – decrees that dogs go meow and that cats go bowwow.

This little tale was designed to illustrate for you the activity of substitution wherein lies the entire mainspring of symbolic progress. This occurs long before the child speaks in an articulated fashion, and there is strictly speaking no articulation without substitution. Nevertheless, if the field of substitutional activity goes far beyond the passionate experience of a child who feels frustrated, the latter is, in any case, included in the former. We can thus formalize this by writing that the other's image [i(a)] is substituted for the subject insofar as he is caught up in his annihilating passion – which is, in this case, jealous passion.

$$\frac{i(a)}{$}$$

The subject who has been replaced [substitué] in this way finds himself in a certain relationship to the object [a], but only insofar as the latter replaces totality [i.e., the mother as I]. And it is here that we enter into symbolic activity, strictly speaking, the activity that makes human beings into speaking beings and defines all of their future relations with the object.

$$\frac{i(a)}{$} \lozenge \frac{a}{\mathrm{I}}$$

265 That said, how can these fundamental distinctions help us orient ourselves in Ella Sharpe's case study if we preserve their thoroughly primitive character? We must, on the contrary, use them to create distinctions that will allow us to draw the maximum benefit from facts that are given to us in the dream-experience and in the remarks of the specific patient whose case we are analyzing.

This is what we are going to do now.

Ella Sharpe's case can be broached from many different angles. Let us take it up, as far as possible, from the most salient and symptomatic of angles.

We must simultaneously attempt to focus, at every instant, on the relationship known as desire – that is, the relationship between the subject and the object insofar as it is a relationship involving human desire.

Let me remind you that we must always locate therein the relationship of $ across from little a, which is the formula of fantasy, and which implies that the subject verges on being annihilated in his relationship with the object. As the above schema indicates, this formula is itself inscribed in a quadruple relationship, which shows us how the subject manages to give form to what he himself is when he desires – namely, a barred subject who is fundamentally pallid and anguished. He does so by substituting the other's image, i(a) – namely, the successive identifications that will come to constitute the ego – for himself.

What do we find in the different symptomatic elements that can be seen in the material Sharpe's patient presents us? 266

He tells us that he used to cut the straps of his sister's sandals. This comes up in the course of his associations to the dream, after a certain number of comments are made and questions asked by the analyst, which are quite minimal, but not negligible for all that, which are simply designed to get him to go further, and which lead him little by little, one thing leading to another, to this point. After the hood and the fact that the hood is shaped like the female genitalia, after the hood [or: top] of the car and the straps that serve to hold it down, we arrive at the straps that he would cut off his sister's sandals, without him being able to recall what purpose he intended to use them for at the time, and without him being able to demonstrate that he had any need for them.

These are the exact same terms he uses about his car. In the second session after the one in which he recounted the dream, he tells his analyst that his garage man did not get his car back to him but that he is not thinking of making a scene about it with the nice guy. He has no need for the car, but he would like to have it, even though it is not necessary to him; he says, 'I love it.'

Here, it seems, we have two forms of the object with which the subject has a relationship whose odd character he himself points out by saying that they correspond to no need on his part.

I am not the one who is saying so. I am not saying that "modern man has no need for his car," even though anyone who looks closely at the matter will realize that this is all too obvious. The patient himself says so. He says, in short, "I don't need my car. But I love it, I desire it." And as you know, it is here that Sharpe, with a swift reaction, like that of a hunter who has located her prey – namely, the very object she is seeking – intervenes so energetically, but without telling us, curiously enough, in what terms she did so.

Let us begin to describe what is at stake. And since I want to start with what is simplest, what can be most easily situated in an equation with which you are already long familiar, I would say that the straps are little a. There was even a time at which he collected straps.

I will oblige myself to follow my own formulas to some degree, since if I propose them, they must serve some purpose. The image 267 of a, i(a), here is clearly his sister, about whom we have not spoken much, as we never suspect how complicated it is to bring out the slightest little thing, when it comes to explaining what we are dealing with.

$$\frac{\text{his sister}}{$} \lozenge \frac{\text{straps}}{X}$$

His sister is eight years older than him. We know this because it is mentioned in the case study. Sharpe does not make much use of this fact, but what is clear is that if she is eight years older than him, she was eleven when he was three, which is the age at which he lost his father.

A certain taste for the signifier has the advantage of making us do a little arithmetic now and then. This is not illicit, for there is no doubt but that, when they are young, children never stop calculating their ages and their differences in age from each other. We, thank God, manage to forget that we are over fifty, and we have reasons for doing so, but children are very concerned with knowing their ages. Having performed this little calculation, one notices something that is very striking: the patient tells us that his memories only begin at age eleven. This is included in the case study even though the author does not make much of it.

This is not simply a random find that I am supplying you with here, because, if you now reread the case study, you will see that it goes much further. Just before telling us that he has virtually no memory of anything that happened before the age of eleven, he tells us about his female friend who is incredibly smart and cool, and who can do impersonations – that is, she can imitate anyone, especially men, in an amazing way, she being called on to do so by the BBC.

It is striking that he speaks about that just before making a remark that seems to stem from a completely different register – namely, that he has no memories of his life prior to age eleven. It seems that this must have some connection with the fact that he is imaginarily alienated in his sister. His sister is clearly i(a) for him, and this can explain many things to us, including the fact that he 268 denies that his family ever had a "pram,"* which is a little stroller – a sort of car – for children. At that level, it is in the past, it is his sister's.

All the same, there was a moment at which he caught up with his sister, as it were. He encountered her at the very point at which he had left her regarding a crucial event. Sharpe is right to say that the father's death was crucial. The father's death left the subject confronted with all sorts of elements, except one, which would probably have been very precious in allowing him to overcome the various captivations [captations] that arose later. In any case, this is the point that will, of course, be a bit mysterious to us – why straps?

The patient himself emphasizes the fact that he has no idea why. Thank God we are analysts and we can guess that this element is what is there at the level of $ and is located across from it [capital I]. Because we are familiar with other case studies, we must give some idea of what is located at I in this schema.

It is something that is obviously connected with – I will not say castration, for if it were castration that was well assimilated, registered, and assumed by the subject, this little transitory symptom which involved cutting up straps would not have appeared. This symptom obviously revolved around castration, but we have no right to extrapolate for the time being.

In the case at hand, what is capital I, the ego-ideal? We can permit ourselves not to conclude just yet. After all, if someone is in analysis, it is precisely in order to try to understand a little, and to understand what is included in capital I.

I already indicated last time that this patient's ego-ideal identification was extremely peculiar, and that we needed to dwell on it. We can try to specify it now by referring to his relation with his analyst, which has something more developed about it than the I. Well, let us begin by raising questions based on what was going on in the analytic situation at that time.

There are many different ways of broaching this, for one can truly say that all roads lead to Rome in this case. One can begin from the 269 mass of things the subject brings up in reaction to Sharpe's interpretations. In this regard, we agree with him: what are essential are the straps and the car. They are obviously not identical, for something changed in the interval between them.

Concerning the car, the patient adopted a stance, making some critical remarks that bear traces of a certain irony: "Strange how one speaks of the life of a car as if it were human" [p. 135]. I do not need to stress this, because you can sense, as I already observed, that the obviously symbolic nature of his car has its importance. It is clear that in the course of the patient's existence, his car has been a more satisfying object than the straps were, for the simple reason that he still does not understand anything about the straps, whereas he is able to say that even if the car does not really satisfy a need, he is very attached to it. And, moreover, he has fun with it; he is its master; he is happy when he is in his car.

What is the image of a here? We obviously find different things depending on whether we take things up at the level of fantasy or at the level of the dream. One might also say that there is fantasy on both sides – fantasies in the dream and those in the daydream.

In the daydream, which is also of value, we know what the other's image is. It is something in relation to which the patient adopted very peculiar attitudes. The other's image is the couple of lovers whom – despite the excuse he gives [for coughing], which is that he does not want to disturb them – he never fails, let us note, to disturb in the most concrete way: by ordering them to separate. The other's image is also that other about which everyone will say – recall the rather piquant fantasy that he recalled – 'Oh, there's no need to verify what there is in that room, it's only a dog.'

The other's image is, in short, something that leaves very little room for sexual intercourse. The i(a) requires either separation or, on the contrary, an animal phallus, a phallus that is kept entirely on the sidelines. If there is a phallus, it is a dog's phallus.

270 As you see, the situation seems to have further disintegrated.

If the patient has, for a long time, been someone who has been propped up by his identification with a woman, we observe that his relationship to sex, including embracing and genital satisfaction, presents itself in a way that, in any case, leaves open or gaping the problem of what the phallus has to do with it. It is quite certain, in any case, that the patient is uncomfortable. The question of double or single in the other's image is present – if it is double, it is separated, and if it is single, it is not human. Things do not go smoothly in either case.

As for the subject in the latter case ["it's only a dog"], we need not wonder, as in the former case, what he is or where he is. It is altogether clear: there is no longer anyone there, there is truly οὔτις [no one], a term I mentioned [at the end of Chapter VIII].

What about as regards the dream? A woman does everything possible to get his penis, but nothing happens. One can do whatever one wants with the hand, and even show that there is nothing up one's sleeve, but as for him, there is no one there [personne]!

As for his fantasy, it is "What is there in the place where he must not be?" There is in effect no one there. There is no one there because, if there is a phallus, it is that of the dog who masturbated in a room which he would have been very upset if someone had come into. In any case, he is not there.

What do we find at the level of capital I? To be sure, there is Ella Sharpe; she is not without having some relationship to it. With a little cough, he warns her in advance de ne pas mettre son doigt, elle non plus, entre l'arbre et l'écorce [not to meddle in other people's affairs either; literally, not to put her finger between the tree and the bark], to invert the usual formulation – in other words, he warns her that if she is in the process of doing something more or less suspect to herself, she must put all that away before he arrives.

Ella Sharpe must, in short, be completely out of reach of the subject's blows. This is what I expressed last time when I referred to the comparison between analysis and a game of chess, with the following words: the subject does not want to lose his queen. He does not want to lose his queen because his queen is undoubtedly the key to all of this, because none of this can hold up unless nothing changes 271 as regards the queen, because omnipotence is connected with the queen.

What is strange is that Sharpe sniffs out and sees the idea of omnipotence everywhere – so much so that she says to the patient that he believes himself to be omnipotent because he had "a tremendous dream," for example, even though he is incapable of coughing up any more of it than the little scene that takes place on a road in Czechoslovakia. But it is not the patient who is omnipotent. It is the Other who is omnipotent and this is why the situation is especially frightening to him.

Let us not forget that we are talking about a patient who cannot manage to speak up for a defendant in court [plaider]. He cannot, and this is very striking. Why can't he manage to speak up in court? Is it because he must not affect the Other by assuming the place where one always places oneself if one is going to speak up – namely, the Other's place?

In other words, the Other – and in this case, we are talking about women – must absolutely not be castrated. I mean that the Other carries within itself the signifier that takes on all values. And this is indeed how we should consider the phallus.

I am not the only one who does so. Read Chapter 11 of Melanie Klein's book, The Psychoanalysis of Children, regarding the development of little girls. Klein clearly says that all the needs a subject has, and of every kind – oral, anal, and urethral – are centered on the phallic signifier. Even before we can speak of genital needs, the phallic signifier takes on all values and especially the drive-related values and aggressive tendencies that the subject has been able to develop.

Incapable of putting the phallic signifier into play, the phallic signifier remaining inherent in the Other as such, this patient finds himself broken down [like a car, en panne], as we see him.

But what is altogether striking is that, here, as in every case in which we find ourselves presented with resistance on the patient's part, this resistance is the analyst's resistance. Indeed, if there is something that Sharpe seriously does not allow herself here, it is to speak up [plaider]. In this case, where there is a barrier that is there 272 to be crossed, that she could cross, she stops herself from crossing it. Why? She does not know why, but it is clear that she admits she does so. She does not allow herself to cross this barrier because she does not realize why the patient is keeping his nose clean, what he is keeping his nose clean in order to defend against.

It is not, as she thinks, because of some supposed aggression he feels toward his father. The father has been dead and gone for a long time and she has had a terrible time trying to bring him ever so little back to life in the analysis.

Nor is it because of some conflict regarding homosexuality. It is not because he happens to be more or less courageous or aggressive in the presence of people who mock him about his tennis playing because he does not know how to deliver the final "shot."* It is not about inciting the patient to use the phallus as a weapon. None of that is germane here.

The patient is not yet at the point where he must agree to perceive that women are castrated. I am not saying that women do not have the phallus, which is what he demonstrates quite ironically in his dream fantasy [fantasme de rêve], but rather that the Other as such, owing to the fact that it is included in the Other as language, is subjected to the following: women are without having it.

This is precisely what he cannot in any wise accept. To him, women must not be without having it and this is why he cannot let women risk it at any cost. Let us not forget that, in his dream, his wife is on the sidelines. She is there, but apparently plays no role whatsoever. He never even mentions that she is watching. It is there, as it were, that the phallus is tucked away. The patient never has to risk the phallus himself, because it is in play solely in a corner where no one would ever dream of looking for it.

The patient does not go so far as to say that it is located in a woman, yet it is located in a woman – namely, inasmuch as Sharpe is there.

It is not especially inconvenient that his analyst is a woman. It could even be quite convenient if she realized what needed to be said to the patient – namely, that she is there as a woman and that to dare to speak up and plead his case in front of a woman raises questions and difficulties for him, this being precisely what he does not do.

She realizes that he does not do it, and this crucial moment of the analysis revolves around it. She then incites him to use the phallus 273 as a weapon. She says 'Your penis is something that has always been excessively dangerous; don't be afraid of it; that's what it's about; it is boring and biting.' There is nothing in the material that gives us any sort of indication that the patient's phallus is aggressive, and yet this is the way in which Sharpe interprets it.

I do not think that is the best thing to do. Why not? Because of the position the patient has and has apparently kept, and that he will cling to all the more tightly after this intervention, in any case. What position is that? The position that he occupied at a moment in his childhood, the one we are trying to pin down on the basis of the fantasy of the straps that are cut and everything connected to them – namely, identifications with his sister and the absence of a pram. Is there something further? The position that he is sure he must have experienced in his childhood, as you will see if you attentively reread his associations. What experience? Him tied down, him being "pinned"* into his bed.

He was certainly held down and constrained in positions that allow us to suspect some suppression of childhood masturbation or, in any case, of experiences that are not unrelated to his first erotogenic emotions, which everything inclines us to think were traumatic.

Sharpe interprets everything the patient mentions about being tied up in the sense of saying that it is certainly in connection with some primal scene involving parental intercourse. This intercourse, she says, must have been interrupted by him, either by crying or by some sort of intestinal trouble. This is where she comes back to the "colicky pain" that replaces the cough at the moment at which he knocks on her door, and that seems to her to be proof of the accuracy of her interpretation [p. 146].

I wouldn't be so sure. What is a "colicky pain," in reality? It is when the subject releases what is inside his body, either as he did when he was little or later when something by way of a transitory symptom was produced, echoing what was occurring in the analysis. It is a form of incontinence. This does not, however, tell us what its function is.

As you know, this incontinence is then reproduced at the urethral level, but with a different function, no doubt. I already said how 274 important it is to note that every instance of bed-wetting echoes the presence of parents who are having sexual relations. Let us be prudent here. It is important to not always give an unequivocal finality to certain effects. An effect can have its own cause and then later be used secondarily by the subject to intervene as a third party in interparental relations in order to disturb them and even interrupt them.

But quite recently – in other words, at a time not far from that of the dream in question – the patient had a rather unusual fantasy which Sharpe takes to solidly confirm the notion that the patient sought to interrupt his parents while they were having intercourse. He was afraid one day that his car, which is clearly ever more identified with him, would break down, and that it would break down in the middle of a road which was to be taken by the royal couple itself. One might believe that this couple was placed there in order to remind us of the game of chess; but, wherever you find the king, think less of the father than of the subject himself.

Be that as it may, the patient manifests a bit of anxiety. [It is as if he thought,] "Don't let my car break down when I have to go to the function at which the royal couple is expected."

The year is 1934, and the British crown is not being worn by a queen who has a mere consort by her side; we are talking about a real king and queen who might be blocked by the patient's car. Should we thus be satisfied with simply saying [as Sharpe seems to], "Here is something that imaginarily, fantastically renews one of the patient's aggressive attitudes, an attitude of rivalry comparable to that which one can attribute to the fact of wetting his bed"? I am not so sure.

If this fantasy should make us think of something, it is the fact that the royal couple is not in just any old place – it is blocked in a car that is stopped and is thus exposed to the gaze of onlookers. What is involved here seems far more akin to the frantic search for the phallus than a minor instance of bed-wetting.

As regards the subject, the phallus is a sort of slippery, darting animal [furet] which is nowhere, which one must find, and about which it is clear that one will never find it. The subject is in his car, under this hood, under the top, inside the protective shell that has 275 long been constructed around his ego, and this also gives him the possibility of slipping away with a "peak of speed."

On the other hand, at the moment at which the king and queen are going to be blocked under the roof of their car and thus visible to one and all, they are going to find themselves in the same position in which we long ago heard the laughter of the Olympians echo. The subject will be in the position of Vulcan who captures Mars and Venus in one and the same net.

Everyone knows that the laughter of the gods who were assembled on that occasion still resounds in our ears and in Homer's verses.

Where is the phallus? It is always the mainspring of comedy.

Let us not forget, after all, that this fantasy [of blocking the royal couple's car] is above all a fantasy that revolves far more directly around a notion of incongruity than of anything else. It is closely connected with what constitutes the unity of the dream with all that surrounds it – namely, the fundamental situation of aphanisis, not in the sense of the disappearance of desire, but in the strict sense that the word deserves if we make the following noun with it: aphanisos. It is less "to disappear" than "to make disappear."

Quite recently, a talented writer by the name of Raymond Queneau used the following words as the epigraph to a lovely novel, Zazie in the Metro: ο πλασας ηφανισεν, "He who made it, made it disappear"; he carefully hid its mainsprings.

In the final analysis, this is clearly what is at stake. Aphanisis here is the hiding [escamotage] of the object in question – namely, the phallus. If the subject cannot accede to the Other's world, it is inasmuch as the phallus is not included in the game, being preserved, instead, on the sidelines.

As you will see, what makes people most neurotic is not the fear of losing the phallus or the fear of castration.

The thoroughly fundamental mainspring of neurosis is not to want the Other to be castrated.

SEVEN CLASSES ON HAMLET

XIII

IMPOSSIBLE ACTION

Freud on Hamlet
A more fundamental framework
Oedipus and Hamlet
The first threads
Ophelia, barometer of desire

I believe that we have taken the structural analysis of the model dream found in Ella Sharpe's book far enough for you to have at least been able to see how important this work is to us, given the path we are trying to follow this year, regarding desire and its interpretation.

Although some of you told me you were unable to figure out in what way I referred to Lewis Carroll in the second-to-last class, I am surprised you did not recall the "double rule of three" I used to organize the two stages of the relationship between the subject and the more or less fetishistic object.

This led in the end to what was expressed as capital I, identification with the Ideal. I intentionally left unanswered what identification boiled down to in the first of the two equations I provided regarding the case, the equation involving his sister's sandals, by writing an x in the place of I.

I do not believe any of you failed to realize that this x was, naturally, the phallus.

$$\frac{\text{his sister}}{$} \lozenge \frac{\text{straps}}{\text{Phallus}}$$

But what is important here is where the phallus is situated. It is situated precisely in the place of primal identification, I, identification with the mother. This is because the subject did not, in fact, 280 want to deny [dénier] his mother the phallus. As psychoanalytic theory has always taught us, subjects want to continue to believe their mothers have a phallus. They refuse the Other's castration.

As I told you, the patient did not want to lose his queen, since it was the game of chess that was at issue. He did not want to put Ella Sharpe into any position but that of the idealized phallus, a position he cautioned her to stay in by giving a "little cough" before entering her consulting room. He instructed her to make certain traces disappear so that he would not in any way have to bring them into play in the analysis.

Regarding the idealized phallus, we will perhaps have the opportunity to return to Lewis Carroll this year. You will see that this is literally what is involved in Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and Through the Looking-Glass. These two Alice tales are virtually an epic poem of phallic avatars. You can already go ahead and start reading them so that you will be prepared for certain things I may be led to say about them.

Something may have struck you in what I told you and highlighted about the position of Ella Sharpe's patient with respect to the phallus, regarding the opposition between being and having. When I told you that the question that arose for him was that of being, and that he would have had to be it without having it, which is how I defined the feminine position, it is impossible that there did not arise in you, regarding this being and not being the phallus, an echo that truly forces itself upon us regarding the whole of this particular case study.

It echoes Hamlet's "To be or not to be" which has always been so enigmatic – it has almost become a joke – and which tells a great deal about the style of Hamlet's position.

If we follow this pathway, we will immediately be led to one of the earliest topics of Freud's thought, regarding the way in which the position of desire is organized.

Indeed, it is in the very first edition of the Traumdeutung that Freud raised the topic of Hamlet to a rank equivalent to that of Oedipus. He had no doubt been thinking about the so-called Oedipus complex for some time by then, as we know from letters he wrote [to Fliess] that were not intended for publication. Oedipus 281 makes his first appearance in print in the Traumdeutung in 1900. The footnote regarding Hamlet was published at the same time and it was moved into the main body of the text in 1914.

The topic of Hamlet was returned to on many occasions after Freud broached it, and I probably will not examine every author who has turned his attention to it. You are aware that Ernest Jones was the first to do so after Freud. Ella Sharpe also formulated a number of things about Hamlet that are not devoid of interest, the study of Shakespeare's work having been at the crux of her training. We will perhaps have the opportunity to come back to this.

I believe that taking up the topic of Hamlet can serve to bolster our work here on the castration complex, work that aims to indicate how it is concretely articulated as the work of analysis unfolds.

Today we will begin to clear the ground for such an undertaking.

We will begin by asking ourselves what Freud meant by taking up Hamlet, and what is demonstrated by what later authors were able to say about it.

Here is Freud's comment on Hamlet, which is worth reading at the outset of our study of it. I will give it to you in translation.

Freud has just spoken about the Oedipus complex for the first time, and it is worth pointing out that he introduces it regarding "Dreams of the death of persons of whom the dreamer is fond" [Chapter 5, section d]. The dream that served as our point of departure and first guide this year was chosen by me from another chapter of the Traumdeutung, because it was one of the simplest having to do with a dead person.

In talking about it, I highlighted something that initially presented itself quite naturally – namely, three signifiers that were pinpointed by Freud – and showed the relationships among them with the help of the two lines of intersubjectivity, one above the other, each of which doubles the other.

The famous words "he did not know" appear in the dream in a form which is incarnated, in some sense, by the father himself, and in a place which is that of the father. It is the precise fact that the father is unaware [or: unconscious, inconscient] that is enunciated in 282 the words "he did not know." The image of the father here incarnates the subject's own unconscious, as well as his unconscious wish for his father's death.

The son has another wish regarding his father, one he is aware of, which is why he can want his father not to become aware of it. It is a sort of well-meaning wish, a wish for a relieving or consoling death. We thus see that the subject's lack of awareness regarding his Oedipal death wish is incarnated, in the dream image, in the form of a wish that the father not know that the son had formulated a well-meaning death wish toward him. "He did not know," the dream says absurdly, "that he was dead." This is where the dream-text ends.

As for the expression "as he wished," which is not included in the dream and is not known to the subject, even if it is known to the fantasized father, Freud tells us that this is the signifier that we must consider to be repressed.

Here now is Freud's footnote on Hamlet:

> Another of the great creations of tragic poetry, Shakespeare's Hamlet, has its roots in the same soil as Oedipus Rex. But the changed treatment of the same material reveals the whole difference in the mental life of these two widely separated epochs of civilization: the secular advance of repression in the emotional life of mankind. [Lacan comments: "the translation of Freud's term Gemütsleben by vie sentimentale ("emotional life" here) is approximate."] In the Oedipus the child's wishful fantasy [Wunschphantasie] that underlies it is brought into the open and realized as it would be in a dream. [SE IV, p. 264]

Freud did, in fact, stress that Oedipal dreams are like offshoots of the unconscious desires that are their primary source and that never stop resurfacing. As for Sophocles' Oedipus and other versions of the Oedipus tale in Greek tragedy, they are like the development and fabrication of the unconscious desires that always emerge. This is how things are articulated by Freud verbatim, who tells us that in Hamlet the child's desire "remains repressed; and – just as in the case of a neurosis – we only learn of its existence from its Hemmungswirkungen, its inhibiting consequences."

> Strangely enough, the overwhelming effect produced by the more modern tragedy has turned out to be compatible with the fact that people have remained completely in the dark as to 283 the hero's character. The play is built up on Hamlet's hesitations over fulfilling the task of revenge that is assigned to him; but its text offers no reasons or motives for these hesitations and an immense variety of attempts at interpreting them have failed to produce a result. According to the view which was originated by Goethe and is still the prevailing one today, Hamlet represents the type of man whose power of direct action is paralyzed by an excessive development of his intellect [Gedankentätigkeit: "Von des Gedankens Blässe angekränkelt"]. (He is "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.") According to another view, the dramatist has tried to portray a pathologically irresolute character which might be classed as neurasthenic. The plot of the drama shows us, however, that Hamlet is far from being represented as a person incapable of taking any action. We > see him doing so on two occasions: first in a sudden outburst of temper, when he runs his sword through the eavesdropper behind the arras

– you are aware that this is a reference to Polonius, and that Hamlet kills him while having a talk with his mother that is far from being crucial – nothing in the play is ever crucial, except for its lethal ending, for there, everything that had been put off until then in the nexus of the action accumulates, in the form of cadavers, in a few short moments – > and secondly in a premeditated and even crafty fashion, when, with all the callousness of a Renaissance prince, he sends the two courtiers [Lacan comments: "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, who turn out to be false friends"] to the death that had been planned for himself. What is it, then, that inhibits him in fulfilling the task set him by his father's ghost? [SE IV, pp. 264–5]

You recall that the play opens with the appearance of this ghost on the platform of Elsinore Castle before two guards who soon afterward alert Hamlet to this.

> The answer, once again, is that it is the peculiar nature of the task. Hamlet is able to do anything – except take vengeance on the man who did away with his father and took that father's place with his mother, the man who shows him the repressed wishes of his own childhood realized. Thus the loathing which should drive him on to revenge is replaced in him by self-reproaches, by scruples of conscience, which remind him that he himself is literally no better than the sinner whom he is to punish. Here I have translated into conscious terms what was bound to remain unconscious in Hamlet's mind. [SE IV, p. 265]

Freud's first commentary situates Hamlet's place in such a finely balanced way that it paves, as it were, the straight and narrow way we must simply go down in order to follow his lead. This is altogether clear, so much so that everything contributed by later authors appears to be nothing but so many excursions or embroideries – and, as you will see, sometimes rather farfetched ones – around 284
Freud's initial sketch. It occasionally happens that the points on which these later authors focus, as psychoanalytic theory advances, are valid and confirmed by the play, but it is at the cost of the kind of rigor with which Freud situated the problem right from the outset.

At the same time, I would say that the whole question lies in what is situated by Freud at the level of "scruples of conscience," which is in short the point in his footnote that has been least exploited and investigated.

Since these scruples of conscience are presented to us as being the way in which we can express at the conscious level what remains unconscious in "the hero's character," it seems legitimate all the same to wonder how this is articulated in the unconscious. Scruples of conscience can only be viewed as a symptomatic development. Now one thing is clear, which is that a symptomatic development is not located in the unconscious; it is located in the conscious, constructed in some way by means of defense. We must thus ask ourselves what in the unconscious corresponds to this conscious structure, and this is precisely the question we are going to try to answer.

Be that as it may, we see that it did not take Freud long to throw a first bridge over the abyss that is Hamlet. In truth, it is striking that Hamlet remained a total literary enigma until Freud came along. Which does not mean that it is no longer an enigma, but we at least have this first bridge. Other works are similarly enigmatic, like Molière's Misanthrope.

Let me read you the remainder of the paragraph:

> The distaste for sexuality expressed by Hamlet in his conversation with Ophelia fits in very well with this: the same distaste which was destined to take possession of the poet's mind more and more during the years that followed, and which reached its extreme expression in Timon of Athens. [SE IV, p. 265]

I will read you the end of the note too, for in the space of two short sentences, it paves the way for those who have since tried to organize the whole of Shakespeare's work by considering its development as indicative of a personal problem involving repression.
285 One of whom was Ella Sharpe, who did so in her article on Hamlet that came out in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis and was republished after her death in the volume of her Collected Papers. It was certainly imprudent of her to schematize things in this way; in any case her approach can be criticized from a methodological standpoint, which is not to say that she discovered nothing of value.

Here is a bit more of the footnote:

> For it can of course only be the poet's own mind which confronts us in Hamlet. I observe in a book on Shakespeare by Georg Brandes (1896) a statement that Hamlet was written > immediately after the death of Shakespeare's father (in 1601), that is, under the immediate impact of his bereavement and, as we may well assume, while his childhood feelings about his father had been freshly revived. It is known, too, that Shakespeare's own son who died at an early age bore the name of "Hamnet" . . . [SE IV, pp. 265–6]

We can see, in these simple indications, that Freud leaves far behind him what later authors focused on.

I, for one, would like to broach the play on the basis of notions that I have managed to spell out here since the beginning of the year. For I believe they allow us to bring together in a more synthetic and striking way the various mainsprings of what occurs in Hamlet.

Thanks to them, we can in some sense simplify the multiplicity of agencies [instances] we often find ourselves faced with in current psychoanalytic commentaries, which smack of reduplication, when we see, for example, the same article take up successively the same case, it does not matter which one, in terms of the opposition between the unconscious and defense, then in terms of the opposition between the ego and the id, and, to top it all off, adding everything that can be said when one brings in the superego – these different vantage points never being unified. This tends to give these commentaries a vagueness and excessive weight that makes them of little use to us in our experience.

We try here to develop guides that allow us to resituate the different organs of the mental apparatus, which Freud gave us in the successive stages of his thought, in a way that takes into account the 286 fact that they only partially overlap, semantically speaking.

It is not by putting them all together into one big set that we can make them function properly. We can do so, as it were, only by situating them in a framework that we attempt to make more fundamental, in such a way that we know what we are doing with all these references when we work with them.

Let us thus begin to spell out the great tragedy of Hamlet.

As evocative as Freud's footnote was, I must nevertheless remind you what the play is about.

It begins shortly after the death of a king who was, as his son Hamlet tells us, truly admirable – an ideal king and father – and who died mysteriously.

The story people were told about his death is that he was bitten by a snake in an orchard, an "orchard"* that has been interpreted by psychoanalysts. Very soon after his death, Hamlet's mother married her late husband's brother, Claudius. Claudius is execrated by our hero for reasons that go well beyond the rivalry Hamlet may feel toward him for having taken the throne from Hamlet, including everything he suspects regarding the scandalous goings-on that led his uncle to replace his father.

Moreover, the father then appears as a "ghost"* in order to reveal to Hamlet under what conditions the dramatic betrayal occurred, which, as the ghost tells him, was clearly an assassination. While he was sleeping, a poison, mysteriously named "Hebenon,"* was poured into his ear. This passage has obviously excited the curiosity of psychoanalysts.

"Hebenon" is a made-up sort of word. I am not sure whether it is found in any other text. People have tried to find various equivalents for it, and have come up with a word that is close to it in sound:
287 "henbane." It is quite clear that this assassination through the ear could in no way satisfy a toxicologist, and it has led to plenty of interpretations on the part of analysts.

Let us immediately consider something that stands out for us owing to points we have highlighted. Let us use the keys we have developed here, even if it seems to you that the conditions that led to their emergence are ever so peculiar. The fact that they were created for very specific purposes does not rule out the fact that, in accordance with one of the clearest phases of psychoanalytic experience, what is most particular is what has the most universal value.

It is in this sense that the sentence "He did not know he was dead," which I brought out in the analysis of the dream about the dead father, is of fundamental importance. Indeed, keeping the Other in the dark regarding any specific circumstance is absolutely foundational in one's relation to the Other. You are well aware of this, since you are taught that one of the major turning points in a child's soul is the moment at which the child, after having believed that all his thoughts are known to his parents, realizes that it is nothing of the sort.

We should always have qualms about using expressions like "all his thoughts." We are the ones who call them "thoughts"; as for what the subject experiences, these "thoughts" are all there is. All there is is known to his parents, including even his innermost impulses [mouvements].

Hence the importance of the moment at which he realizes that the Other may not know. This "not knowing" in the Other is correlated with the very constitution of the subject's unconscious, and it is indispensable that we take this into account. One is, in some sense, the flip side of the other and perhaps its very foundation. I say "perhaps" because this formulation does not suffice to constitute them as such.

Whatever the case may be, one thing is clear, which serves us as a guide as we broach the tragedy of Hamlet. Namely, that we are going to try to refute the historical notion – which is a bit superficial all the same, clearly related to the atmosphere and style of that time – that what we have in Hamlet is some sort of modernist tale and that with respect to the incredible stature of Antiquity's writers, Modern writers are but poor degenerates. This is truly a nineteenth-century-type comment, and it is no accident that Freud cites Georg Brandes; we will never know whether Freud was familiar with Nietzsche's work at that time, even if it is probable. But we might find this reference to Modern writers inadequate. Why would Modern writers be more neurotic than those of Antiquity? It is, in any case, a petitio principii. What we are trying to articulate should go further than this petitio principii or than the simplistic explanation that "things are going to pot because things are going to pot." 288

What we have before us is a work the first threads of which we are going to begin to tease apart.

The first thread in Hamlet is that the father quite clearly knows that he is dead as his brother Claudius wished, Claudius having wanted to take his place. The crime is not hidden from him, but from the world, a world that is represented on the stage. This is a crucial point, without which the drama of Hamlet could not, of course, even exist.

This point is brought out by Jones, in an article that is easy to lay your hands on, "The Death of Hamlet's Father." Jones mentions there that Shakespeare introduced an essential difference into the original saga in which the king was assassinated in front of everyone, owing to something having to do with his relations with his wife. There, the king was murdered by his brother, but everyone knew it, whereas in Hamlet the thing is hidden, but the father knows it. This is what is important. Indeed, it is the father himself who informs us of it.

Horatio comments to Hamlet: "There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave / To tell us this" [I, v, 124–5]. Freud cites this several times, it sounding a bit like a proverb. If it is the Oedipal theme that is, in fact, at work here, we already know quite a bit about it. But when Hamlet was written, not much was yet known about it. It is significant that the fable is designed in such a way that the father does know.

This is an absolutely essential element, and it constitutes a major difference in thread with respect to the first major tale, the tragedy of Oedipus. Oedipus does not know. But once he does, once he has discovered everything, the drama moves into high gear, and continues right up to his self-punishment – in other words, his resolving of things. But the Oedipal crime is committed by Oedipus unwittingly 289 [dans l'inconscience]. In Hamlet, the Oedipal crime is known, and it is known to its victim, a victim who emerges in order to bring it to the subject's awareness [connaissance].

You can begin to see the pathway I am following and the method I am adopting.

It is a classical method that proceeds by comparison, comparison of different threads of a structure that is taken to be an articulated whole; and nowhere is there more articulation than in what is located in the realm of the signifier. I never stop highlighting the very notion of articulation, and it is, in short, consubstantial with the signifier. After all, we only speak of articulation in the world because the signifier gives meaning to this term. Otherwise there is nothing but continuity and discontinuity, but no articulation.

We will proceed by a sort of comparison of the homologous threads in the two phases, Oedipus and Hamlet, just as Freud compares them, and in order to grasp how things cohere. If in one of the two dramas we come across a note that is the exact opposite of that found in the other play, we will try to see if, why, how, and to what degree we find a corresponding modification in it. I assume that bringing out these correlations will lead us to the junction [joint] of the kind of causality at work in these two tragedies.

The initial idea is thus that what is most instructive to us are these correlated modifications. Highlighting them and writing them out in a quasi-algebraic way will allow us to group together the signifying mainsprings and make them more or less utilizable.

In the dream about the dead father, we placed "he did not know" on the upper line [of the graph]. In Hamlet, we place "he knew he was dead" there, for the father knows he is dead in accordance with the murderous wish, his brother's wish, that led him to his grave.

What is the relationship between Claudius and Hamlet like?

In the psychoanalytic tradition, people always go straight for superimposed identifications. The most convenient concepts being the least developed ones, God only knows where people will stop in their use of these identifications. In the final analysis, we are told that Claudius is a form of Hamlet. What he does is what Hamlet wants to do. This is to jump the gun.

290 Indeed, in order to situate Hamlet's position with respect to his desire, we are obliged to bring in the "scruples of conscience." This gives rise, in the relationship between Hamlet and Claudius, to a twofold position that is profoundly ambivalent. If Hamlet relates to

Claudius as a rival, we see that this rivalry is quite odd and at one remove, because Claudius is also in reality he who has done what Hamlet would not have dared to do. Because of that, Claudius is surrounded by some sort of mysterious protective shield that we must strive to define.

If Hamlet leaves him unscathed, it is because, we are told, of his scruples of conscience. But how much weight do they carry with respect to what is forced on him once the ghost* has literally ordered him to take revenge on Claudius for him? From the moment of this initial encounter, Hamlet, in order to take action against his father's murderer, who is also the usurper who dispossessed him, is armed with all the necessary feelings – a feeling of having been usurped, of rivalry, and of vengeance – as well as with the explicit order received from a father who is above all admired. 291
Surely, everything in Hamlet is aligned for him to act, and yet he does not act.

This is obviously where the problem begins.

To move in the direction of solving it, we must arm ourselves with the greatest simplicity; I mean that we are always led astray when we employ ready-made keys instead of really grappling with the question. Freud tells us that Hamlet's scruples of conscience are the conscious representation of something that is articulated in the unconscious. So what we have to do is find what this unconscious desire means. And we can already say with Freud that, given the way things begin, there is clearly something wrong with Hamlet's desire.

It is here that we are going to select our pathway, which is not easy, as we are not much further along than those who went before us.

What we are going to do is take the tragedy as a whole and consider how Hamlet conducts himself throughout it.

Since we have spoken about Hamlet's desire, we must situate his fantasy, inasmuch as fantasy is for us the axis, soul, center, and touchstone of desire.

Analysts have, naturally, looked into this, but they have confined their attention to the relations between Hamlet and the conscious object of his desire, about which Shakespeare cannot be said to withhold details from us. But that is not exactly it; that is perhaps not in the same register as fantasy.

In the play, we have a sort of barometer of Hamlet's position with regard to desire. We have it most obviously and clearly in the form of the character Ophelia.

Ophelia is quite obviously one of the most fascinating creations that has ever been offered up to human imagination. It is remarkable to see what we might call the drama of the female object – the drama of desire, such as it appears at the beginning of a civiliza-292 tion in the form of Helen [of Troy] – incarnated in the drama and misfortune of Ophelia, which is perhaps also a culmination. As you know, this drama has been taken up in many forms by artists, whether poets or painters, at least in the pre-Raphaelite era, who went so far as to provide us with polished paintings in which we find the very same terms as those provided by Shakespeare regarding Ophelia floating in her dress down the river into which she, in her madness, allowed herself to slip – for Ophelia's suicide is ambiguous [see Plate 1].

Freud tells us that we see in the play, correlated with what we might strictly speaking call the main drama, a horror of femininity as such, whose terms are articulated, in the strictest sense of the word, by Hamlet himself. For he throws in Ophelia's face all the degrading, fickle, and corrupting possibilities linked to the unfolding of women's lives when they allow themselves to be dragged into all the acts that little by little make them into mothers – in the name of which Hamlet pushes Ophelia away in what seems to be a most sarcastic and cruel way.

There is an essential correlation between the development of Hamlet's position with respect to Ophelia and what determines his overall position with respect to desire.

Let us note in passing that we are presented with an interpretation of this development by a wild, amateur psychoanalyst: Polonius, Ophelia's father. He immediately locates the cause of Hamlet's melancholia. According to Polonius, the problem is that although Hamlet wrote love letters to Ophelia, she responded sharply to them, following instructions that Polonius gave her, he adhering solely to his duty as a father. Stated otherwise, Polonius believes that Hamlet is lovesick. One can always find an easy, external interpretation of events; and Polonius, who is quite a caricature of a character, is there to represent for us the ironic outcome this easy approach deserves.

Although the change in Hamlet's sexual position is profound and altogether crucial, no one doubts but that it is organized somewhat differently. What is involved naturally concerns the relation between Hamlet and what? His action, essentially. Hamlet needs to take action and his entire position as a subject [or: subject position, position de sujet] depends upon it.

We see, quite precisely, throughout this play that Hamlet is fundamentally in a position, with respect to action, that the English language designates with a word that is far more often used in 293
English than in French: procrastinating. In French we would say ajournement (putting off) or retardement (delaying). Indeed, this is what is involved: Hamlet procrastinates, and he does so throughout the play, making it the procrastination play par excellence.

We want to know both what it means that whenever he has the opportunity to take the action in question, he puts it off, and what is determinant at the end when he finally takes the plunge. The question that arises is that of the signification of the action he is expected to take. This is the point to be brought out regarding procrastination, at least in this case.

What I have already pointed out to you indicates this adequately: the action Hamlet is expected to take has nothing to do with an Oedipal action – namely, revolt against his father or conflict with his father, in the sense that it is creative in the psyche.

Hamlet's action is not the same as that of Oedipus. Oedipus' action sustained Oedipus' life. It made him into the hero he was prior to his fall, while he knew nothing. It gave the story's conclusion its dramatic character. Hamlet, on the other hand, knows that he is guilty for being. It is unbearable to him to be. Well before the beginning of the drama, Hamlet knows what it means to have committed the crime of existing. It is on the basis of this beginning that he finds himself faced with a choice, a choice in which the problem of existence arises in his own terms – namely, "To be, or not to be,"* which irremediably involves him in being, as he quite clearly articulates.

It is precisely because, in Hamlet, the Oedipal drama is there at the beginning and not at the end that a choice is offered to the hero between being and not being. The very fact that there is this either/or proves that he is caught up in the signifying chain, in what makes it such that he is in any case a victim of this choice.

Let me read the passage to you [Lacan reads aloud part of Letourneur's eighteenth-century translation, which he considers to be the best translation of Hamlet into French]:

To be, or not to be – that is the question:
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles
And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep –
294 No more – and by a sleep to say we end
The heartache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to . . .

I believe these words are intended to have an impact on us.

To die, to sleep –
To sleep – perchance to dream: ay, there's the rub,
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil

– "This mortal coil"* is not exactly our envelope, but rather the sort of twist of something that is wrapped around us –

Must give us pause. There's the respect
That makes calamity of so long life.
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
Th'oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of th' unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? [III, i, 56–76]

What does Hamlet find himself faced with when the question "To be, or not to be" arises? He must confront the place occupied by what his father told him. And what his father told him as a ghost is that he was taken by surprise "in the blossoms of [his] sin" [I, v, 76]. The son must deal with the place occupied by the Other's sin, a sin that was not redeemed [payé] by the Other.

The one who knows here [the father] is someone who has not paid [payé] for the crime of existing, unlike Oedipus who paid for a crime he did not know he had committed. The consequences for the next generation are not inconsequential, moreover, since Oedipus' two sons dream only of killing each other with all the vigor and conviction one might desire. Things are altogether different in Hamlet's case.

Hamlet can neither pay in his father's stead nor leave the debt unpaid. In the final analysis, he must get the debt paid, but, in the conditions in which he finds himself, the blow strikes him. Following a dark plot, which we will discuss at length, it is only after Hamlet has been wounded that he can strike, with the very weapon from which he has received his mortal wound, the criminal who is there within range – namely, Claudius.

The mainspring that constitutes the whole difficulty of the problem Hamlet faces in assuming responsibility for his action [assumer son acte], is the fact that both the father and son know – for both of them, their eyes have been opened. We want to figure out by what pathways Hamlet can take action. What are the roundabout pathways that will render possible an action that is in itself impossible, owing to the fact that the Other knows? What are the pathways that will finally allow Hamlet to accomplish what must be accomplished? 295

These are the pathways that must hold our interest; they are the ones that we will find instructive.

This is the true problem that needed to be introduced today.

I must mention the end of the play, and point out to you how Hamlet finally manages to take action. Let us not forget that, although he manages to do so and although Claudius is struck dead at the end, the job has nevertheless been seriously botched.

Hamlet has had to do nothing less than run through someone whom he certainly cast into the abyss, as you will see – namely, his friend and companion Laertes. Just before that, his mother accidentally poisoned herself with the very goblet that was supposed to have served as a backup murder weapon in case the poisoned tip of the foil did not touch Hamlet. It is only after a number of other victims have fallen, and not before having been dealt a mortal blow himself, that Hamlet can stab Claudius.

Even though he does run him through, even though a sort of rectification of desire occurs in extremis that makes it possible for him to act, there is nevertheless something here that raises a question for us. How was the act accomplished? The key, what makes it such that this incredible play has never been replaced by another, better one, bears precisely on this point.

For, in short, what are these great mythical themes that creative poets have been testing their mettle against throughout the ages? This long series of variations for centuries upon centuries is nothing but a sort of long approximation that is such that the myth, whose every possibility has been exploited, ends up by entering, strictly speaking, into our subjectivity and psychology. I maintain, and I will unambiguously maintain – and in doing so, I believe that I am 296 following in Freud's footsteps – that poetic creations generate psychological creations more than they reflect them.

. The primordial relationship of rivalry between son and father has always had something diffuse about it. As taken up by Shakespeare, this is what gives Hamlet its depth and constitutes its veritable crux.

It is precisely because something – namely, castration – is missing in the original, initial situation of the drama of Hamlet, insofar as it is distinct from that of Oedipus, that things present themselves in the play in the form of a slow zigzagging progression, following many a detour, a slow birthing of the necessary castration.

It is precisely because something finally becomes equivalent to what was missing, because something finally is realized, that Hamlet takes the final action to which he succumbs. Things having gone so far that he cannot live on, others, like Fortinbras, who are always ready to receive an inheritance, will succeed him.

THE DESIRE TRAP

Myriad commentaries
A bird catcher's net
The unfolding of the play
The "play scene"*
The key point

Last time we began working on Hamlet.

Our turning to Hamlet was no accident, even if I told you that it came up owing to the formulation "to be or not to be" that forced itself on me as we examined the dream recounted by Ella Sharpe.

I was led to reread some of what has been written about Hamlet by psychoanalysts and also by certain authors who wrote about it prior to them. And since these various writers, at least the best among them, never fail to mention those who had written about Hamlet well before themselves, I must say that I was led quite far, and even got lost along the way now and then, not without pleasure.

A problem arises here, that of how to bring all this material together in relation to our precise goal, which is to give meaning, or at least new meaning, to the function of desire in psychoanalysis and in analytic interpretation. It should not give us too much trouble, however, because what distinguishes the tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as I hope to convince you, is essentially that it is the tragedy of desire.

Hamlet must have been performed for the first time in London during the 1601 winter season, although that is not entirely clear; yet it is what the most rigorous texts suggest. The famous first quarto edition of the text at the time was virtually a "pirate" edition, for it had not been reviewed by the author, but had been borrowed from what were known as "prompt-books,"* booklets used by onstage prompters. This edition – it is quite amusing to know these little tidbits of literary history – remained unknown until 1823 when 298 someone finally got his hands on one of these grimy copies, grimy because they were handled a great deal, probably having been used during performances. The First Folio edition, the main edition of Shakespeare's work, did not start coming out until after his death in 1623, prior to the still larger edition in which the plays are divided into acts; this explains the fact that the division into acts is far less decisive and clear in Shakespeare's plays than in those by other authors. In fact, it is not thought that Shakespeare ever dreamt of dividing his plays into five acts. This is of some importance, because we shall see how Hamlet is divided up.

The winter of 1601 was two years before the death of Queen Elizabeth, and we can view the turning point that Hamlet marks between the two periods of Shakespeare's life as approximately repeating, as it were, the drama related to the transition between two eras in the kingdom, for the tone changes completely when James I takes the throne. Something is already announced, as a certain author once put it, that breaks the crystalline charm of the reign of Elizabeth I, the "Virgin Queen," who had managed to procure many long miraculous years of peace following what constituted in the history of England, as in many other countries, a period of chaos – chaos into which England promptly fell anew, with the whole drama of the Puritan revolution.

In short, 1601 already announces the death of the Queen, which obviously could not have been foreseen, with the execution of her lover, [Robert Devereux, the second] Earl of Essex; this took place the same year as the first performance of the play. These historical reference points are not irrelevant, and I am not the only one who has tried to situate Hamlet in its historical context. But none of what I just told you is highlighted by any psychoanalytic writers, even though such reference points are quite important.

In truth, what has been written about Hamlet by psychoanalytic authors can hardly be qualified as enlightening. But today I will not critique what a certain type of analytic interpretation degenerates into when it takes up Hamlet line by line. I have been trying to find something of interest in it, but, as a matter of fact, one can say nothing about it except that the more writers adopt this line-by-line approach, the more their understanding of the whole text and of its coherence dissipates.

I must say, too, about our Ella Sharpe, whom I make much of, 299 that in her paper* on Hamlet – which was, it is true, unfinished,* having been discovered after her death – she greatly disappointed me. I will nevertheless discuss her paper because it is indicative. It so closely follows the exact same trend that we see dominating psychoanalytic theory, a trend I have been led to explain and critique, that it is worth highlighting. Nevertheless, we are not going to begin with her paper.

We are going to begin with Jones's article published in 1910, which marks an important date in psychoanalytic history; it is a must-read. It came out in the American Journal of Psychology [XXI, 1 (1910): 72–113] and is not easy to get your hands on currently. In a small re-edition he brought out, Jones, I believe, added a few things to his theory of Hamlet. The article is entitled "The Oedipus Complex as an Explanation of Hamlet's Mystery: A Study in Motive."

In it, Jones takes up the problem masterfully posed by Freud in the course of the half-page I read you last time, and about which we can say, in the final analysis, that everything is already there, since even distant points on the horizon are already sketched out – namely, the problematic signification of the female object for Shakespeare. This is, I think, absolutely central.

Freud mentioned Timon of Athens, which is why Ella Sharpe tried to explore that particular connection. She turned all of Shakespeare's work into a sort of vast cyclothymic oscillation, distinguishing the rising pieces – in other words, the ones we might consider to be optimistic, those in which aggression is directed toward the outside world – from those of the descending phase in which aggression strikes the hero or the poet. This is, according to her, how we can classify Shakespeare's plays and sometimes even date them. I do not believe this is altogether valid.

For the time being, and given where we are at, we will confine our attention to Hamlet. I will perhaps make a few points about what follows or precedes it, about Twelfth Night or Troilus and Cressida, for it is almost impossible, I believe, not to take them into account, given to how great a degree they clarify the problems that we are going to first bring up in connection with Hamlet alone.

With his grand style of documentation and the solidity that characterizes his writings and highly distinguishes his contributions, Ernest Jones provides a sort of summary of what he quite rightly calls "Hamlet's mystery."

Now either you realize the magnitude of the question or you do not. For those who do not, I am not going to repeat here what we find in Jones's article. Look into it yourselves in one way or another.

I must tell you that the mass of writings on Hamlet is unequaled. The abundance of literature on the play is nothing short of incredible. More incredible still is the extraordinary range of interpretations that have been given of it. The most contradictory interpretations have followed one another, having been rolled out in the course of history, posing a problem about the problem – namely, why is everybody trying so hard to understand something in it?

These interpretations provide the most varied, incoherent, and extravagant results, yet we cannot say that they go too far.

Just about everything has been said about Hamlet. To give you an extreme example, there is even something called Popular Science Monthly – which must be some sort of popularizing publication on more or less medical topics – that published in 1880 an article entitled "The Impediment of Adipose [: A Celebrated Case]." In it we are told that Hamlet is fat and out of breath at the end of the play, and there is a whole discussion of Hamlet's adipose. [By way of a second extreme example,] someone by the name of Vining revealed in 1881 that Hamlet was a woman disguised as a man, whose goal throughout the play was to seduce Horatio, and it was in order to win Horatio's heart that Hamlet did everything he did. It makes for rather nice reading and I cannot even say that it is of absolutely no interest to us, for it is clear that Hamlet's relations with other men are closely related to the problem posed by the play.

Returning to serious matters, let us recall with Jones that critics have tended to go in one of two directions. And when there are two directions in logic, there is always a third [or: middle, tiers] one, for, 301 as opposed to what we tend to think, the middle is not as excluded as all that. And it is obviously the middle one that is interesting in this case.

The two different directions have been sustained by some pretty hard hitters.

The first includes those who have explored Hamlet's psychology. They obviously take precedence; they must be given pride of place in our esteem. We find here Goethe, and Coleridge, too, who in his Lectures on Shakespeare adopted a highly distinctive stance that I think Jones could have made more of. Jones, curiously enough, primarily provides an extraordinarily in-depth commentary on works on Hamlet in German, which proliferated and were even very long-winded. Even though they are not identical, the stances adopted by Goethe and Coleridge are nevertheless closely related, for both of them emphasize Hamlet's intellect.

Schematically put, let us say that, according to Goethe, Hamlet is action paralyzed by thought. As we know, this conception has had many adherents over the centuries. People have pointed out, and not irrelevantly, of course, that Hamlet had lived for a bit too long in Wittenberg; this has led some people to attribute his intellectual problems to too great a familiarity with what is depicted to us, not unjustifiably, as one of the centers where young German students receive a certain kind of education. From this perspective, Hamlet is, in short, a man who sees all the elements of the game of life, all its complexities and motives, and whose ability to take action is, owing to this knowledge, suspended and paralyzed. This is, strictly speaking, a Goethean problematic, and it did not fail to become quite influential, owing especially to the charm and seductiveness of Goethe's style and personality.

Coleridge goes in the same direction. I do not have time to read you a long passage – one that is far less sociological and far more psychological in nature, indeed it is a brilliant bit of psychology – that he devotes to Hamlet's psychasthenic character; to his inability to select a path and, once selected, to truly commit to it; and to his hesitation between multiple motives. What I would like to mention is a comment Coleridge makes in passing, in his easy conversational style, that in my view goes right to the quick: "I have a smack of Hamlet myself, if I may say so."

Coleridge recognizes himself in Hamlet and he is not the only writer to do so. One can find a similar remark in the work of a 302 quasi-contemporary of ours who wrote some incredible things in his Essays on Shakespeare. I am referring to Hazlitt, who is not even mentioned by Jones – wrongly so, for he wrote the most remarkable things on the topic at the time.

Coleridge goes further still when he says that, in the final analysis, this tragedy has been examined so often that we barely know how to discuss it anymore, no more than we would know how to describe our own faces. He provides another note that goes in the same general direction, and these are lines that I will make much of.

I will only briefly mention the second direction, the one that attributes Hamlet's bind [embarras] to an external difficulty – that is, to a problem that comes from the outside.

This conception was developed by a set of German literary critics; the two main critics here, Klein and Werder, were late nineteenth-century Berliners, and Jones rightly groups them together. According to these critics, the task Hamlet undertook was to get his people to recognize Claudius' guilt, Claudius having killed Hamlet's father, married his mother, and usurped the throne of Denmark. This conception does not stand up to scrutiny, however, for the difficulties Hamlet supposedly has in carrying out his task – in either of two ways, either in getting Claudius' guilt recognized before killing him, or in first murdering him and then justifying it afterward – are very easily dissipated just by reading the text, for in it Hamlet never asks himself this sort of question.

His purpose is to take revenge for his father on the person who murdered him and who at the same time seized the throne and the father's wife, whom the father loved more than anything else. These crimes must be atoned for through the most violent action: murder. Not only is this purpose never called into question by Hamlet, but I will read you passages in which he calls himself a coward, while frothing at the mouth onstage, despairing of ever being able to decide to take action. He never doubts this purpose for even a moment. He does not call the validity of this task into question in the slightest.

At the same period, there was a writer named Loening, whom Jones makes much of, who decisively critiqued the theories put forward by Klein and Werder. Let me mention in passing that Jones gives Loening very high praise. He mentions several of Loening's remarks that appear to me to be very insightful indeed.

303 But none of this is terribly important, since this approach is no longer germane from the moment we consider the third direction, the one Jones associates with psychoanalysis. The deliberateness with which I am laying all of this out is necessary, as these earlier views constitute the backdrop against which the mystery of Hamlet presents itself to us.

The third conception is as follows: although Hamlet does not doubt even for an instant that he must accomplish this task, for some reason unknown to himself this task disgusts him. In other words, the difficulty resides in the task itself, not in the subject or in what is supposedly happening in the outside world (needless to say, as regards the direction that plays up the outside world, there are versions that are far more subtle than the one I mentioned earlier). It is the task itself that is posited as essentially problematic.

Such is the very solid way in which Jones situates the psychoanalytic perspective on Hamlet, and it should serve us as a lesson in method.

Jones shows, moreover, that the notion of an internal contradiction in the task itself was not invented by psychoanalysts; it was already mentioned by Loening, if we are to lend credence to the quotes from his work that Jones provides, and by a certain number of other authors as well. These authors clearly saw that we can grasp the problematic, conflictual nature of the task from certain signs whose clear character no one needed psychoanalysis to notice: namely, the myriad different, self-contradictory, and inconsistent reasons Hamlet gives for deferring the task, for not carrying it out when the opportunity presents itself. Long before psychoanalysis, psychologists had already noticed the superstructural, rationalized, and rationalizing nature of the reasons Hamlet gives, and Jones brings this out very clearly.

Yet the question is to figure out wherein lies the conflict. Those who have written in this vein allow us to glimpse that there is something that presents itself on the surface, and then a sort of underlying difficulty which – although it is not, strictly speaking, articulated as unconscious – is considered to be deeper and partially uncontrolled, not completely elucidated or perceived by the subject. Jones critiques their theories with the considerable know-how we generally find in his articles, which played a considerable role in getting the notion of the unconscious itself accepted by a broad swath of intellectuals.

On the one hand, Jones knows how to powerfully articulate what 304 these authors, some of whom are quite subtle, have argued to be the underlying motives that are blocking Hamlet's action. They have, for example, mentioned a juridical motive – namely, whether or not he has the right to do what he is asked to do. Lord knows that these German authors made no bones about appealing to all sorts of registers, all of this having taken place in a highly Hegelian era. On the other hand, Jones can blithely wax ironic on this score, for he convincingly shows that the unconscious mainspring has nothing to do with motives of a lofty or highly abstract kind, related to morality, the State, or Absolute Knowledge, but that there must be something far more radical and concrete at work.

It was around 1909 that Freud's ideas first began to make it to America, and Jones decided to write and publish an account of Freud's theory of dreams, as we find it in his well-known lectures at Clark University that were first published in English, if memory serves me well.

But what we are concerned with here is Jones's study of Hamlet that he publishes in 1910, a study that is designed to lead us to the following conclusion: "We thus reach the apparent paradox that the hero, the poet, and the audience are all profoundly moved by feelings due to a conflict of the source of which they are unaware" ["The Oedipus Complex as an Explanation of Hamlet's Mystery," p. 86]. Even though this does not seem terribly substantial, it should not stop us from realizing that Jones's analysis of Hamlet truly goes as far as anyone could have gone at that point in time, I believe, in bringing out what we might call the mythical structure of the Oedipus complex in the unfolding of the drama.

[On the topic of myth,] I must say that we are not all so enlightened as to be able to laugh unconcernedly when we see Hamlet associated with all kinds of people, including Telesphorus, Amphion, Moses, Pharaoh, Zoroaster, Jesus, and Herod, everyone being lumped together in the same package. Around 1900, two authors published an article entitled "Hamlet in Iran" in a well-known journal, in which they relate the myth of Hamlet to Iranian myths of the legend of Pyrrhus, about which another writer made a great deal in an unknown, inaccessible journal. It is essential to remark what sort of plunge has been taken at this level, even if I am not saying that it is the only one possible.

Indeed, although a psychological approach to the case of Hamlet preceded the birth of psychoanalysis, as I mentioned, the first 305 psychoanalytic step consisted in transforming the psychological approach, not by referring to some deeper form of psychology but by referring to a mythical structure that is assumed to have the same meaning for all human beings.

Nevertheless, something more is necessary, for Hamlet is not, after all, the Pyrrhus saga, stories about Cyrus with Cambyses, or about Perseus and his grandfather Acrisius.

It is something else. And we are going to see what that something is.

It is not just because there have been myriad commentaries on Hamlet that we are talking about it.

The French can, in the end, have no real idea what Hamlet is about because, owing to something quite odd, I think I can say, based on my own experience, it cannot be performed in French. I have never seen a good staging of Hamlet in French, nor have I ever seen any French actor capable of playing the part of Hamlet or even a French version of the text that was comprehensible.

For those of you who read the text in English, it knocks your socks off, bowls you over, and is altogether unimaginable! There is not a single line or reply in the English text of Hamlet that does not hit you with a force and violence that makes the play absolutely stupefying at every moment. One imagines that it must have just been written, that it could not have been written three centuries ago.

In England, where the play is performed in English, a performance of Hamlet is always a major event. I would go even further, because, after all, one cannot gauge the audience's psychological tension if not at the box office. I will say what it is like for the actors, which is doubly instructive.

First of all, it is altogether clear that to be cast as Hamlet is, for a British actor, the crowning moment of his career. When it is not the crowning moment, it is nevertheless after having acted in the play that he wishes to retire happily by giving his farewell performance, even if his role was nothing but that of the first gravedigger. There is something important here, and we will have to figure out what it means, for I am not mentioning it at random.

Secondly, there is something curious, which is that, in the end, 306 when a British actor manages to get the part of Hamlet, he plays the role well – indeed, they all play it well. Stranger still is the fact that people talk about this or that actor's Hamlet. There are as many Hamlets as there are great actors. People still talk about Garrick's Hamlet, Kean's Hamlet, and so on. This is also extraordinarily instructive.

If there are as many Hamlets as there are great actors, I believe that it is for a reason analogous to the one that makes every performance of the play into a major event and generates such an enormous mass of commentary. It is not the same reason, because it is not same thing to play the role of Hamlet as it is to be interested in it as a spectator or critic. But all this converges on the fact that we can, in the end, believe that if this is the way it is, it is because of the structure of the problem that Hamlet itself poses regarding desire.

My thesis here, which I will ask you to consider, is that Hamlet brings out the different levels, indeed the very framework that I am trying to present to you here, the framework in which desire is situated. The place of desire is so excellently and exceptionally articulated in Hamlet that everybody, I would say, recognizes himself in it. The structure of the play is a type of network or bird catcher's net in which man's desire is caught. And his desire is essentially articulated there in the coordinates that Freud reveals to us – namely, in connection with the Oedipus complex and castration.

This nevertheless assumes that Hamlet is not simply another edition or version of the eternal, typical drama or conflict, that of the hero's struggle against the father, the tyrant, the good or bad father. Shakespeare takes things so far that the way in which the fundamental structure of the eternal saga, found over and over since the beginning of time, presents itself is profoundly modified.

Here I am sketching out points that I will fill in later.

The coordinates of this conflict are modified by Shakespeare in such a way as to be able to bring out how, under certain atypical conditions, the problem of desire is played out, in its most essentially problematic nature, inasmuch as man is not simply invested or possessed by it, but must situate or find this desire – and find it at 307 the greatest personal cost and suffering, so much so that he can find it only in extremis, namely in an action that can only be completed or realized for him on condition that it be lethal.

This incites us to examine the unfolding of the play more closely. I do not want to draw this out interminably, but I must nevertheless bring out the most salient features.

Act I concerns what one might call the presentation of the problem. And here, at the point of intersection, accumulation, and confusion around which the play revolves, we must nevertheless come back to something simple, which is the text. You are going to see that its composition is worth keeping in mind, for it is not something amorphous that wanders off in one direction and then in another.

As you will see, the play begins with a changing of the guard on the platform of Elsinore Castle, and I must say that it is one of the most masterful openings of all of Shakespeare's plays. Not all of them are as masterful from the very moment the curtain rises.

The guard changes at midnight and there are some very cute, striking things in the text. For example, it is the guard who comes to relieve the others who asks "Who's there?" whereas it should be the other way around. Indeed, everything happens abnormally, they are all anxiety-ridden by something they are expecting, and this something only takes forty lines to show up.

Although it is midnight when the changing of the guard occurs, one o'clock sounds from a bell when the ghost appears. And from the moment at which the ghost appears, things move very quickly, but the action is interspersed with rather curious moments of stagnation.

Immediately thereafter, there is a scene in which the king and queen appear, and the king says that it is high time to set aside our mourning; [it is as if he were saying,] "We can cry with one eye but let us laugh with the other" ["With an auspicious and a dropping eye"; I, ii, 11]. Hamlet, who is there, shows how revolted he is by the swiftness of his mother's remarriage and the fact that she married someone who, compared to his father, is totally inferior in character.

At every moment, we see in Hamlet's words an exaltation of his father as a being on whom, as he says later, > every god did seem to set his seal

> To give the world assurance of a man. [III, iv, 62–3].

308 It is quite a bit later in the play that this sentence is announced by Hamlet, but he expresses similar sentiments right from this early scene.

Hamlet presents himself as having the sense that he has been betrayed and brought down by his mother's conduct – namely, her hasty remarriage, two months, as we are told, after her husband's death. We find this in the famous dialogue with Horatio:

> Thrift, thrift, Horatio. The funeral baked meats
> Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables. [I, ii, 180–1]

I need not remind you of these well-known facts.

In Scene 3, Ophelia and her father Polonius are introduced in connection with a rebuke that Laertes makes to his sister Ophelia, the young girl Hamlet was in love with, as he tells us himself, and whom he is currently repelling sarcastically, given the state he is in. People have rightly wanted to attribute an important role to Laertes with respect to Hamlet in the mythical unfolding of the story, and we will come back to this. Polonius and Laertes successively lecture the unhappy Ophelia about the importance of being prudent and warn her to be wary of Hamlet.

Scenes 4 and 5 bring us the encounter between Hamlet, who has been joined on the platform of Elsinore Castle by Horatio, and his father's ghost. In this encounter Hamlet shows himself to be courageous and impassioned, for he does not hesitate to follow the ghost off to one side and have a rather horrifying conversation with him. Let me underscore the fact that its horrifying nature is articulated by the ghost himself; he cannot reveal to Hamlet the horrible, abominable place where he lives and all that he suffers there, for his son's mortal organs could not bear it. And he gives him an order or command.

It is interesting to immediately note that the command consists of the following: that, however he decides to do it, Hamlet must put an end to the queen's scandalous lust and, moreover, in doing so, he must restrain his own thoughts and feelings – he must not let himself indulge in excessive thoughts about his mother.

Although certain writers have made much of a sort of problematic backdrop in the orders given to Hamlet by the ghost, since the ghost warns the son that he must not trust himself in his relations with his mother, it seems that none of them have pointed out the decisive point – namely that, despite the horrible accusations that are 309 categorically pronounced by the ghost against Claudius, the ghost revealing to Hamlet that he was killed by Claudius, the question to be resolved does not concern the assassin but rather, essentially, already, and immediately, the mother. The order given by the ghost* is not in itself an order. What it enunciates immediately brings to the fore the mother's desire [or: desire for the mother, le désir de la mère] as such. This point is absolutely essential and we shall return to it.

Act II is taken up with what we might call the organization of surveillance around Hamlet. We have a sort of prodrome in the guise of the instructions that Polonius, the Lord Chamberlain, gives someone concerning the surveillance of his own son, Laertes, who has left for Paris. It is rather amusing and it shows how the group including Polonius, Laertes, and Ophelia duplicates the one including Claudius, Hamlet, and the queen.

Polonius explains to his henchman how he must proceed in informing him about his son. We have here a purple passage on the eternal truths about police work that I need not go into [II, i, beginning]. Then we have the arrival, which had been announced in the first act, of Guildenstern and Rosencrantz.

They are not simply the puffed-up characters people think they are. They are former friends of Hamlet's. And Hamlet, who mistrusts them, makes fun of them, rails them, undoes them, and plays an extremely subtle game with them under the cover of madness – we shall see what Hamlet's madness or pseudo-madness means, for it has raised questions – clearly appeals to their former friendship at one moment, with a tone that would be worth highlighting if we had the time.

This tone proves that Hamlet appeals to them without having any confidence in them, and that he does not for even a second drop the ruse or game he is playing with them. Nevertheless, there is a moment at which he is able to speak to them in a certain tone of voice. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, in coming to sound him out, are working for the king, and Hamlet senses this. He encourages them to admit to him that they were sent to him, asking them what it is they have come to do. And his friends are sufficiently shaken up for one of them to ask the other, "What say you?" [II, ii, 286]. But nothing comes of this, and things unfold in such a way that the 310 wall between them never comes down. That would have unraveled a situation that, from one end to the other, seems to be inextricably knotted up.

At that moment, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern present the actors they have met on their way to see Hamlet and whom Hamlet knows. Hamlet has always been interested in theater and he welcomes these actors in a remarkable way.

Here, too, we must read the first samples they give him of their talent. Hamlet asks them to recite a passage from the tragedy in which Aeneas recounts the end of Troy and the killing of Priam. We have here a lovely scene in English in which we see Pyrrhus hang a dagger over Priam and remain there:

> So as a painted tyrant Pyrrhus stood,
> And like a neutral to his will and matter
> Did nothing. [II, ii, 468–70]

As doing nothing is one of the fundamental themes of the play, it is worth mentioning that it is first presented in this image and by means of actors. This is what is going to give Hamlet the idea of using the actors in the scene that constitutes the body of the third act – this is absolutely essential – a scene that the English have a fixed term for, "the play scene"* or "play-within-the-play scene."*

Hamlet concludes:

. . . The play's the thing
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king. [II, ii, 590–1]

This rhyme, like the sound of cymbals, puts an end to a long tirade by Hamlet that is entirely written, let me point out, in blank verse.

It is of great introductory value, since this is where the second act ends and the third begins, the one in which the play scene occurs.

The play scene is essential and we are going to examine it now.

What precedes what I called "the sound of cymbals," namely Hamlet's solitary monologue onstage, shows us the violence both of Hamlet's feelings toward Claudius and of the accusations he levels at himself:

. . . Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain? breaks my pate across?
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? gives me the lie i' th' throat
As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?
Ha! [II, ii, 556–61]

This gives us the general style of the play, which knocks our socks off. And right after that, Hamlet talks about his current stepfather:

'Swounds, I should take it, for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered and lack gall
To make oppression bitter, or ere this
I should ha' fatted all the region kites
With this slave's offal. [II, ii, 561–5]

We spoke about "kites"* when we discussed Freud's essay "Leonardo da Vinci and a Memory of His Childhood" [1910]. A kite is a kind of bird. Hamlet is talking about his stepfather as if he were a slave being offered up as a victim to the Muses. And here begins a whole series of insults:

> . . . Bloody, bawdy villain!
> Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless villain! [II, ii, 565–6]

The important point here is that these insults are addressed both to the person designated by the context – namely, Claudius – and to Hamlet himself. This is the culminating moment of the second act.

Now what constitutes the crux of Hamlet's despair is that he saw the actor, who was playing the part of Aeneas, crying as he described the sad fate of Hecuba, before whom her husband Priam was carved up into little pieces:

> When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
> In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs. [II, ii, 501–2]

Indeed, after not having budged for a long time, with his dagger poised above Priam, Pyrrhus takes a malicious pleasure, as the text tells us, in cutting up Priam's body in front of this woman who is described quite well, wrapping some sort of blanket around his raw-boned flanks.

The theme of the passage is that, despite the actor's crying, paleness, and broken voice in speaking about Hecuba, Hecuba is nothing to this actor. Thus there are people who can arrive at this high pitch of emotion for something that in no wise concerns them. This is what triggers Hamlet's despair, he feeling nothing of the sort.

One cannot overly stress the importance of this passage in presenting what will come afterward – namely, the play scene. Hamlet has recourse to it because he is in some sense caught up in its mood and he seems to suddenly perceive what can be achieved with it. What leads him to it? There is certainly a rational motive here, which is to suss out the king's conscience. In order to do so, Hamlet is going to have the play performed in front of the king, with a few changes introduced by himself, so as to observe the king's emotions and get him to betray himself.

And this is in fact what happens. At a certain point, the king can no longer stand it. The way in which he committed the crime is portrayed so precisely onstage, Hamlet providing a running commentary on it, that the king abruptly cries: "Lights, lights, lights!" and bolts out noisily. Hamlet says to Horatio that there is no longer any doubt [as to Claudius' guilt].

313 The play scene is thus essential and I am not the first psychoanalyst to have raised questions as to its function. Otto Rank did so before me in his article "Das 'Schauspiel' in Hamlet," which came out in Psychoanalytische Beiträge zur Mythenforschung in 1919 (Vienna-Leipzig[: Internationaler Psychoanalytischer Verlag], pp. 72–85). The function of the play scene is articulated there in a way that we will return to, but in any case it is clear that this scene raises questions that go beyond its functional role in the unfolding of the play.

We need to know up to what point and how we can interpret the details of the text. Rank confines his attention to listing all the features that show that, in the very structure of the fact of watching a play, there is something that evokes the child's first observations of parental intercourse. This is Rank's view.

I am not saying that it is worthless or even that it is false; I believe it is incomplete. It is worth spelling out [the function of the play scene] in the unfolding of the play as a whole. For in inventing this play scene, what is Hamlet doing? He is trying to create a structure and bring about the disguised dimension of truth that I somewhere called its "fictional structure" – without which he would be unable to reorient himself, beyond the more or less effective nature of the action designed to get Claudius to betray himself.

Rank thus touched on something. There is in Hamlet something that concerns his own orientation with respect to himself. I am merely indicating this to show the interest of the questions that are raised here.

Things are not all that simple here, and the third act does not end without the consequences of this articulation appearing in the following form: Hamlet is urgently summoned to his mother's side, she, naturally, being unable to take it any longer. These are the very words she uses: "O Hamlet, speak no more" [III, iv, 90].

As Hamlet is walking toward his mother's apartments, he sees Claudius moving, if not toward an admission of guilt [résipiscence], at least toward repentance [repentir]. This is the so-called scene of 314 the "prayer of repentance" [III, iii, 76]. This man who has, in some sense, been caught in the very web of what he continues to possess – namely, the fruits of his crime – raises up to God some kind of prayer that he may have the strength to find a way out of it. Hamlet, stumbling upon the king when he is literally on his knees and does not see him, has him at his mercy, revenge being at arm's length. This is where he stops.

If I kill him now, he says to himself, won't he go straight to heaven? Hamlet's father had clearly stressed that he was suffering all the torments of some sort of hell or purgatory. Wouldn't Hamlet be sending Claudius straight to eternal happiness? That is precisely what he must not do, he concludes. It was nevertheless an opportunity to set things right.

I did not bring up the alternative "to be or not to be" the last time for no reason. In my view, it is the very crux of the matter.

Hamlet tells us that his father, owing to the moment at which he died, remains stuck forever "in the blossoms of [his] sin." The line drawn at the bottom of the "audit" [III, iii, 81] or tallying up of his life is such that he remains identical to the sum total of his crimes. It is when faced with this that Hamlet stops, saying, "to be or not to be."

Suicide is not as simple as all that. We are not exactly in the process of imagining, as he did, what happens in the hereafter. What is at stake is simply the following: putting an end to someone's life does not stop a being from remaining identical to all that he did in the course of his life. In this case, there is no "to be or not to be" – whatever the case may be, "to be" is forever.

Hamlet, too, is confronted with this. It is because he is not purely and simply the vehicle of the drama, the one through whom passions transit – as in the case of Eteocles and Polynices who persist in the crime their father [Oedipus] committed by castrating himself – it is because he is concerned with the eternal "to be" of the said Claudius that, at that precise moment, in a way that turns out to be altogether coherent, he does not even draw his sword from its scabbard.

This is essential: what he wants to do is surprise the other in the excess of his pleasures, in other words, in relations with the queen. The key point here is desire for the mother [or: the mother's desire, désir de la mère]. And he is going, in effect, to have an emotional scene with his mother that is one of the most extraordinary things ever seen on the stage.

315 In this scene, in which a mirror is held up to the mother so she can see herself as she truly is, there is a dialogue between a son who indisputably loves his mother as she loves him – this we are told – beyond all expression, in which he incites her to break the bonds of what he calls "that monster, custom":

> That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,
> Of habits devil, is angel yet in this,
> That to the use of actions fair and good
> He likewise gives a frock or livery . . . [III, iv, 162–5]

Here he enjoins her to begin to break her habit and not sleep that night with Claudius. It is all put quite crudely, marvelously so. As you will see, he tells her, it will get easier and easier after that.

There are two lines that must, it seems to me, be pointed out, for they echo each other, and everything is going to revolve around them.

At a certain moment, in the course of the play scene, poor Ophelia, about whom I have not yet said much, tells Hamlet that he is doing a fine job playing the part of the chorus – in other words, that he is giving a good running commentary on the play. He responds:

> I could interpret between you and your love, if I > could see the puppets dallying. [III, ii, 237–8]

We try to imagine what is happening onstage. In any case, what is at stake is something that is happening between "you" and "your love."

In the scene with the mother now, when the ghost appears – for the ghost appears in it, and at a moment at which Hamlet's entreaties are beginning to flag – it is in order to tell Hamlet:

> O, step between her and her fighting soul!
> Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works.
> Speak to her, Hamlet. [III, iv, 114–6]

The ghost, who appears only to Hamlet here, whereas everyone can usually see it when it appears, has come to tell him to "step between her and her fighting soul." "Conceit" is unequivocal. It is used a lot in this play, precisely in relation to the soul. Conceit is concetto, an elaborate literary style, and it is the word that is used to describe the style of the précieux. The ghost thus says that conceit works the most powerfully in tired bodies. "Speak to her, Hamlet."

This place between one thing and another where Hamlet is always asked to enter, operate, and intervene shows us the true situation of 316
the drama. This appeal is significant – significant to us, because it is here that we analysts must intervene, "between her and her . . .," that is our job. "Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works" is an appeal addressed to us analysts.

Here, once again, Hamlet caves in. He leaves his mother, telling her to go ahead and allow herself to be caressed after all; Claudius is going to come and give her a big fat kiss on the cheek and caress her neck. He abandons his mother, he literally allows her to go back, to return, as it were, to giving herself over to her desire. This is how Act III ends, except that in the meantime the unfortunate Polonius has had the misfortune of stirring behind the arras and being run through by Hamlet with his sword.

We arrive now at the fourth act.

It begins rather prettily with a true manhunt, which Hamlet seems to find highly amusing. He hid Polonius's body somewhere and he yells out "Hide fox, and all after" [IV, ii, 29–30]. In the end he tells them not to wear themselves out, for before the end of the month they will begin to smell him – "you shall nose him" – near the stairs [IV, iii, 36], and let no more be said about it.

Shortly before that we have an important comment:

> The body is with the king,
> but the king is not with the body.
> The king is a thing [. . .] of nothing. [IV, ii, 26–9]

This is one of Hamlet's schizophrenic-sounding remarks. It does not fail to give us something that is helpful to us in interpreting the play, as we shall see later on.

Act IV is an act in which many things happen very quickly. Hamlet is, for example, sent off to England and returns before you can say boo. We know why: he uncovered the plot against him – namely, that he was being sent to his death. His return is accompanied by some drama, because Ophelia in the meantime has gone crazy – owing to her father's death, let us say, and probably to something else as well – and Laertes has revolted and has been plotting a minor coup.
317 The king has put a stop to his revolt by telling him that Hamlet is the guilty party, but that no one can be told about it because he is too popular; the thing can be handled quietly by organizing a fixed duel in which he will perish. And this is precisely what happens.

The first scene in Act V is the cemetery scene. I alluded earlier to the first gravedigger. I am sure you all recall the astounding remarks exchanged by the characters who are digging Ophelia's grave and who are tossing around a skull as they speak, one of which is caught by Hamlet who gives a speech about it.

Since I mentioned actors earlier, let me observe that no one has ever seen, as far back as theatre wardrobe assistants can remember, a Hamlet and a first gravedigger who were not ready to kill each other. The first gravedigger has never been able to stand the tone with which Hamlet speaks to him. This detail is worth noting in passing, for it shows us just how powerful the relationships highlighted in this drama can be.

Let us turn to the following, which I will bring more fully to your attention next time.

After having been prepared by the long and powerful cemetery scene, the dénouement arrives. We are aware of Hamlet's ever-flagging desire, that exhausted, unfinished, and unfinishable thing that characterizes his position. Why are we suddenly going to see what was impossible become possible? Why are we suddenly going to see Hamlet accept Laertes's challenge under the most unlikely conditions? These conditions are all the more curious as Hamlet is serving as Claudius' champion here.

We see Hamlet best Laertes in all the bouts. He lands him two or three hits, whereas Hamlet himself had been granted a handicap when the bet was placed. And when he is pricked with the poisoned tip, according to plan, a sort of confusion nevertheless ensues in which he winds up wielding the poisoned rapier and wounding Laertes with it. And it is once they are both mortally wounded that the last blow is struck, which is leveled at he who should have been dispatched from the outset – namely, Claudius.

I did not mention Millais's painting of Ophelia floating down the river at random last time. In concluding today, I want to propose another painting. I would like someone to paint a canvas in which 318 we would see the cemetery on the horizon and over here the open grave, with people coming out of it – like those who, at the end of the Oedipus tragedy, disperse and cover their eyes so as not to see what is happening – namely, something like the liquefaction of M. Valdemar.

Something different is at work here. Something has happened to which not enough importance has been attributed. Hamlet, who has just returned unexpectedly, thanks to the pirates who allowed him to foil the plot to assassinate him, happens upon Ophelia's burial. He has not yet heard about her death; he did not know what had happened during his brief absence. We see Laertes clawing at his own chest, and jumping into the grave in order to embrace his sister's cadaver one last time, loudly proclaiming his despair.

Not only can Hamlet not stand this display of grief over the loss of a girl whom he had clearly mistreated up until then, but he throws himself into the grave with Laertes after having truly bellowed, having given a war cry in which he says the most unexpected thing: who is grieving the death of this young girl? And he concludes, "This is I, Hamlet the Dane" [V, i, 244–5].

No one has ever heard him claim that he was Danish. He abhors the Danish! Suddenly, a revolution takes place in him owing to something that is highly significant, I can say, with respect to our schema. It is insofar as $ is there in a certain relationship with little a that he suddenly identifies with something that for the very first time makes him find his desire in its totality.

We see Hamlet and Laertes disappear into the hole. They grapple with each other for a while down there. People finally separate them and pull them out. This is what would be depicted in the painting: a hole from which we would see things escaping.

We will see what this might mean next time.

THE MOTHER'S DESIRE

From mystery to illusion
Hamlet, a mode of discourse
The prohibition from which the unconscious arises
Hamlet's impure desire
The circuit of desire

Psychoanalytic principles are such that, in order to arrive at a goal, we must not be in a hurry.

Some of you may believe – I think there are not many of you who do – that we have ventured far from clinical work here. This is not at all true, for we are right smack in the middle of it. Given that what we are trying to do is situate the meaning of desire, human desire, the way in which we proceed in order to map it with regard to what has, moreover, been one of the main topics of psychoanalytic thought since the beginning cannot in any way force us to take a detour from what is most urgently required of us.

A great deal has been said about Hamlet, and I have tried to show you just how massive the literature on the play is.

Since I spoke to you last time, a document arrived on my doorstep which, in my desire for perfectionism, I had been dying to see – namely, Ernest Jones's Hamlet and Oedipus [New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1949]. In reading it, I perceived that Jones updated his discussion of Hamlet so that it takes into account developments in psychoanalysis since 1909. He no longer refers there to Loening as a worthy commentator, but rather to Dover Wilson who wrote a lot about Hamlet and did so very cogently. As I myself had read some of Wilson's work, I believe I have already managed to convey the substance of it to you.

We must now take a step back from all of that.

Jones's speculations are, however, quite penetrating and one might say that, on the whole, they stand apart from everything else that has been written on the subject of Hamlet by the analytic community.

320 Jones points out highly pertinent things, such as the fact that Hamlet is not a real person, which is just plain common sense. What can it then mean to raise the most profound questions about his character? This point is perhaps worth dwelling on a bit more seriously than people ordinarily do.

I am going to begin today by doing so.

As always, when we are in a field that concerns psychoanalytic exploration as such, on the one hand, and a specific object, on the other, the pathway that must be followed is twofold.

The path our train of thought follows is based on a certain preexisting idea we have about the object. It is quite obvious that there are things here whose groundwork should, I would say, be laid immediately.

For example, at the most basic level, in works of art, and especially in dramatic works, there are characters, in the sense in which we understand the term in French. A character is someone about whom we assume the author knows everything. The author has created a character, and he is supposed to move us by setting his character traits in motion. In and of itself, this is assumed to introduce us to a supposed reality that is beyond what is given to us in the work of art.

I would say that Hamlet has the very important property of making us realize to what degree we must at least suspend judgment regarding this viewpoint – which is widely shared and which we spontaneously adopt whenever we examine a work of art – if not refute it altogether.

In fact, there are two handholds that we can solidly latch onto in every art, they being absolutely solid reference points. We shall see what they are.

Hamlet is a mirror, we are told, in which we all, whether readers or spectators – but let us leave to one side the spectators, who are unfathomable – see ourselves as we want to. Even if this notion is not in the least bit satisfying, the fact remains that if we put together everything that has been proposed and asserted about this play, we cannot fail to realize that, as I think I made sufficiently clear last 321 time, the interpretations by critics contradict each other, they being strictly speaking irreconcilable, which clearly suggests that there is some mystery here. I also mentioned that, for actors, the role of Hamlet is the role par excellence, and that people also talk about this person's Hamlet and that person's Hamlet – there are as many Hamlets as there are actors of a certain caliber.

But this goes beyond simply noting a range of Hamlets.

I assume that certain people were a bit put out by all the hubbub there was around Shakespeare's tri-centennial in 1864, there having been a resurgence of Shakespearean themes and a passionate revival of his work on the part of the entire British literary establishment. And in 1917, John Robertson, in his Mystery of Hamlet, actually voiced the opinion that Hamlet was, strictly speaking, vacuous; that it did not hold water; that there is no key to Hamlet as a character; and that Shakespeare had done what he could to patch up Hamlet, which was attributed to an author named Kyd, and had already been performed a dozen years before the autumn of 1601 when we are more or less certain that Shakespeare's Hamlet showed for the first time. Philological exploration has, moreover, gone quite far in that direction since 1917.

The Austrian playwright Grillparzer – to whom Freud refers in passing, which is significant, and about whom Jones speaks at the end of the second chapter of his book – goes so far as to articulate in no uncertain terms that the reason for Hamlet's success is its "impenetrability." It is, admittedly, a rather curious opinion; in any case, one cannot deny that it is a strictly anti-Aristotelian opinion, insofar as Aristotle considers the hero's similarity, omoios, to us as what accounts for the effect of both comedy and tragedy.

Nevertheless, the fact that such varied things can be said about Hamlet is worth pondering.

Let me add that we find here a whole gamut of differing opinions, that present a whole series of nuances. It is not the same thing to say that it is the impenetrability of Hamlet that makes for its success as it is to say that Hamlet is a failure as a play, as is maintained by no less than T. S. Eliot, who, in a certain milieu, is considered to be more or less the greatest modern English poet. According to Eliot, 322
Shakespeare was not equal to the task of dealing with his hero. If Hamlet is someone who is unequal to the task he is supposed to perform, Shakespeare was just as unequal to the task of articulating Hamlet's role.

These are opinions that one might well consider to be problematic. I am enumerating them for you in order to lead you toward what is at stake. I believe that the most nuanced opinion is the most accurate: there is in the relationship between Hamlet and we who apprehend it, whether as readers or spectators, a phenomenon characterized by illusion.

To say this is quite different from saying that Hamlet is simply vacuous [le vide]. An illusion is not a vacuum [le vide]. In order to produce a ghostlike effect onstage – an effect like the one provided, if you will, by my little concave mirror with the real image that emerges and that can be seen only from a certain angle and from a certain point in space – a good deal of machinery is required. If Hamlet is an illusion, or the organization of an illusion, we are not dealing with the same species of illusion as we would be if everyone were speculating about something vacuous. It is important to make this distinction; everything seems to confirm that something like this is involved.

This is the first handhold we can solidly latch onto.

For example, W. F. Trench [Shakespeare's Hamlet, London: 1913], who is cited by Jones, writes the following: "We find it hard, with Shakespeare's help, to understand Hamlet: even Shakespeare, perhaps, found it hard to understand him: Hamlet himself" – you can see that the passage is an amusing one, and the author's pen and thinking is sliding toward the following – "finds it impossible to understand himself." That is possible. "Better able than other men to read the hearts and motives of others" – this concerns neither ourselves nor Shakespeare, but rather Hamlet, who, as you know, plays all the time at taking apart whatever is said by his interlocutors, by those who come to interrogate or try to trap him – "he is yet quite unable to read his own" [Jones, Hamlet and Oedipus, p. 57].

Right after quoting this, Jones tells us what he thinks of these lines. Although he had begun by indicating his reservations about considering fictional characters to be real – having said that we must not allow ourselves to be led to speak of Hamlet like a real person, 323 and that we have to seek elsewhere when it comes to interpreting the play (which is the traditional position in psychoanalysis, and harbors within it, I believe, an error or fallacy to which I would first like to draw your attention) – Jones himself ends up saying the following: "I know of no more authentic statement than this in the whole literature on the Hamlet problem" [p. 57].

In a different text, Jones tells us that, in short, "we reach the apparent paradox that the hero, the poet, and the audience are all profoundly moved by feelings due to a conflict of the source of which they are unaware." This remark makes us realize the strict equivalence of the first two terms: the hero and the poet are strictly equivalent to their discourse; they exist only through their discourse. If one wishes to talk about the communication of what is in their unconscious, one cannot in any case say that such communication is embodied in anything other than the articulation of the dramatic discourse itself.

Let us leave the hero to one side. If you follow me in the pathways along which I am trying to lead you, you will see that he is in fact strictly identical to words – above all, when we begin to sense that, in Hamlet, what gives our hero his highest dramatic value is that he is a mode of discourse. This is the second handhold that I will ask you to latch onto. This phenomenon is of the same ilk as the aspect that eludes the grasp of everything we can say regarding his consistency. In other words, Hamlet proves to be an exemplary work here.

The way in which a work touches us, and most profoundly so – that is, at the unconscious level – has to do with its composition and organization. Although there is no doubt but that we get caught up in it at the level of the unconscious, it is not because of the presence of something in front of us that can really have an unconscious. I mean that, as opposed to what people think, we are not dealing with the poet's unconscious. His unconscious undoubtedly manifests itself in several traces in the work that are not deliberate, such as slips and symbolic elements that went unnoticed by the poet, but this is not what we consider to be of major interest.

One can find a number of such traces in Hamlet. This is what Ella Sharpe tried to do, as I told you last time. She tried to root 324 out, here and there, traces of some sort of fixation on feminine or oral metaphors in Hamlet's character. I assure you that, as regards the problem Hamlet poses, this truly seems to be secondary and almost childish, without, of course, being absolutely of no interest whatsoever.

When you go looking in this way, from this perspective, for anything in a work that can tell you something about the author, you are engaging in a biographical investigation about him rather than analyzing the import of the work as such. If Hamlet is of major importance to us, it is because its structural value is equivalent to that of Oedipus. What interests us and can allow us to structure certain problems is obviously based on the play's deepest plot, the whole of the tragedy, and its articulation as such. This is obviously something other than a fleeting revelation by the author about himself.

This is what I am in the process of emphasizing. The work is of importance to us owing to its organization – that is, owing to the superimposed planes [plans] this organization brings with it within which the true dimension of human subjectivity can find its place. If you will allow me to provide a metaphor here, I would say that in order to give its full depth to a play, as one would to a theatre hall or to a set onstage, we need to have multiple superimposed sets [plans], side struts [portants], and a whole machinery [of pulleys and ropes, for example]. It is within the depth that is thus created that the problem of the articulation of desire can be posed in the fullest way possible.

To spell this out even further: if Hamlet has special import to us, if it is truly the greatest drama or one of the greatest dramas of modern tragedy – Faust being one of the other greatest dramas – it is not simply because we are dealing with Shakespeare, however marvelous we may assume him to be, and the fact that his life took such and such a turn at a certain moment in time. This is not to deny that Hamlet was written at a certain moment in Shakespeare's life, a moment at which something important quite clearly happened.

The only thing we can say for sure is that it involved his father's death. To confine our attention to that would be to content ourselves with very little; people naturally assume that other things related to this event occurred in his life. In any case, Hamlet marks 325 an obvious turning point in Shakespeare's production and in the orientation of his work.

Prior to Hamlet, he wrote a series of comedies and historical tragedies. These are the two genres that Shakespeare brought to their highest degree of beauty, perfection, and ease. Up until then, one can almost say that he had two great specialties which he practiced masterfully and brilliantly, placing him at the level of the most successful authors of his time.

After Hamlet, the picture changes. He writes things that go beyond all limits, that no longer have anything to do with any known literary canon, that are no longer of the same type – consider, for example King Lear and many other plays as well, ending with The Tempest. These confront us with something else altogether, a human drama that develops and is of an entirely different register. This is the Shakespeare who is the crowning jewel of human history and of the human drama, the Shakespeare who opens up a new dimension in our understanding of mankind.

Thus something truly happened at that moment in his life. But does the fact that we are certain about this allow us to conclude that it was his father's death? Yes, of course, in a sense. But let us observe, nevertheless, that if Hamlet is the play that presents itself most as an enigma, it is only too obvious that a play that constitutes a problem is not automatically a good play. An awful play can also pose a problem. And the author's unconscious is probably just as or even more present in many a bad play than in many a good one.

If we are moved by a play, it is not because it represents a great deal of effort on the author's part or because of what its author reveals unbeknownst to himself. I repeat that it is because of the space it offers us, owing to the multiple dimensions of its development, in which to lodge what is hidden in us – namely, our relationship to our own desire. If this possibility is eminently offered to us by Hamlet, it is not because Shakespeare was caught up at that moment in a personal drama. It is because this play furnishes the layering of myriad dimensions and organized levels – and in some ways, the maximum possible number of dimensions and levels – necessary to provide the space for what lies within us to resonate there.

If we take things as far as possible, we believe that we can grasp Shakespeare's personal drama, and yet it eludes us. People have gone so far as to say that it was the drama that furnished the material for the Sonnets. You are aware that Shakespeare was doubly deceived, both by his male friend/protector and by his mistress. Yet that particular drama most probably occurred at a different period in Shakespeare's life, a more subdued one. Moreover, we have no certainty about these details; we have but the testimony of the Sonnets themselves, a testimony that has itself been elaborately worked over. 326

I believe that Hamlet's seductive power stems from a different source. We can at times try to imagine what might lie behind Hamlet. But what is at stake is not what lies behind it but rather the composition of the work itself. What we must dwell on is the high degree of perfection to which the author managed to take it. It is this singular, exceptional articulation that distinguishes Shakespeare's Hamlet from all the earlier versions of Hamlet that philology has allowed us to discover.

If Shakespeare was able to create such a work, it is probably because of a deepening, which is as much that of his skill as a writer as that of his experience of life as a man, a man who certainly did live and had a happy life. Everything suggests, in effect, that his life involved all kinds of temptations [solicitations] and passions. But the fact that Shakespeare's own personal drama may lie behind Hamlet is secondary with regard to what constitutes its structure. It is this structure that accounts for the effect Hamlet has on us.

This is all the clearer as Hamlet himself, as writers have put it metaphorically, is a character whose depths we cannot fathom, not simply because of our ignorance. Indeed, he is a character who is made up of something: the empty place in which we can situate our ignorance. This is what is important, because a situated ignorance is not purely negative – it renders the unconscious present, no more, no less. This is what gives Hamlet its power and its import.

I believe I have succeeded in conveying to you the specifically psychological dimension that is involved in a play like this one, without denying it, without leaving anything aside, and with a plethora of nuances. Certain people say that what I am engaged in is an exercise in what is known as "applied psychoanalysis," whereas it is exactly 327 the opposite. What I am working on here is psychoanalytic theory. Compared to the theoretical question whether psychoanalysis can adequately discuss works of art, any sort of clinical question is one that falls under the heading of applied psychoanalysis.

Some of you who are here listening to me will no doubt want me to say a bit more about this. Ask me questions, should you have any. [Silence.]

If Hamlet is truly what I say it is – namely, a composition or structure in which desire can find its place, and be situated in a sufficiently correct and rigorous way for all desires, or, more precisely, all problems raised by the relationship between the subject and desire, to be projected onto it – it should suffice in some sense to read it. I was thus alluding to people who might raise questions about the role of those who act in the play. Where do we situate the role of theatre and performance [représentation]?

It is clear that it is not at all the same thing to read Hamlet as to see it performed. I do not think this can pose a problem for you for long. In the perspective that I am trying to develop here concerning, in short, the function of the unconscious, the unconscious is defined as the Other's discourse [le discours de l'Autre]. Nothing can better illustrate this than the perspective given to us by an experience like that of the audience's relationship to Hamlet. It is clear that the unconscious is rendered present here in the form of the Other's discourse, which is a thoroughly written discourse. The hero is present here only through this discourse, as is the poet. Having been dead for a long time, what a poet bequeaths us is, in the final analysis, his discourse.

The dimension that is added by performance – namely, by the actors who perform the play – is strictly analogous to that by which we ourselves are invested in our own unconscious. We are the ones who furnish the material that constitutes our relationship to the unconscious, namely, the signifier – this is what I teach and what I spend my time telling you – with our imaginary, that is, with our relationship to our own body, for that is the imaginary.

People say that I neglect the existence of the body and that I have 328 an incorporeal theory of psychoanalysis. At least that is what you might conclude when you hear about what I say from those who live a bit far from here, for people talk.

Yet what I say is that it is with our own bodily members that we create the alphabet of the discourse that is unconscious – and, of course, we each do so in different ways, for, although we are all caught up in the unconscious, we do not all use the same elements. Analogously, an actor lends his members and presence, not simply like a puppet, but with an unconscious that is truly real – namely, the relationship of his members to his own history.

Plate 1 Ophelia, Sir John Everett Millais

Plate 2 Melancholia, Albrecht Dürer

If there are good and bad actors, it is to the degree, I believe, to which an actor's unconscious is more or less compatible with this lending of himself as a puppet. Either he lends himself to it or he does not; this is what accounts for the fact that an actor has more or less talent and genius, and even – why not? – that he is more or less suited for certain roles. Even those who have a very wide range can, after all, play certain roles better than others.

Put differently, actors are obviously necessary. It is to the degree to which there is some agreement between what they must perform for us and something that may, indeed, have the closest relationship with their unconscious that they include something in their interpretation of their roles that indisputably adds something – something that is far from constituting the crux of what is communicated, for the crux is the performance of the drama as it was written.

This perspective could open a door for us and take us quite far, I believe, into the psychology of the actor. There are, of course, laws of general compatibility. The relationship between the actor and performance possibilities raises a problem of psychology that is specific to actors. Whether certain psychological makeups are especially well suited for acting is a question that has been broached, notably by someone I saw again recently, and whose article that came out a few years ago on what he called "Hysteria and Theatre" was promising. I will perhaps have the opportunity to speak about it with interest, even if I do not, of course, completely agree with it.

Having addressed this point, let us now return to our main topic.

What I am trying to get you to understand about the effect of Hamlet is essentially the way in which desire can and must find its place in the play as it was written. What, therefore, is this structure in which desire finds its place?

At first glance, it may seem that what I am saying is no different from what is commonly said about Hamlet in the psychoanalytic community. Did I make all of these introductory remarks simply in order to end up agreeing with such classic and even banal viewpoints? You will see that it is nothing of the sort.

Let us nevertheless begin with what we are usually told. And don't think that it is all so simple and unequivocal. A certain rectitude is what it is hardest for writers themselves to maintain as they formulate their notions about Hamlet, for what constantly occurs is a kind of evasion or oscillation, several examples of which you will see in what I will discuss.

As a first approximation, about which everyone is in agreement, Hamlet is someone who knows not what he wants. When he sees the troops of the young Fortinbras march off and disappear at the far end of the stage, he becomes embittered, suddenly struck by the fact that these people are going to engage in a great action for a trifle, for a little patch of Poland. They are going to sacrifice everything, their lives even, whereas he is there doing nothing even though he has everything he needs to take action: "cause, and will, and strength, and means," as he puts it himself. Hamlet is stuck at the stage of saying, but "'This thing's to do'" [IV, iv, 44–5].

Why doesn't Hamlet take action? This is the question everyone raises. Why is his will* or desire in abeyance? This intersects, as it were, what Sir James Paget, who is cited by Jones, wrote about hysterical paralysis: "Hamlet's advocates say he cannot do his duty, his detractors say he will not, whereas the truth is that he cannot will."

What does the psychoanalytic tradition tell us about this? It says that everything in this case depends on his desire for his mother. Being repressed, this desire makes it such that the hero cannot 330 move forward to take the action he is ordered to take, namely to take revenge on a man who is the current – and oh so illegitimate, because criminal – possessor of the maternal object. And if Hamlet cannot strike he who is designated as the target of his revenge, it is because he himself had in short already committed [in fantasy] the crime for which he was supposed to wreak vengeance.

Inasmuch as the backdrop here – so we are told – is the memory of his childhood desire for his mother and of his Oedipal desire to kill his father, Hamlet thus turns out to be in some sense an accomplice of the current possessor, who is a beatus possidens in his eyes. Since he is this man's accomplice, he cannot attack him without attacking himself. But this could also mean – and this mechanism is, nevertheless, the one that is more palpable [sensible] in the play – that he cannot attack this possessor without awakening in himself the ancient desire for which he feels guilty.

But must we, after all, remain fascinated by a schema that is surrounded by an aura that gives it an untouchable, non-dialectical, unfathomable character? Can't we also say that all of this can be put the other way around? If Hamlet had immediately attacked his stepfather, people would say that he had taken the opportunity to assuage his own guilt by situating the true guilty party outside himself.

To put it as bluntly as possible, Hamlet does not take action, whereas everything conspires to make him do so.

There is, first of all, the superego commandment, which is in some sense materialized here by a father who returns from the afterlife in the form of a ghost to order Hamlet to wreak vengeance. And this father is provided with all the sacred character of one who returns from beyond the grave, still greater authority stemming from his grandeur, his charm [séduction], the fact that he is a victim, and the fact that he was atrociously dispossessed not only of his love object but also of his power, his throne, his very life, his salvation, and his eternal happiness. There is no doubt whatsoever that the father incites Hamlet to take action.

Something else, too, pushes him in the same direction, something one might call, in this case, Hamlet's "natural desire." If, because this desire is repressed, he cannot feel it, and if he is effectively separated from his mother, it is nevertheless indisputable that the fact that his desire is fixated on her affects him; this is what is most certain and apparent in Hamlet's role. I deliberately called this 331 repressed desire "natural" here, for when Jones wrote his article on Hamlet, he was still trying to make the case to his readers that the dimension of repression and censorship exists, and every page he writes on this occasion tends to give this censorship a social origin. Curiously enough, he says, "the trends most likely to be 'repressed' are those belonging to what are called the natural instincts."

This truly raises a question. After all, if the dimension of repression and censorship really arises from society, why wasn't society organized in such a way as to satisfy the most natural desires? This question could perhaps take us a bit further.

It is quite palpable, indeed, that the necessities of the life of a group, or sociological necessities – the things we never seem to notice – do not exhaustively explain the sort of prohibition from which the dimension of the unconscious arises in human beings. They explain it so inadequately that, in order to explain the very principles of repression, Freud had to invent a primal myth – a pre-social myth, let us not forget, since it is the one that founds society – that described in Totem and Taboo. In Jones's commentary, and because of the date at which it was penned, Jones unfortunately still believes that prohibitions, censorship, and even the Oedipus complex are, at the unconscious level, sociological products, which is a mistake on Jones's part. It may be a deliberate, apologetic mistake, the kind of mistake made by someone who wishes to convince, who wishes to conquer a certain audience of social psychologists. This view is, nevertheless, problematic.

But let us return to our Hamlet.

We see him actuated in the end by two different impulses: an imperative impulse, commanded doubly by his father's authority and by the love Hamlet bears his father, and the impulse to defend his mother and keep her for himself, both of which must drive him in the same direction – to kill Claudius. How could two positive things zero out? It is quite odd.

I realize that this sometimes happens. I encountered a very fine example of this when I broke my leg recently: you shorten one leg, 332 then you shorten the other leg, and in the end there is no more shortening. It is a very fine exercise for us, for we deal with things like this. Yet is that what is involved here?

I do not think so. If we thought it was, we would wind up in an illusory dialectic and content ourselves with a schema that would, after all, only be justified, no doubt, by the fact that there is this character named Hamlet and we feel we have to come up with some explanation for him. The fact remains, all the same, that we have put our finger on something essential here.

There is something that makes Hamlet's action difficult for him, that makes his task repugnant to him, and that thrusts him into a problematic position with respect to his own action; and this something, this x, is his desire. The impure nature of this desire plays an essential role, but it does so unbeknownst to Hamlet. In some sense, it is inasmuch as his action is not disinterested, not motivated in some Kantian way, that Hamlet cannot carry it out.

I believe that this is something we can in fact assert. Let us not, however, forget that it was pretty much known prior to psychoanalytic investigation. We have traces of this – and this is partly why Jones's bibliography is of interest, for it shows us this – in the works of certain authors who glimpsed this in writings around 1880 or 1890, long before Freud began to articulate the Ödipuskomplex. Nevertheless, I believe that we can analytically formulate something more accurate than these authors did, and go further than what the theories psychoanalysts have provided on this topic boil down to. In order to do so, we need but carefully read the text of the play.

When we do so, we cannot fail to realize that what Hamlet is constantly dealing or grappling with is a desire which is far from being his own. As it is situated in the play, it is the desire, not for his mother, but of his mother – that is, it is his mother's desire. That alone is what is at work.

The pivotal point is his encounter with his mother after the "play scene."* I would have to read the whole scene with you.

Hamlet has had a play performed that has had an effect on the king's conscience. As everyone grows more and more anxious about Hamlet's intentions, it is decided that he will be asked to have a 333 talk with his mother. This is exactly what he wants. He is going to take the opportunity, he says, to twist the knife in the wound – he explicitly mentions daggers [III, ii, 381] – in his mother's heart. Then we have a long scene, which is a theatrical climax, the closet scene about which I said last time that it is virtually unbearable to read, in which he pathetically implores his mother to sit up and take notice of what she is doing.

I am sorry I cannot read the whole scene with you here, but please do so yourselves, pen in hand, as one does in school. Hamlet says to her, 'What the heck kind of life are you leading? You're no spring chicken anymore, you should calm down a bit!' These are the sorts of things he says to her in his admirable language. They are things we cannot believe anyone would ever say, and that could not be said in any more penetrating a manner; they are things that could not correspond any better to what, in effect, Hamlet has rushed to say to his mother – things that are designed to break her heart and that she experiences as such, as she herself says to him: "O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain" [III, iv, 157]. And she literally groans under the pressure.

The mother is at least forty-five years old at this point. We are more or less certain that Hamlet is thirty. This is debatable, but in the graveyard scene there is an indication from which it can be deduced, for Hamlet remembers poor Yorick who died about thirty years ago and who kissed him on the lips. It is important to keep in mind that Hamlet is not some naive young man.

Back, now, to the closet scene. Hamlet compares his father to Hyperion –

> A combination and a form indeed,
> Where every god did seem to set his seal – and next to him we have this piece of rubbish, "A king of shreds and patches" [III, iv, 103], a conman or pimp with whom you are up to your ears in mud. This is what his speech is about, and it is worth articulating. You will see further on what is at stake. But, whatever the case may be, it is about his mother's desire, and about a plea on Hamlet's part, which is a demand of the following sort: get hold of yourself, get control of yourself, follow – as I told you last time – the pathway of good manners, begin by no longer sleeping with my uncle. He says it that directly. And everyone knows, he says, that appetite comes with eating, and that this devil, habit, which ties us to the worst possible things, can also work in the opposite way: once you start behaving better, it will get easier and easier.

What do we see here if not the articulation of a demand which is 334 manifestly made by Hamlet in the name of something that is at the level, not simply of the law, but of dignity, and which is expressed with force, vigor, and even cruelty – the least one can say about it is that it leads to discomfort.

The point they arrive at is one where the mother is literally panting, so much so that people have wondered if the ghost that reappears in the closet is not there in order to say to Hamlet 'Tallyho, tallyho! Go on!' But in a certain respect the ghost also calls Hamlet to order; he protects the mother against some sort of overflowing aggression on the son's part, before which she herself momentarily trembles: "What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?" [III, iv, 22]. How far will you go? His father reminds him to "step between her and her fighting soul!" [III, iv, 114].

At the climax of the scene Hamlet suddenly backs down and says to her, now that I have said all that, do as you like and go recount all of that to Uncle Claudius. You're going to allow him to give you a little kiss on the cheek, a little tickle on the neck, a little scratch on the stomach, and all will end as usual in a complete shambles. This is exactly what Hamlet says.

We are following the oscillating motion we see in Hamlet here. He storms, he insults, he implores, and then his discourse collapses – he gives up. We see in his very words a disappearance or vanishing of his appeal when he consents to his mother's desire, laying down his arms before something that seems ineluctable.

His mother's desire here takes on anew for him the value of something that can in no way be dominated, moved, or eliminated.

I have proceeded even more slowly than I had imagined I would. I will thus be forced to stop at a point which, as you see, will require us to spend perhaps two more of our meetings deciphering Hamlet.

335 Today, in concluding, I will try to show you the relationship between what I am in the process of articulating and the graph of desire.

Where do I want to lead you with Hamlet? I will tell you very precisely, by reminding you first what the graph tells us about the location of desire.

This is the upper level of the graph. On the lower line, $s(A) \rightarrow A$, you have the elementary discourse of demand, the one that subjects the subject's need to the consent, caprice, and arbitrary will of the Other as such. The Other's discourse thus has the power to structure human tension and intention in the fragmentation brought on by the signifier. This is the first stage, the first relationship to the Other.

What is at stake for the subject within the Other's discourse that shapes him – that is, within this already structured world? He must orient himself therein, locate himself therein. The Other's demand having necessarily fragmented and fractured him, if he is to be able to locate himself, he must go through a fundamental stage in which what becomes his discourse is taken beyond the Other. It is there that the subject questions himself about what is known as his "will,"* his own will – namely, about what is the most problematic for him, as we analysts know – that is, what he truly desires. The subject must go beyond the necessities of demand inasmuch as he seeks to find anew [retrouver] his desire in its ingenuous nature.

How can desire be refound? This is a problem we always have to 336 deal with. In other words, what happens beyond the Other, at the upper level of the graph?

We find there the interrogative hook that I have drawn here, whose uninterrupted line represents the subject's questioning about what he wants, but that is not all we find there. Psychoanalysis tells us that we also find what allows the subject to orient himself there [s'y retrouver] – namely, a signifying chain that I draw with a dotted line. It is homologous to the signifying chain at the lower level, but here it is strictly speaking called the unconscious, and it provides the signifying basis by which the subject can get his bearings there.

On the right, you see ($◊D), which is the subject's relation to his own demand. Indeed, a register is established here, thanks to which the subject can perceive not, as people say, that his demand is oral, anal, or this or that, but that, qua subject, he has a special relationship with capital D – in other words, with a certain form of demand. And this is why I inscribed this abbreviation on the upper level in the place where the code is found [on the lower level, namely: A].

The hooked line that goes beyond the Other, the one that represents the subject's questioning, is drawn here with an uninterrupted line. Why? Because it is conscious. In effect, before there were psychoanalysts, human beings asked themselves the question – and constantly asked themselves the question, believe you me, as they still do in our time, and as they have done since Freud's time – where their true will lies. This line thus belongs to the personality system as such. Call it conscious or preconscious – for the time being I will not go into any further details about it. 337

But what does the graph tell us about desire? Desire is an x, and that x is situated somewhere on the line that returns from the unconscious code [$◊D] – in the opposite direction from the intentional line which is across from it – namely, the return segment: ($◊D)→d. Desire [d] is there, floating somewhere in what lies beyond the Other [A].

Yet we also know that desire is subjected to a certain regulation. The latter is represented for us here by the height at which it is fixated [hauteur de fixation], as it were, at the level of a determinate point of the line which, returning from the unconscious message, S(Ⱥ), goes in the direction of s(A), the Other's message at the imaginary level. This line stops midway at ($◊a), for it is fantasy that regulates the height at which desire is fixated and determines its location.

You will note in passing that the relationship between desire and fantasy is homologous to the relationship between the ego [m for moi] and the image of the other [i(a); see Figure 1.4].

Let us now follow the whole of the circuit indicated by the dotted line, that is, the unconscious circuit. 338

It begins on the right, at the extremity of the unconscious vector, provisionally denoted Δ. It rises to the level of the message, S(Ⱥ), continues over to the code ($◊D), drops back down to the level of desire, d, and from there heads toward fantasy ($◊a). This is the circuit of the formation of desire at the level of the unconscious, and these are the stages it goes through and the directions in which it goes through them. If you are attentive to the way the graph is constructed, you will notice that the line d→($◊a) is a return pathway with respect to the unconscious, but that it itself has no return path toward the unconscious.

Now this circuit is going to help us follow the very movement of Hamlet's desire, assuming we stick to the scene in the closet in which the son confronts his mother.

What can we say about this, if not, in the first place, that there is no moment at which the formulation "man's desire is the Other's desire" is more tangible or manifest, no moment at which it is more 339 completely realized, no way in which it could more thoroughly cancel out the subject?

In other words, the subject does not address the Other with his own will, but rather with a will of which he is at that moment the medium and representative – namely, his father's will, as well as the will of the social order, and of modesty and decency, too. I am not giving all of these terms to make things sound sophisticated, for I have already discussed the demon of shame [Écrits, p. 584 n] and you will see the role it plays in what follows. At the first stage, the subject articulates a discourse to his mother that goes beyond her qua Other, but only to back down and return to the strict level of the Other before whom he can but bow.

The movement of this scene can be depicted more or less as follows.

The subject's plea goes beyond the Other, trying to join up with the level of the code or law ($◊D), and then drops backs down. Except that the subject's drop does not stop at the level of the line d→($◊a), where he would meet up with his own desire, for he no longer has any desire – Ophelia has been rejected, and we shall see next time what role she plays here. Schematically put, let us say that it is as if the subject, in dropping back down along the return pathway, returned purely and simply to the Other's message – as if he could receive no other message from the Other's articulation than the Other's signified, s(A) – namely, his mother's response.

And what is this message? 'I am what I am. In my case there's nothing to be done, I'm a true genital personality' – I'm referring here to the way in which this term is used in volume 1 of La Psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui – 'I know nothing of mourning.' "The funeral baked meats / Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables"

[I, ii, 180–1]. "Thrift, thrift!" is Hamlet's comment on this. She is simply a gaping cunt. When one leaves, another enters. That is what is being said here.

If Hamlet is the drama of desire, what is the drama of desire? We have seen it throughout this scene, it is the drama that there may be a worthy object and an unworthy object. 'Madam, I beg you to show some propriety here. There is a huge difference between that god and this piece of garbage!' That is what is involved here.

It is quite odd that we use a word like "object" all the time, but that the first time we encounter it [in the play] we do not recognize it, even though there is talk of nothing else from one end of Hamlet to the other. No one has ever discussed "object relations" regarding 340
Hamlet. People remain confused about this and yet it is the only thing that is at stake. The discourse I alluded to earlier concerning the true genital personality, whether female or male, is a coherent discourse, for it tells us that one of the characteristics of the true genital personality is that it mourns only lightly. This can be found in the first volume of La Psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui. It is a marvelous commentary on the dialectic of Hamlet.

Now, we cannot but be struck by the fact that it is by means of mourning that we see the object come into view. I will go a bit quickly here because I must give you a glimpse of the horizons I am heading toward; but we can already say that Hamlet will perhaps allow us to add something to what Freud provides in Trauer und Melancholie ["Mourning and Melancholia"]. Freud tells us there that when mourning takes place, it is owing to introjection of the lost object. But in order for it to be introjected, there is perhaps a prior condition – namely, that it be constituted as an object. And its constitution as an object is perhaps not purely and simply related to the co-instinctual stages that are usually mentioned.

Something else already gives us an indication that, with the question of mourning and the object, we have arrived at the heart of the problem. This is where I ended last time, and our next few classes will follow up on this. It is the key point, the decisive point starting from which Hamlet takes the bit between his teeth, as it were.

For, as has been clearly noted, after having long dallied, Hamlet has a sudden burst of energy. He dives headfirst into an improbable situation that presents itself.

He must kill his stepfather. He is asked to win a sort of wager for this stepfather. The wager consists in fencing with someone about whom the least one can say is that, given the moment in time at which this is occurring, he knows this man is not favorably disposed toward him. For it is neither more nor less than the brother of the unhappy Ophelia, who has just put an end to her life, and she has done so owing to problems in which Hamlet played an important part. Hamlet knows, in any case, that this man holds it against him. Hamlet likes this man a lot, as he tells him, and nevertheless it is with him that he is going to cross swords to win a bet for the very person whom he must, in theory, slaughter.

341 He suddenly proves to be a true, absolutely unprecedented killer, and does not allow Laertes to hit him even once [at first]. It is quite clear that we have here a headlong rush forward on Hamlet's part. What is the decisive point that leads Hamlet to take the bit between his teeth?

It is the point on which I ended last time, with my little map of the graveyard and of the two guys grappling with each other at the bottom of the grave, which is an odd scene, all the same, and truly Shakespearean, for there is no trace of it in the earlier versions of Hamlet.

What happens? Why did Hamlet decide to jump in? Because he could not bear to see someone other than himself showing everyone what? Overflowing grief.

I would have to support what I am telling you here with a reading of Hamlet, but it would take me too long to do so. There is not a single word I am using here that is not based on something found in the text. Hamlet says it himself: 'I couldn't bear for Laertes to make such a big deal of or place such emphasis* on his mourning' [see V, i, 264–71]. He explains this afterward in order to excuse himself for having been so violent: the ostentatious display of the other's pain,

> The bravery of his grief did put me
> Into a tow'ring passion [V, ii, 78–9].

Hamlet sees Laertes jump into the grave in order to embrace his sister, and he jumps in after him to do the same. I must say that we might well form curious ideas about what must be happening in the grave, and I suggested this to you last time with my little imaginary painting. Stated otherwise, Hamlet proceeds by the pathway of mourning, but it is a type of mourning that is adopted in the narcissistic relationship that obtains between m, the ego, and the image of the other, i(a).

The backdrop is this scene in which Hamlet suddenly sees the passionate relationship of a subject with an object, this relationship being manifested by someone else [Laertes]. This scene grabs him and offers him a prop by which his own relationship as a subject, $, with Ophelia – little object a, which had been rejected owing to the confusion or compounding of objects – is suddenly re-established.

And it is this suddenly re-established level that is momentarily going to make a man of him. It is, in other words, going to make him into someone capable – for only a brief moment, no doubt, but a moment that suffices for the play to end – of fighting and killing.

I am not, of course, saying that Shakespeare said all of these pretty things to himself. The fact remains that he included, in the 342 play's articulation, an odd character like Laertes in order to have him serve – at the crucial moment of the play, at its climax – the role of an example and prop. Hamlet furiously wrestles him to the ground, and gets him into a hold from which he literally leaves other than before, with the cry I mentioned last time: "This is I, Hamlet the Dane" [V, i, 245].

I will invite you to read the commentaries that have been written about this cry, as they corroborate what I am telling you – namely, that this is the moment at which something happens that allows Hamlet to take hold of his desire anew. This proves to you that we are clearly at the heart of the economy of what is involved.

Of course, this almost has but a limited interest, after all, which is that of showing us on which point all the avenues of the play's articulation converge. Our interest is constantly focused on these avenues, and it is owing to the meanders of the action that we participate in the drama. The interest of getting to the graveyard scene has to do with the fact that prior to it there were four acts in which other things happened, things that we are now going to re-examine by reversing course.

In the foreground, there is the role of the play scene. What is this performance [représentation]? What does it mean? Why did Shakespeare find it to be indispensable? It has more than one motive, more than one raison d'être, but we will try to see its most profound raison d'être.

I believe that I have adequately indicated to you today why we are studying Hamlet, and sketched out what it means to us. The stakes for us are psychoanalytic experience and the articulation of its structure. Once we have completed this study, what will we be able to keep that will be useful and schematic to us in mapping desire?

I will tell you. I will show you what Hamlet's desire is. It is the neurotic's desire at every moment of its impact [incidence].

People have said that Hamlet's desire is an hysteric's desire. This is perhaps quite true. Other people have said that it is an obsessive's desire. That, too, might be argued, for it is a fact that he is full of psychasthenic symptoms, even severe ones. But that is not the point. In truth, Hamlet is both. He is purely and simply the place of desire. Hamlet is not a clinical case. Hamlet, of course – this is all 343 too obvious, and there is no need to recall it to mind – is not a real being. Hamlet is, if you will, a sort of hub where a desire is situated, and we can find all the features of desire in him.

We can interpret and orient his desire in the same way as we work with an hysteric's desire in a dream – namely, his desire is there unbeknownst to the subject, and he is thus forced to construct it. It is in this respect that I will say that Hamlet's problem is closer to the hysteric's desire, for his problem is to find anew the place of his desire. Moreover, what Hamlet does closely resembles what an hysteric is capable of doing – in other words, creating an unsatisfied desire for himself.

But it is equally true that Hamlet's is an obsessive desire, inasmuch as he attempts to prop himself up on the basis of an impossible desire. This is not quite the same thing.

Both are true. You will see that we will go as much in one direction as in the other when we interpret Hamlet's remarks and actions. What you must manage to grasp is something that is more radical than this or that type of person's desire, than the desire with which you pinpoint hysterics versus obsessives.

When our colleague N* mentions the hysteric's character, it is in order to say that everyone knows that an hysteric is incapable of loving. When I read things like that, I always want to ask the author, "And what about you? Are you capable of loving?" He says that hysterics are detached from reality – what about him?

Doctors always talk as if they themselves were perfectly well ensconced in their boots, the boots of love, desire, will, and all that follows therefrom. Yet this is a very odd position, and we should have long since realized that it is a dangerous position. It is the kind of position that makes people adopt countertransferential stances owing to which they understand nothing about the patients with whom they work.

This is the realm in which we operate, which is why it is essential to articulate where desire is situated.

THERE IS NO OTHER OF THE OTHER

A father who knew the truth
The meaning of the symbol S(Ⱥ)
The big secret of psychoanalysis
The object, a cursor of the level of desire
The "fading"* of the subject

'Give me my desire!' This is the meaning I told you Hamlet has for all those – whether critics, actors, or spectators – who take it up.

This is so, as I also said, because of the exceptional and brilliant structural rigor the Hamlet theme reaches in this play, after an obscure development that began in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries with Saxo Grammaticus, continued on in the novelistic version by Belleforest, and then, no doubt, in a sketch by Kyd. There was another sketch by Shakespeare himself, it seems, before it arrived at the form in which we have it today.

This form is characterized, in my view, using the method we employ here, by something that I call structure.

I am trying to give you a key to this structure that allows you to orient yourselves with complete confidence – namely, the topological shape that I call the graph and that we might call a gramma [or: writing, letter, or element with which terms are formed, gramme].

Let us return to our Hamlet.

Given that I have been speaking to you about the play for three classes already, I imagine you have all read it at least once. Let me try to summarize its movement, which is simple and yet profoundly marked by the detours that have allowed for so many different interpretations.

346 If it can be simultaneously so simple and yet endless, it is not very difficult to know why: the tragedy of Hamlet is the encounter with death.

Others, to whom I alluded in our preceding classes, have emphasized the first scene, which so prodigiously foreshadows what is to come. It takes place on the platform of Elsinore Castle. The ghost that the sentinels have already seen twice, returns in its hellish form [forme d'En-bas], and no one yet knows, at this point in time, what this form is, what it is bringing with it, or what it means.

On this point, I mentioned a comment by Coleridge. I am mentioning him again today because I perhaps gave you the impression two classes back that I was criticizing him. In telling you that he did no better than to see himself in Hamlet, the character, I seemed to be minimizing the import of his commentary, whereas he was the first to have sounded the depths of Hamlet – and of many other things as well. He underscores in his notes on the play, which are so fine – and easily accessible, as they are included in his Lectures on Shakespeare – that owing to Shakespeare's art, even Hume, who was otherwise so opposed to ghosts, "could not but have had faith in this Ghost dramatically," says Coleridge, "let his anti-ghostism have been as strong as Sampson against other ghosts less powerfully raised."

Here Sampson lies prostrate [terrassé], and this is indubitably because Shakespeare came very close to something that was not a "ghost"* but rather an actual encounter, not with a dead man [le mort], but with death itself [la mort]. The encounter with death is, in short, at the crux of the play. Hamlet's venturing out to meet with death is the point from which we must set out in order to conceptualize what we are promised from the very first time the ghost appears, at the precise moment at which the clock strikes one o'clock, "The bell then beating one" [I, i, 39].

We find this "one"* again at the end of the play. It is the moment at which, after many detours, Hamlet finds himself on the verge of taking the action that will simultaneously seal his fate. Advancing almost with his eyes closed toward the man he must kill, he ends up telling Horatio – and this is not at just any old moment – that "a man's life's no more than to say 'one'" [V, ii, 74].

Obviously, in order to approach this moment, he takes side streets; he takes the long way around [l'école buissonnière], as they 347 say. This exact expression can be found in the text. I am borrowing it from Horatio, a paragon of modesty and kindness, at the moment at which he comes to assist Hamlet. He says at that point that he has "a truant disposition," which means that he moseys along [I, ii, 168]. No one says that about Hamlet, yet that is what has always struck critics. Why doesn't Hamlet go straight for it? Instead, he tarries. In short, what we are trying to fathom here is why he does so.

Don't think that, on this point, we are taking the long way around or a side street. The route we are following is no doubt different from that followed by the critics who have preceded us, but it differs from theirs only in the following respect, that it situates the question in a slightly different place. What they have said does not lose its import for all that. The proof thereof is that what they sensed was immediately foregrounded by Freud.

What are we told first? We are told that the action in question, the action of putting someone to death – an action that is so pressing and that in the final analysis takes such a short time to execute, we not knowing why it takes the hero so long – encounters an obstacle in Hamlet, that of desire.

This discovery is both a reason and a paradox. For, as I showed you, Hamlet's enigma remains unsolved, and we are forced to contemplate the following: the desire in question, since it is the desire discovered by Freud – that is, desire for the mother, desire insofar as it incites rivalry with he who possesses her – this desire should, good Lord, go in the same direction as the action. What, then, can it mean if desire serves to obstruct action here?

Let us begin to decipher it. This will lead us, in the end, to the mythical function of Hamlet that makes him Oedipus' equal.

Claudius must be killed. He must be murdered by Hamlet – indeed, Hamlet wants to commit the murder – and it will be a just murder. As opposed to what certain authors have suggested, as I told you, Hamlet is not conflicted over rights or orders – that is, the grounds for the serving of justice. There is no ambiguity in his mind between public order, the execution of the law, and private tasks. He has no doubt but that this murder is exactly what the law commands. But what we immediately see when we read the text is the close link between this murder, whose necessity he does call into question, and his own death.

This murder is not committed until Hamlet has already been 348 given a fatal blow, in the short space of time remaining to him between the deathblow and the moment at which he will be no more. We must take this rendezvous with death, to which we can give its full meaning, as our point of departure.

This last of all rendezvous, onto which Hamlet's action is projected and by which he orients himself at the end, has no meaning except in relation to the subject as we attempt to define and articulate him here: a subject that has not yet come to light because his advent was delayed by strictly philosophical articulations; the subject as Freud tells us he is constructed; a subject who is distinguished from the subject Western philosophy has been talking about since there has been a theory of knowledge; a subject who is in no wise the universal prop of objects, but who is in some sense the negative of that subject and his ubiquitous prop; a subject insofar as he speaks, and insofar as he is structured in a complex relationship with the signifier, the very relationship we are trying to formulate here with the help of the graph.

To trace it out once again, the intersection of demand's intention and the signifying chain occurs for the first time at point A, which we have defined as the Other with a capital O, qua locus of truth.

This is the locus in which speech is situated. Taking up its place there, speech establishes the order of truth, an order that is evoked and invoked whenever the subject articulates something, whenever he speaks. Indeed, speech does something that is different from all the immanent forms of captivation of one [person] with respect to another, since it establishes a third element – namely, the locus of the Other in which speech is inscribed as truth even when it lies. Nothing in the imaginary register can be equated with that.

This discourse for the Other, or reference to the Other, extends beyond the Other, inasmuch as it is taken up by the subject on the basis of the Other in order to constitute the question, "What do I want?" Better stated, the question is addressed to the subject here, and in an already inverted form: "What do you want?"

Beyond alienated demand – in the system of discourse that is located at A, residing in the locus of the Other – the subject, propelling himself, wonders what he is as a subject. What must he 349 encounter beyond the locus of truth? Beyond the locus of truth, he must encounter what the very genius, not of language, but of the extreme metaphor that tends to be formulated when we are faced with certain significant spectacles, calls by a name that we will recognize here in passing: the moment [literally: hour, heure] of truth.

In an era in which all of philosophy has taken the path of articulating what links time [temps] with being, let us not forget that past, present, and future, the constitutive times [or: tenses, temps] of temporality, are those of grammar. The notion that time is mapped only with respect to the act of speaking is quite elementary. The present is the moment at which I am speaking, and nothing else. It is strictly impossible for us to conceptualize a temporality in the animal dimension – in other words, in the dimension of appetite. Even the ABCs of temporality require the structure of language.

In going beyond the Other – in this discourse which is no longer a discourse for the Other, but the Other's discourse, strictly speaking, in which the dotted [or: discontinuous or broken, brisée] line of unconscious signifiers is constituted, in this Other in which the subject advances owing to his question – what the subject aims at is, in the final analysis, the moment [heure] of the encounter with himself, with his will, with something that we are going to try to formulate. We cannot immediately enumerate its elements, even if certain signs here nevertheless represent them for us, signs that serve us as a map or prefiguration of the tiering [or: layering or different levels, étagement] of what awaits us in what one might call the stages or necessary steps of the question.

Let us nevertheless note what Hamlet demonstrates to us on this score.

Hamlet, as I told you, is not this or that, is neither an obsessive nor an hysteric. Why? Because he is first and foremost a poetic creation. Hamlet does not have a neurosis; he demonstrates neurosis to us, which is something altogether different than to be neurotic. Nevertheless, when we look at Hamlet in a certain mirrored lighting, specific sentences make him appear to have something bordering on obsessive structure. This has to do with the element that reveals structure in the obsessive, the element that is highlighted maximally by obsessive neurosis – namely, that the major function of desire consists here in keeping at bay and awaiting the hour of the desired encounter.

Here I am using a term that Freud provides us in Inhibitions, 350
Symptoms and Anxiety – namely, Erwartung, which he explicitly distinguishes from abwarten, meaning to brace oneself [tendre le dos]. Erwartung means to await (or expect) it, in the active sense, and also to make it wait. Playing a game with respect to the moment of the encounter essentially dominates the obsessive's relation to his desire. Hamlet certainly shows us a whole dialectic, a whole range of other ways of playing with the object as well, but this is the most obvious one; it is the one that appears on the surface, strikes us, provides the style of the play, and has always constituted its enigma.

Let us now try to discern the coordinates that the play gives us in other elements.

What, in short, distinguishes Hamlet's position from that of Oedipus? What makes it such a striking variation on the latter? Oedipus did not beat around the bush like Hamlet did, as Freud nicely remarks in his explanatory footnote.

When people throw in the towel, they resort to the following sort of rot: "Good Lord, everything is going to pot, we modern folk are in a period of decadence, we go back and forth 600 times before doing what other people – the good, courageous, people of yore – did right off the bat." This is not an explanation, and we should be suspicious of any reference to the idea of decadence. If it is true that our contemporaries have arrived at such a pass, we must, at least if we are psychoanalysts, consider that it is for some other reason than the supposed fact that their nerves are not as solid as their fathers' were.

We can examine what is involved from other angles. I believe we must situate the question elsewhere. I have already drawn your attention to an essential element that is constitutive of the structure of the Oedipus myth: Oedipus did not have to go back and forth dozens of times before taking action; he did so even before thinking about it and without even knowing he was doing it.

Recall now what I began our Seminar with this year. From what angle did I present the gramma to you as the key to the problem posed by desire? It is no accident that I chose a very simple dream from "Formulations on the Two Principles of Mental Functioning," the one in which the dead father appears. Recall that I wrote on the upper line [of the graph], the line of enunciation in the dream, "he 351 did not know." This is where I situate the blissful ignorance of those who are submerged in the necessary drama that follows from the fact that the subject who speaks is subjected to the signifier. Let me note in passing that no one explains why this is so.

For if the father, who had fallen asleep in the garden, was laid low by having this delicate juice, hebenon, poured into his ear (oneille, as Jarry writes it, instead of oreille), he should not have been aware of it. We are never told that he woke up from his sleep to observe what was happening, and the scurf patches that covered his body were never seen by any but those who discovered his corpse. We must then assume that people in the hereafter are very well informed about how they got there. Although this might, in theory, be possible, it is nevertheless not something that we must immediately consider to be true. I am saying all of this to underscore the arbitrary nature of the father's initial revelation, the revelation that gives the entire plot of Hamlet its impetus.

The fact that the father reveals the truth about his death is an essential coordinate in Hamlet, which distinguishes the play from what occurs in the myth of Oedipus. A veil is lifted, the one that weighs on the articulation of the unconscious line. This is the veil that we analysts try to lift in our clinical practice and, as you know, we certainly have our work cut out for us.

Analysts' interventions aim to re-establish the coherence of the signifying chain at the level of the unconscious. If these interventions present so many difficulties and are met with so much opposition on the subject's part – so many refusals, everything we refer to as "resistance," which is the pivotal point of the whole history of psychoanalysis – we can but assume that this veil must serve an essential function in preserving the safety, I would say, of the subject insofar as he speaks.

In Hamlet, the question is resolved – the father knew. And because he knew, Hamlet also knows. In other words, he has the answer. He has the answer, and there can be only one answer.

This answer cannot necessarily be formulated in psychological terms. I mean, it is not an answer that is necessarily comprehensible, and still less one that hits you in the gut. But it is a fatal type of answer, all the same.

Let us try to see what this answer is.

I already symbolized this answer for you because I was forced to, owing to which I asked you to lend me credence. It is, in short, the message [S(Ⱥ)] at the point at which it is constituted on the upper line, that of the unconscious.

But it is easier and more honest to ask someone to lend you credence regarding something which at the outset has no meaning whatsoever, for that does not tie your hands in any way, except that it perhaps requires you to seek out this meaning, which nevertheless leaves you free to create it by yourself.

I began to articulate this answer in the following form. First of all, we have capital S, which stands for "signifier." This already distinguishes the answer at the level of the upper line from the answer at the level of the lower line, which is written with a lowercase s, standing for "signified."

In effect, at the level of simple discourse, the meaning of what we meant is shaped by the speech that unfolds at the level of the Other. The answer is thus always, with respect to this speech, the Other's signified, s(Ⱥ). But there is something beyond simple discourse where the subject asks himself the question, "Who is speaking?" "Who meant this or that at the level of the Other?" "What have I, in the final analysis, become in all of that?" At this level, the answer is, as I told you, the signifier of the Other with a bar through it: S(Ⱥ).

There are a thousand ways to begin to discuss what this symbol includes, but since we are talking about Hamlet, we will choose the clear, obvious, emotional, and dramatic pathway today. It is furnished to us by Hamlet, and the value of the play is that it allows us to accede to the meaning of S(Ⱥ).

The meaning of what Hamlet learns from his father is right in front of our noses and very clear indeed. It is the irremediable, absolute, unfathomable betrayal of love – of the purest love, the love this king had. Like all men, this king may, of course, have been a serious rascal, but with his wife, in any case, he went so far as to shield her face from "the winds of heaven" [I, ii, 141] – at least if we are to take Hamlet's word for it. The meaning of what Hamlet learns from his 353 father is the absolute duplicity of what had seemed to Hamlet to be the very epitome and essence of beauty and truth.

The answer lies there. Hamlet's truth is a hopeless truth. There is no trace in the whole play of an ascension toward something that might lie beyond this, some sort of redemption. We are told that the first encounter [was with what] came from hell. Hamlet is, in effect, situated in the infernal relationship to the Acheron, which Freud chose to move, since he was unable to bend the higher powers to his will.

Nothing is more clear, simple, or obvious, and it is nevertheless quite curious to see that certain writers barely highlight this regarding Hamlet, out of some sort of sense of propriety – one must not alarm sensitive souls, no doubt.

But however painful this answer may be, I am only giving it to you as a single step forward in the realm of what is sensed or felt. For any conclusion or verdict, as radically as it may take on the guise of what is known as pessimism, is nevertheless designed to cast a veil over what is at stake.

We must be able to formulate this answer in a way that homes in more closely on what led me to choose this abbreviation, S(Ⱥ). This abbreviation does not imply that whatever happens at the level of A is of no value whatsoever – otherwise stated, that all truth is fallacious. This is the kind of comment that can make people laugh in those amusing postwar periods, when people come up, for example, with things like the philosophy of the absurd, which is appreciated above all in underground nightclubs [caves]. Let us try to articulate something more serious, or lighter in tone.

I believe that the moment has come to deliver up to you what, in essence, this abbreviation means, even though you are likely to think I am coming at it from a rather peculiar angle. Still, I do not believe it to be a contingent one.

Barred A means the following. At A – which is not a being, but rather the locus of speech, the locus where the whole system of signifiers, that is, a whole language, resides in a developed or enveloped form – something is missing. What is missing can only be a signifier, hence the S. The formulation that gives S(Ⱥ) its most radical value is as follows: the signifier that is missing at the level of the Other.

This is the big secret of psychoanalysis, if I may say so myself. The big secret is that there is no Other of the Other.

354 Indeed, psychoanalytic experience reveals to us that the subject who speaks is necessarily structured in a way that distinguishes him from the perennial subject, even if the latter has been revamped in the course of developments in philosophy in a sense that might well strike us, after all – from a certain perspective, looking at things retrospectively – as delusional. It may be a "fecund delusion," but that does not stop it from being delusional. In traditional philosophy, the subject subjectifies himself indefinitely. If I am because I think, I am because I think that I am, and so on and so forth – there is no reason for that to ever stop. People have long since perceived that it is not so clear that I am because I think, and that we can only be sure of one thing, which is that I am because I think that I am. That is surely true. Yet, what psychoanalysis teaches us is something else altogether. It is that I am precisely not the one who is in the process of thinking that I am, for the simple reason that, owing to the fact that I think that I am, I am thinking in the locus of the Other. The upshot being that I am something other than he who thinks "I am."

Now, the problem is that I have absolutely no guarantee that this Other, owing to what he has in his system, can give me back, if I may express myself thus, what I gave him – namely, his being and his essence as truth. As I told you, there is no Other of the Other. There is no signifier in the Other that can, in this case, answer for [répondre de] what I am. And to state things differently, the hopeless truth I mentioned earlier, the one we encounter at the level of the unconscious, is a faceless, closed truth, a truth that can be bent in any direction one likes. As we know only too well, it is truth without truth.

This is what constitutes the biggest obstacle to those who try to broach our work from the outside – that is, from other fields. As they do not participate with us in work in which interpretations are designed to have an effect, which can only be conceptualized as metaphorical, and inasmuch as our interpretations always play and resonate between the two lines of the graph, they cannot understand what is involved in psychoanalytic interpretation.

If we can speak of a signifier that the Other does not have at its disposal, it is because this signifier is nevertheless somewhere. With this little gramma, I am telling you where it is so that you do not lose your bearings. If I have done so as carefully as I could, it was 355 certainly not in order to make things more confusing for you.

You can recognize the signifier of the barred Other wherever you find the bar on the Other. The hidden signifier, the one that is not at the Other's disposal, is precisely the one that concerns us. It is the very signifier that we bring into play, insofar as we mere simpletons have been caught up in this damned thing known as logos ever since we were born. It is the part of us that is sacrificed therein.

It is not purely and simply sacrificed, physically sacrificed, as they say, or really sacrificed, but symbolically sacrificed. Now this part of you that has taken on a signifying function is not nothing. Which is why there is only one and not dozens of them. We are talking very precisely here about the enigmatic function of what we call the phallus.

The phallus is something that is sacrificed from the organism, from life, from the vital pressure [poussée vitale], and that ends up symbolized. "Vital pressure" is, as you know, an expression that I do not believe we should use in just any old which way, but which – once clearly delineated and symbolized, and put in its place, especially where it serves a function, where it is in fact caught up, namely in the unconscious – takes on meaning. Vital turgidity – this enigmatic, universal thing that is more male than female, but which the female can nevertheless become a symbol of – is what is involved in the phallus. Although it is the very symbol of the life that the subject makes signifying, the phallus is not available in the Other and cannot in any way guarantee the signification of the Other's discourse. In other words, regardless of how much he may have sacrificed his life, it is not given back to him by the Other. The Other replies: S(Ⱥ).

Hamlet's point of departure is the answer given by the Other, and it is because he has received a radical revelation [from the ghost] that he is led to follow the whole trajectory that the play traces out, which leads him to his rendezvous with fate.

In order to reach it with him, we are now going to return to what happens in the play.

Without returning for the time being to the questions I mentioned last time that are raised by the play scene, the scene in which we see the traveling actors, today I would like to bring up an essential element.

It concerns what we are approaching, after having established the function of the two lines of the graph – namely, what lies in the gap between them. The distance the subject can maintain between the two lines is where he breathes freely, as it were, as long as he lives, and this is what we call desire.

Now I have already told you what pressure, abolition, and destruction this desire undergoes because it meets up with [se rencontre avec] a certain something from the real Other – the mother as she is, this mother like so many others – who is less desire than gluttony and even engulfment, albeit structured.

Well, this something was obviously, for Shakespeare – at this point in his life, we do not know why, but after all, what difference does it make? – a revelation. The problem posed by women was certainly always present in Shakespeare's work, and there had been man-eaters [luronnes] before Hamlet, but there were never any as abyssal, ferocious, or sad before Hamlet.

See Troilus and Cressida, for example. The play was performed the year after Hamlet, and perhaps allows us to go more deeply into what Shakespeare thought about women at that time. It is a true marvel, one of the most sublime creations, I believe, one can find in the whole of dramatic literature, and its value has certainly not been fully appreciated.

What is the climax of the play in Hamlet? It is undoubtedly the dialogue between Hamlet and his mother, the main lines of which I discussed last time. He implores his mother in more or less the following terms: 'Don't destroy beauty, the world order, don't confuse Hyperion himself' – it is his father whom he designates thusly – 'with the most abject of beings.' And then we see him back down, give up his plea before what he knows to be the fatal necessity of a sort of desire that brooks nothing and withholds nothing.

There are myriad passages I could cite to illustrate Shakespeare's thinking about women. I will confine myself to one that I came 357 across while on vacation, in an entirely different context. It is from Twelfth Night.

It concerns someone – The Duke, as they call him – who is quite in love, but who is also, it must be said, rather nutty, even if he is a good man. In order to win his heart, a girl who loves him approaches him – even though nothing in his behavior calls his interest in women into question, since he is in love with a woman – disguised as a boy, which is, all the same, an odd way to get oneself appreciated as a girl. I am not giving you these details at random, but because of what they contribute to the creation of a character whom I am going to introduce to you, Ophelia.

This disguised girl, Viola, is a creation that predates Ophelia. Twelfth Night precedes the writing of Hamlet by about two years. We have here an example of the way in which the women Shakespeare created come in succession and are transformed, their truly immortally poetic nature manifesting a whole facet of his genius. They are, as you know, among the most fascinating, attractive, captivating, and simultaneously equivocal women in literature. The boy-girl or girl-boy is quite a typical creation here, and a feature appears in it that is going to introduce us to our topic today, introduce us to the next step we are going to take – namely, the role of the object in desire.

After having taken this opportunity to contextualize for you our question about Ophelia, let me return to Twelfth Night.

Consider what Duke Orsino – without knowing that the person before him is a girl, much less that she loves him – replies to her fallacious questions. He is in deep despair, and the girl says to him, "How can you complain?"

> Say that some lady, as perhaps there is,
> Hath for your love as great a pang of heart
> As you have for Olivia. You cannot love her. [II, iv, 88–90]

This is, indeed, the case; this is what he suffers from.

> You tell her so. Must she not then be answered? [II, iv, 91]

'You must not, thus, hold against others what you yourself would certainly do.' The Duke, who is blind and stuck in the enigma, 358 addresses a whole speech to her about the difference between woman's desire and man's desire:

> There is no woman's sides
> Can bide the beating of so strong a passion
> As love doth give my heart; no woman's heart
> So big to hold so much; they lack retention. [II, iv, 92–5]

And everything he goes on to say shows desire to be, in essence, the distance found in the specific relationship the subject as barred has with the object expressed in the symbol little a – in other words, in the relationship ($$ \lozenge a$), which I place on the graph on the line that returns from the x of unconscious will, and which is, as it were, the cursor of the level at which desire in the subject, strictly speaking, is situated.

I would like now to introduce Ophelia as a character by taking advantage of what philological, textual research has contributed about her antecedents, so to speak. As the play we are studying was written by Shakespeare, we should pay attention to how he transformed the open weave canvas [or: framework, canevas] he received from his predecessors. This canvas had already evolved quite a bit, but we are led to believe that it offered still more, and this was undoubtedly enough for it to be accepted. Whatever the case may be, this evolution shows us quite a vista and the vast amount of ground that Shakespeare covered.

Some cretin whose work I read mentioned how happy he was the day he realized – something he should have long since noticed, but that it took him forever to see – that there is someone who plays the role of Ophelia in Belleforest's tale. In Belleforest's text we are just as perplexed by what happens to Hamlet – namely, that he plainly seems to be crazy. We are not very reassured, for it is clear that this madman nevertheless knows rather well what he wants, and what he wants is what we do not know – it is many things. What he wants is a question for all the other characters.

He is sent a prostitute who, drawing him into the deepest depths of the woods, is supposed to get him to reveal his innermost thoughts while someone else eavesdrops, someone who will then know a bit more about what he wants. The strategy fails, as it should, thanks, I believe, to the girl's love for him. What is clear is that the cretin in question was thrilled to come across this sort of arche-Ophelia, believing that she accounted for the ambiguities in Ophelia's character.

I will obviously not examine with you all of Ophelia's lines here, 359 but you are aware that this incredibly emotional, overwhelming character – whom we might call one of the great figures of humanity – is presented in an extremely ambiguous light. No one has ever yet been able to say if Ophelia is innocence itself that is speaking and that alludes to the most carnal impulses with the simplicity of purity that knows no shame, or whether she is, on the contrary, a slut who is ready for anything. Her lines are tantamount to smoke and mirrors, and they allow for every possible sort of interpretation. Above all, they exude a great deal of charm, something we sense quite palpably in the madness scene, for example.

In truth, it is surprising that our biases concerning the character, nature, signification, and, in a word, mores of women are still so deeply ingrained in us that people can continue to raise such questions about Ophelia. The thing is, in fact, altogether clear. If, on the one hand, Hamlet behaves toward Ophelia with quite exceptional cruelty – cruelty that troubles us, that smarts, as they say, and that gives us the impression that the young woman is a victim – we sense, on the other hand, that she is not, and far from it, the disembodied or disincarnate creature she was made out to be in the pre-Raphaelite painting I mentioned. She is something else altogether.

It seems that Ophelia is quite simply what every girl is, whether or not she has gone beyond the taboo against deflowering – after all, we know nothing about it, and the question seems not to be raised regarding Ophelia. What we want to know is why Shakespeare brought in this character who seems to represent a type of extreme point on a curved line running from his first heroines, who are boy-girls, to something that later returns to the same formula, but transformed, in another guise.

Ophelia seems to be Shakespeare's consummate female character, she being a bud about to blossom – a bud that is threatened by an insect eating away at its heart – offering us a view of life that is ready to blossom and of life that bears all lives within itself. This is, moreover, how Hamlet qualifies her when he pushes her away: you will be "a breeder of sinners" [III, i, 121–2]. In short, Ophelia presents us with the image of someone who is bursting with life and who, more than any other female character, I believe, illustrates for 360 us an equation I have highlighted in my classes, the equation girl = phallus. This is something we can very easily recognize in her.

I will not dwell on things that seem to me to owe, in fact, but to an odd coincidence. I was curious to see where the name Ophelia came from, and I found references to it in an article in Boisacq's etymological dictionary of Greek. Shakespeare undoubtedly did not have at his disposal the dictionaries we use today, but one occasionally comes across, in writings of his time, alongside unbelievable ignorance, such stupefying and penetrating things that coincide with the findings of the most modern criticism, that I can in this case bring out something that is in notes I forgot to bring with me today.

It is in Homer's work, if I recall correctly, that we find ophelio, meaning "to make swell or enlarge." The word is used for molting or the fermentation of living things, more or less in the sense of "allowing something to change" or "to thicken." The funniest thing – I cannot help but mention it – is that in the same article, Boisacq, who was an author who paid close attention to the way in which he strung together his signifying chains, felt it necessary to explicitly refer to the verbal form of the word: ophallos.

We don't need Boisacq's commentary to see the connection between Ophelia and phallos. We see it in the structure. The point is not to indicate now in what respect Ophelia can be the phallus; since she truly is the phallus, as we say, it is worth examining how Shakespeare has her fill this role.

What is important here is the fact that Shakespeare takes to a new level what he finds in Belleforest's work. In the legend, as it is related by Belleforest, the courtesan is the bait designed to rip Hamlet's secret away from him – that is, the dark designs he is mulling over – and the goal is to get him to confess them within earshot of those around him who are not too sure how far he might go. Shakespeare transposes this to the upper level where the true question resides: Ophelia, too, is asked to investigate a secret, but, as I will show you next time, it is the secret of desire.

The relations between Hamlet and Ophelia are punctuated in the course of the play by a series of stages [temps] that we will examine, lively way the relationship between the subject insofar as he speaks – that is to say, insofar as he is subjected to his rendezvous with fate – and the object. But this term must take on another meaning, the meaning it has in psychoanalysis and owing to psychoanalysis. It is no accident that the term "object" has become so prevalent and that it is now so much more widespread and omnipresent than it was in Freud's work, to the point that certain people talk about a shift that has made it change meaning; for libido, which was previously defined as pleasure-seeking, is now defined as object-seeking.
361 for what is articulated there will allow us to grasp in an especially

As I have told you, psychoanalysis has taken the wrong road. It formulates and defines this object in a way that misses its goal, in a way that does not undergird what is truly involved in the relationship with the object as such, such as it is inscribed in the formula ($$ \lozenge a$). The castrated subject, $, is subjected there to something that I will teach you to decipher next time with the name I give it, "the fading* of the subject," as opposed to the notion of the "splitting"* of the object.

What is the object of desire? On a certain occasion, which was no other, I think, than our second class this year, I quoted something the author of which I hope someone here has since identified. She said that what the miser misses when he loses his treasure would, if we knew what it was, teach us a lot about human desire. It was Simone Weil who said that.

This is what we are going to try to home in on as we examine the thread that runs throughout the tragedy between Ophelia and Hamlet.

OPHELIA, THE OBJECT

The paradoxes of fantasy
When fantasy emphasizes object (a)
. . . and when it emphasizes the barred subject
Hamlet is forever on other people's time
The pathology of fantasized vacillation

It was essentially in order to bait you that I announced that I would talk today about Ophelia as bait. But I suspect I will keep my word, for this object, topic, or character fits nicely into the series of remarks I have made at our last four meetings, which is designed to point out the tragedy of desire in Hamlet.

If this play can be characterized as the tragedy of desire, it is to the degree to which desire as such – human desire, the desire we deal with in psychoanalysis, the desire that we are in a position to inflect, depending on our aim with regard to it, but that we sometimes confuse with other things – can only be conceptualized and situated with respect to the fixed coordinates of subjectivity whose function Freud demonstrated.

These coordinates install the subject and the signifier at a certain distance from each other. They situate the subject as dependent on the signifier in a specific way. This means, for example, that we cannot account for psychoanalytic experience by basing it on the idea that the signifier is but a pure and simple reflection, product, or even instrument of what people sometimes call interpersonal relations. The signifier is, on the contrary, one of the essential, initial components of a topology without which all psychoanalytic phenomena would be reduced or flattened out, which would then render us unable to account for what one might call the presuppositions of our experience.

If, in following this path [regarding desire], I have selected Hamlet 364 as an example, it is because it offers us a very lively dramatic sense of the coordinates of this topology. I attribute its exceptional power to captivate us to this. It is also what makes me say that, if critics have such a preference for this play and if it never fails to seduce those who go see it, this is because the poet has in some way incorporated insights from his own experience into it. Everything indicates this, in fact, at the sort of turning point that Hamlet represents in Shakespeare's opus. One can also say that his experience as a poet, in the technical sense of the term, little by little showed him the way forward here.

It is essential to grasp the import, in his creation, of certain twists and turns that I believe we can interpret with the help of the landmarks articulated in our gramma. A certain twist is employed differently in Hamlet than in the plays by Shakespeare that preceded it, than in the earlier tales by Saxo Grammaticus and Belleforest, and than in the plays of which we have but a few fragmentary details. The character involved in this twist is Ophelia, a character who is present in the story right from the beginning.

As I told you, Ophelia is a trap.

Right from the outset of the Hamlet legend, Saxo Grammaticus' Ophelia is a trap into which Hamlet does not fall, first of all because he is forewarned, and secondly because the bait itself – namely, the character – does not lend herself to it, even though she has been in love with Prince Hamlet for a long time, as Belleforest's text tells us.

Shakespeare did something completely different with Ophelia. Perhaps he merely deepened the role that the plot assigns to Ophelia in the legend, destined as she is to find out and appropriate Hamlet's secret. Nevertheless, in Shakespeare's Hamlet, she becomes one of Hamlet's innermost elements, Hamlet having lost the pathway of his desire.

Ophelia is an essential element in the progression that makes Hamlet move toward what, last time, I called the moment [heure] of his fatal rendezvous, his rendezvous with the action he carries out in spite of himself in some sense.

We are going to see still more clearly to what degree Hamlet is the image of the level of the subject at which his fate is articulated in terms of pure signifiers, one might say, the subject being in some 365 sense but the flipside of a message that is not even his own.

The first step we took along this pathway was thus to articulate to what degree the play is the drama of desire insofar as desire is related to the Other's desire.

I showed you to what degree this play is dominated by the Other whose desire we are talking about here. She is unambiguously the mother – that is to say, the primordial subject to whom demands are addressed. This subject [the mother, not the child] is, as I showed you, the true all-powerful subject that we always talk about in psychoanalysis. Women are not in themselves omnipotent – they do not have within themselves the dimension of the so-called omnipotence of thought; what is at issue here is the presumed omnipotence of the subject to whom one's first demands are addressed; as I told you in our first discussions on the topic, omnipotence is always attributed [by the child] to that subject.

What we find at the level of the Other's desire primarily presents itself to Prince Hamlet – that is, to the main character – as a tragedy, as the drama of a subjectivity, Hamlet's, a subjectivity that is always present and, as we may say, far more than in any other drama. The drama always presents itself in a twofold manner, its elements being both inter- and intra-subjective.

Thus, from the subject's perspective, from that of Prince Hamlet, the Other's desire – that is, his mother's desire – essentially presents itself as a desire that cannot tell the difference between an eminent, idealized, and exalted object, Hamlet's father, and a disparaged object worthy only of scorn, Claudius, the criminal and adulterous brother. If the mother cannot distinguish between them, it is because of something in her that is akin to an instinctual voracity. Let us say that the sacrosanct "genital object" that we find in recent psychoanalytic terminology presents itself in her as no other than the object of a jouissance that is truly the direct satisfaction of a need.

This dimension is essential, and it forms one of the poles between which Hamlet's plea to his mother vacillates. I showed this to you in the scene in which, when face to face with her, Hamlet calls on her to become abstinent, in the crudest and cruelest terms, moreover, at 366 the moment at which he communicates to her the essential message that the ghost, his father, charged him with transmitting. Suddenly this plea collapses, and Hamlet sends his mother back to Claudius' bed, back to the caresses of a man who will not fail to make her yield yet again.

In the sort of collapsing or caving in that manifests itself at the end of Hamlet's plea, we find the very model that allows us to conceptualize in what respect there is a waning [retombée] of his own desire, of his impulse toward the action he is dying to take, the whole world becoming a living reproach to him that he is not equal to his own will. If this action founders [retombe] in the same way as his plea to his mother does, it is essentially because of the dependence of the subject's desire on the Other subject. This is the major accent, the very accent of the drama of Hamlet, what one might call its constant dimension.

What we need to do now is see in a more articulated way – entering into psychological detail that would remain, I must say, fundamentally enigmatic if it were not enlisted in the overall aim that constitutes the meaning of Hamlet as a tragedy – how this reverberates in the very heart of Hamlet's will, which, on my graph, is the hook or question mark constituted by the "Che vuoi?" of the subjectivity that is constituted in the Other and articulated in the Other [see Figure 1.3].

This is the thrust of what I have to say today. It concerns what one might call the imaginary setting [or: regulating, réglage] that is brought about by what constitutes desire's prop.

Here, at the beginning of the curve that represents the assumption by the subject of his essential will, we have an indeterminate, variable point [d]. This point is determined [réglé] on the basis of something that lies somewhere across from it, and as we can immediately say, at the level of the unconscious subject [see, for example, Figure 15.4]. I designate the endpoint of what constitutes the subject's question as S barred in the presence of little a ($$ \lozenge a$), and call it fantasy. In the psychical economy, it represents something you are familiar with; this something is ambiguous because, when we broach it from a certain phase, it is in fact a final term in the conscious, the endpoint of all human passion insofar as it is marked by some of the traits that we refer to as "traits of perversion."

The mystery of fantasy, insofar as it is in some sense the final 367 term of a desire, is based on the fact that it always presents itself in a more or less paradoxical guise. This explains why the Ancient Greeks rejected the dimension of fantasy as absurd. The essential step in interpreting it was only made in the modern era, by psychoanalysis. In effect, it could only be conceptualized by being related to an unconscious economy that underpins it qua perverse. If fantasy appears as the endpoint of desire, as its final term and enigma, it can only be understood in terms of an unconscious circuit that is articulated through a signifying chain that is profoundly different from the one that the subject commands, $s(A) \rightarrow A$, which initially lies at the level of demand.

In the lower chain, fantasy both intervenes and does not intervene. Some aspect of fantasy does not normally arrive there by the pathway ($$ \lozenge a) \rightarrow s(A)$; it does not usually reach $s(A)$. If it does reach $s(A)$, we find ourselves in an atypical situation. Fantasy usually remains unconscious; it is separate, it does not arrive at the message, at the Other's signified [$s(A)$], which is the module or sum total of all the significations acquired by the subject in interpersonal exchange and all of discourse. Nevertheless, at certain phases, which are more or less pathological, it goes beyond this.

Later on, I will give names to the moments at which it goes beyond this, the latter occurring only in a single direction, as the schema indicates. I am pointing out this essential articulation because we are, in short, here in order to make headway in using the device I call the gramma; but for the time being we are simply going to see how something in Shakespeare's tragedy functions – namely, what I have called the moment at which Hamlet's desire founders, inasmuch as it makes sense to relate it to this imaginary setting [réglage].

In this mapping, Ophelia is situated at the level of the letter a. This letter is inscribed in our symbolization of fantasy, fantasy being the imaginary prop or substrate of desire insofar as desire is different from demand and also from need. This a corresponds to something toward which all of psychoanalysis is currently heading when it seeks to define the object and object relations.

There is something right-minded in the current direction of analy-368 sis. As object relations theory usually articulates it, the object clearly plays a decisive role: it fundamentally structures the subject's way of apprehending the world. However, in the majority of the recent works that attribute a more or less major role to object relations – whether it be the volume that came out in our neck of the woods, the one to which I have already alluded as the most caricatural example, or others that are more elaborate, those by Federn, for example, and certain others – the explanations we ordinarily find are marked by an error and a confusion based on the theorization of the object as a so-called pre-genital object. Moreover, the genital object itself is situated by their authors within the various forms of the pre-genital object: the oral object, the anal object, and so on.

The confusion in question can be seen on our schema [the graph of desire]. It involves mistaking the dialectic of the object for the dialectic of demand. This confusion is understandable because in both cases the subject finds himself in the same position in his relationship with the signifier: he is eclipsed there.

Consider two points on our gramma. Over here we have the code at the level of the unconscious, ($◊D) – in other words, the series of relationships that the subject has with a certain apparatus of demand. Over there we have the imaginary relationship ($◊a) that preferentially constitutes him in a certain position, which is also defined by his relationship to the signifier, wherein he is faced with an object a. The subject is eclipsed at both of these points.

I began to articulate this eclipsed status last time with the term "fading."* I selected this term for all sorts of philological reasons, and also because it has become quite familiar to us in the context of the communication devices we use. Fading* is precisely what happens in a communication device designed to transmit sound when someone's voice disappears, or breaks up, only to reappear owing to some variation in transmission quality. I will naturally provide real examples to fill out what is merely a metaphor here.

It is thus insofar as the subject is in one and the same moment of oscillation – the one that characterizes fading* when faced with demand and when faced with the object – that the confusion can occur.

What are known as object relations are, in fact, always relations between the subject and, not objects, as people say, but rather signifiers of demand; and these relations arise especially at the specific moment called "the fading* of the subject." Inasmuch as demand remains fixed, one can articulate the various modes of the signifying apparatus that correspond to the different types of demand – oral, anal, and so on – in a way that clinically corresponds, in effect, to the relationship to the object. The fact remains that it is highly problematic to confuse the relationship to the signifier with the relationship to the object. 369

For the object, qua object of desire, has a different meaning. All kinds of things make it necessary not to overlook this, even when we would like to give, as people do, their full, determinant, primitive value to the signifiers of demand, insofar as they are oral or anal signifiers, in order to make them correspond to all the subdivisions and different orientations or polarizations the object itself can take on in relationship to the subject. The correlation between the object and the subject as marked by the bar is, let me point out, the very thing that is overlooked by object relations theory as it is currently formulated.

Even when we consider the subject at the most primitive stages of the oral period – as it has been articulated, for example, by Melanie Klein in a way that is experience-near, rigorous, and precise – we find ourselves faced with certain paradoxes that are visible in Klein's texts. These paradoxes cannot be inscribed in a straightforward theorization of the subject as faced with an object that corresponds to a need, the breast in this case, if only because the subject is faced specifically with the nipple [mamelon].

A paradox arises here because, right from the outset, another enigmatic signifier presents itself at the horizon of this relationship. This fact is clearly brought out by Klein. Her only claim to fame in this context is that she does not hesitate to run headlong toward something, which is to ratify what she encounters in her clinical experience. Lacking an adequate theory, she clearly contents herself with rather poor explanations; yet she plainly attests to the fact that the phallus is already there, as such, [in the relationship between the child and the breast] and as, strictly speaking, destructive with regard to the subject. Right from the outset, she makes the phallus into a primordial object that is both the best and the worst, and 370 around which all the avatars of the paranoid phase and the depressive phase revolve.

I am doing no more here, of course, than mentioning this and recalling it to mind. If S barred is of interest to us today, it is not, in fact, insofar as it is connected up with demand but with the element that we are going to try to home in on as closely as possible this year: little a.

Little a is the essential object around which the dialectic of desire revolves. The subject experiences himself here as faced with an element that is alterity at the imaginary level, as I have already formulated and defined it many times. It is an image, and it is pathos.

The other, which the object of desire is, serves a function that defines desire with twofold coordinates such that it does not aim at an object that satisfies a need, not in the slightest, but rather at an already-relativized object – I mean an object that has some relation to the subject, and specifically the subject who is present in fantasy. This is phenomenologically obvious and I shall return to it later on.

The subject is present in fantasy, and the object – which is the object of desire solely insofar as it is one of the terms in fantasy – takes the place, I would say, of what the subject is deprived of symbolically. This may appear a bit abstract to those here who have not followed the whole of my preceding path with me. For them, let me say that, in the articulation of fantasy, the object takes the place of what the subject is deprived of – namely, the phallus. It is owing to this that the object assumes the function it has in fantasy, and that desire is constituted with fantasy as its prop. It is difficult, I think, to go any further regarding what I mean about desire and its relationship with fantasy.

The object in fantasy is the alterity – image and pathos – by which an other takes the place of what the subject is deprived of symbolically. This formulation indicates the direction that allows us to conceptualize in what respect this imaginary object finds itself in a position in which what one might call the virtues or the dimension of being converge on it; it goes so far as to become the true decoy [or: lure, leurre] of being that the object of human desire is. This is what Simone Weil realized when she pointed to the thickest, most opaque relation that can be presented to us regarding man and the object of his desire – namely, the relationship between the miser and 371 his treasure. The fetishistic character of the object of human desire is most blatant there. All of desire's objects are fetishistic in character.

It is quite comical to hear, as I did recently, some guy try to explain the relationship between the theory of signification and Marxism by saying that we cannot broach the theory of signification without taking interpersonal relations as our point of departure. He went rather far, since, after three minutes, he claimed that the signifier is the instrument thanks to which men transmit their private thoughts to their fellow men. These are the exact words of someone who supposedly based his ideas on Marx's work. If we do not take interpersonal relations as our foundation, we fall, according to him, into the trap of fetishizing what is involved in the realm of language.

I assuredly agree that we encounter something fetishistic, but I wonder if what is known as a fetish is not one of the very dimensions of the human world, and precisely the dimension we must account for. If we locate interpersonal relations at the root of everything, we end up relating the fetishization of human objects to some sort of interpersonal misunderstanding, which in turn means relating it to significations. Similarly, the private thoughts in question – in a developmental perspective, I think – must make us laugh, for if they are already there, why bother to look any further?

In short, it is rather surprising that a thesis that considers human subjectivity to precede human praxis can be defended by someone who considers himself to be a Marxist. It seems to me, on the contrary, that it suffices to open the first volume of Capital to realize that the very first step of Marx's analysis of the fetishistic nature of commodities consists precisely in broaching the problem from the level of the signifier, even if the term is not used there. The relations between values are defined as signifying relations, and all subjectivity, and possibly even that of fetishization, comes to be inscribed within this signifying dialectic. This is true beyond a shadow of a doubt.

This is but a simple tangent – a reflection of the occasional indignation and boredom I feel when I have wasted my time – that I am 372 pouring into your ears.

Let us now try to use this relationship, $ in the presence of little a, which to us is the fantasized prop of desire. We must articulate it clearly. What does a, this imaginary other, mean?

It means that something more encompassing than a person can be included therein – a whole chain or scenario. I have no need to return here to what I brought out last year in my analysis of Jean Genet's The Balcony. To explain what I mean in this context, I need but refer to what we might call the diffuse brothel, inasmuch as it becomes the cause of what analysts think of as the sacrosanct genital stage.

What is important in the structural element of imaginary fantasy that is situated at the level of a?

First of all, its opaque character, which specifies it in the most accentuated forms as the pole of perverse desire – stated otherwise, it is the structural element of the perversions. Perversion is characterized by the fact that in perverse fantasy, the entire emphasis is placed on the side of the strictly imaginary correlative. In other words, it is placed on the other, little a, or the parenthesis ($a + b + c$, etc.), in which the most elaborate objects can be found together and combined depending on the trajectory, consequences, and residues in which the function of a fantasy in a perverse desire crystallizes.

Nevertheless, what is essential is the phenomenological element that I alluded to earlier. As strange or bizarre as fantasy in perverse desire may appear to be, desire is always in some way involved – involved in a relationship that is always linked to pathos, to the pain of existing as such, of existing purely and simply, or existing as a sexual term. If a sadistic fantasy subsists, it is quite obviously because he who is subjected to the abuse in the fantasy interests the subject, insofar as the subject himself might be exposed to the same 373 sort of abuse. We can but be surprised that people thought even for a single instant that they could avoid this dimension by relating sadistic tendencies to primal aggression, pure and simple.

But I am already saying too much here. If I am doing so, it is merely in order to emphasize the direction in which we must now articulate the true opposition between perversion and neurosis. Perversion is situated at exactly the same level, as you will see, as neurosis; it is something that is, of course, articulated, interpretable, and analyzable. Nevertheless, in perversion, something concerning the essential relationship between the subject and his being becomes fixated on imaginary elements, as people have always said, in an essentially localized form, whereas neurosis is distinguished by the fact that the emphasis is placed there on the other term of fantasy – in other words, the barred subject.

I told you that fantasy as such is situated at the extreme point of subjective questioning – at its tip, endpoint, or reflection – inasmuch as, beyond demand, the subject attempts to get his bearings anew [se resaisir] in the dimension of the Other's discourse in which he must refind what was lost owing to the fact of his entrance into discourse. As I told you, what is involved is, in the final analysis, not the level of truth but the moment of truth.

This allows us to designate what most profoundly distinguishes neurotic fantasy from perverse fantasy. Perverse fantasy, as I told you, can be called upon [appelé], it is located in space, it suspends some sort of essential relationship to time – it is not strictly speaking atemporal, but lies outside of time. In neurosis, on the other hand, the subject's relationship to time is all too infrequently talked about, whereas it is the very basis of the subject's relations to his object at the level of fantasy.

In neurosis, the object takes on a signification that must be sought out in what I call "the moment [heure] of truth." The object there is always an hour ahead of schedule or an hour behind. Hysteria is characterized by the function of a desire qua unsatisfied, and obsession by the function of an impossible desire; but beyond those two terms, there is a phenomenon that has a twofold and inverse relationship to them. This phenomenon constantly arises and manifests itself in the obsessive's procrastination, which is moreover founded on the fact that he always prepares himself for things when it is too late [anticipe trop tard]. Similarly, the hysteric always repeats what 374 initially occurred in her trauma – namely, something that came too soon, a fundamental unreadiness [immaturation].

The subject always seeks to find his moment [heure] in his object. One might even say that he learns how to tell time from it. This is the foundation of neurotic behavior, in its most general form. It is here that we once again intersect Hamlet.

Hamlet has been assigned every form of neurotic behavior, no matter how extreme – depending on which analyst was interpreting him – even character neurosis, for a legitimate reason that runs throughout the plot and that truly constitutes one of the common factors of Hamlet's structure. The first factor is his dependence on the Other's desire – that is, on his mother's desire. The second common factor, which I will ask you to look for when you read or reread the play, is that Hamlet is always tributary to the other's time [suspendu à l'heure de l'autre], and this is true right up until the end of the play.

Do you recall one of the first turning points we discussed as we began to decipher the text of Hamlet, the one that is situated after the play scene, the scene involving the traveling actors? The king gets upset about what is happening onstage, and visibly betrays his own crime in front of everyone, proving that he cannot bear the sight of it. Hamlet triumphs, exults, and scorns the man who has thus given himself away. Then he goes to the rendezvous with his mother that he had scheduled before the play scene, a rendezvous that everyone was pressing him to have as soon as possible. The major scene that I have already so often emphasized takes place with her.

On the way to the rendezvous, Hamlet comes across the king, who is praying. Shaken to his very foundations by the scene that has just shown him the visage of his own actions, his own scenario, Claudius prays. Hamlet stands there before the king, and everything seems to suggest that the latter is not only disinclined to defend himself, but that he does not even perceive the threat that hangs over him. Hamlet stops at that point because it is not the right time [heure].

It is not the other's time [heure]. It is not the right moment [heure] for him to account for himself to God. To kill him now would be too good for him and too bad for Hamlet's father. It would not sufficiently revenge the latter's death because, owing to Claudius' repentance in his prayer, salvation might be open to him. Be that as it may, one thing is clear, which is that, having just caught the king's conscience as he had hoped – "The play's the thing / Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king" [II, ii, 590–1] – Hamlet stops. Not for a single instant does he think this is the right time. Whatever may happen afterward, this is not the other's time, and he refrains from acting. Similarly, whatever Hamlet does, it is only and always on the other's time that he does it. He puts up with anything and everything.

Let us not forget, all the same, that at the outset of the play – disgusted as he was already, even before his encounter with the ghost* and the unveiling of the crime, by his mother's remarriage – he was thinking of one thing and one thing alone: leaving for Wittenberg. Someone recently underscored this by commenting on a certain practical style that is tending to become established in contemporary mores; he noted that Hamlet was the finest example of the fact that one can avoid many dramas by issuing people passports, allowing them to leave town, in time. If Hamlet had been granted his passport to leave for Wittenberg, there would have been no drama.

It is owing to his parents' agenda [heure] that he stays put. It is in accordance with the other's schedule [heure] that he puts his crime on hold. It is owing to his stepfather's plans [heure] that he departs for England. It is owing to Rosencrantz and Guildenstern's mission [heure] that he is led to send them to their deaths, thanks to the rather prettily executed trick that so impressed Freud. And it is all the same owing to Ophelia's time, the time at which she commits suicide, that the tragedy finds its terminus at a moment at which Hamlet – who has just, it seems, perceived that it is not so difficult to kill someone, the time "to say 'one'" – will not even have time to say "Phew!"

People propose that he do something that in no way resembles an opportunity to kill Claudius – namely, fight in a very pretty fencing contest. All the details of the contest have been minutely worked out. The stakes involve what we will call a series of objects, in the collector's [collectionniste] sense of the term, for they are all precious objects, collector's objects. We would have to re-examine the text, for even here there are subtleties and we enter into the realm of collections – they involve "rapiers" and "their assigns" [V, ii, 145], things that have value only as luxury objects. Hamlet is in fact provoked to engage in a sort of jousting, it being asserted that he is the inferior fencer and must be granted a handicap in the challenge.* In 376 short it is a complicated ceremony.

We, of course, realize that it is a trap concocted by his stepfather and his friend Laertes. But let us not forget that for him it is tantamount to accepting once again to take the long way around [l'école buissonnière]. They are going to have a lot of fun.

He nevertheless feels a little warning in his heart; something stirs him up. The dialectic of presentiment on the hero's part gives emphasis to the drama for a moment. But it is still essentially on the other's time, and far more ridiculously, in order to win the other's bet for him – recall that it is not Hamlet's possessions that are wagered – that he agrees to fight this battle for his stepfather's benefit and as his advocate. In theory, the battle will be courteously fought, yet Hamlet will be facing off against someone who is presumed to be a more accomplished fencer than him and who, as such, will arouse feelings of rivalry and honor in him, a trap in which they are sure they will catch him.

And he runs straight into the trap. The only thing that is new at this point is, I would say, the heat and heart with which he runs. Right up till the end – right up until the final hour [heure], an hour that is so determinate that it will be his own hour, for he will be mortally wounded before he can strike his enemy – it is always by the other's watch [heure] that the plot of the tragedy proceeds and is brought to an end. This is an absolutely essential framework if we are to conceptualize what is involved.

If Hamlet, the character, and the drama of Hamlet metaphysically resonate with the problematic of the modern hero, it is inasmuch as something has, in effect, changed for heroes in relation to their destiny. As I told you, what distinguishes Hamlet from Oedipus is that Hamlet knows. Led to this critical point, we are now in a position to explain what I have called superficial features, such as Hamlet's madness.

In the tragedies of Antiquity we encounter heroes who are crazy, but to the best of my knowledge there are none who – in tragedy, as I said, I am not talking about legends – act crazy. Does everything in Hamlet's madness come down to pretending to be crazy? Let us consider this.

377 Why is he acting crazy? Undoubtedly because he knows that he is the weaker party. As superficial as this feature may be, I am pointing it out, not because it corroborates my perspective [but simply because it is secondary]. Nevertheless, if we consider it carefully, it is not secondary if we wish to understand what Shakespeare meant to convey to us with Hamlet. Pretending to be crazy is, in fact, an essential feature of the original legend, as we find it in the versions written by Saxo Grammaticus and Belleforest.

Shakespeare selected the theme of a hero who is forced to act crazy in order to continue down the path that leads him to accomplish his task. This is a strictly modern dimension. He who knows is intrinsically in such a dangerous position, is so doomed to failure and sacrifice, that his path must be, as Pascal says somewhere, one in which he is crazy like everyone else.

Pretending to be crazy is one of the dimensions of what I might call the politics of the modern hero. It should not be overlooked, for it is what Shakespeare latched onto when he decided to write the tragedy of Hamlet. This is essentially what the prior authors bequeathed him. And the whole point is to figure out what the madman is thinking.

The fact that Shakespeare selected his subject within this problematic is altogether essential.

We have now arrived at the point at which Ophelia must play her part.

If the play truly has in its structure everything that I have just laid out, why bother to bring in Ophelia?

Some of you reproach me for having only timidly made headway. I do not think that I have shown exceptional timidity. I would not like to encourage you to proffer the sort of twaddle with which psychoanalytic texts abound; I simply was astonished that no one had mentioned that Ophelia is omphalos, given that one finds so many other wild and crazy things, things that do not pull any punches, merely by opening up Ella Sharpe's "Unfinished Paper on Hamlet," 378 which was perhaps regrettably uncompleted at her death and that maybe should never have been published.

Ophelia is obviously essential. She will forever be linked to the figure of Hamlet, for centuries to come. Since it is too late for me to be able to complete my discussion of Ophelia today, I simply want to punctuate for you what happens in the course of the play.

We first hear her spoken about as the cause of Hamlet's sorry state. This is Polonius's psychoanalytic-style wisdom: "Hamlet is sad because he is not happy, and if he is not happy it is because of my daughter. You don't know her? She is a rare flower – and I, her father, will naturally not tolerate this."

We see her do something that immediately shows her to be someone quite remarkable – namely, she makes clinical observations. She is, in fact, fortunate enough to be the first person Hamlet runs into after encountering the ghost.* Right after this encounter, which shook him up rather badly, he meets Ophelia, and the way he behaves with her is, I believe, worth repeating here. [As she tells her father:]

My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,
Lord Hamlet, with his doublet all unbraced,
No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
Ungartered, and down-gyved to his ancle,
Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,
And with a look so piteous in purport
As if he had been loosed out of hell
To speak of horrors – he comes before me.
[. . .]
He took me by the wrist and held me hard.
Then goes he to the length of all his arm,
And with his other hand thus o'er his brow
He falls to such perusal of my face
As 'a would draw it. Long stayed he so.
At last, a little shaking of mine arm
And thrice his head thus waving up and down,
He raised a sigh so piteous and profound
As it did seem to shatter all his bulk
And end his being. That done, he lets me go,
And with his head over his shoulder turned 379
He seemed to find his way without his eyes,
For out o' doors he went without their helps
And to the last bended their light on me. [II, i, 77–100]

Polonius immediately cries, "Mad for thy love?" [85] Yet, in my view, Hamlet's obvious scrutiny of Ophelia shows us Hamlet questioning the object, taking some distance with respect to the object as if to endeavor to identify it, something that has now become difficult for him, and vacillating in the presence of what had hitherto been a supremely exalted object to him. This gives us the first stage [temps] of the relation to the object, which involves, as it were, estrangement.*

We cannot say any more about that. Nevertheless, it would not be much of a stretch to designate this moment, at which Hamlet is so sartorially disheveled, as strictly pathological. We can consider it to be akin to those periods in which some sort of subjective disorganization irrupts. Such a phenomenon takes place inasmuch as something vacillates in someone's fantasy and brings out its components, which are registered in what is known as an experience of depersonalization. This is what is manifested in his symptoms. The imaginary limits between the subject and the object manage to be transformed and pass over into the realm of what is known as the fantastical, in the strict sense of the term.

This is exactly what happens when something in the imaginary structure of fantasy, ($$\lozenge a$), establishes a communication pathway with what far more easily reaches the level of the message, $s(A)$ – namely, the other's image, $i(a)$, insofar as it is my own ego [m], which is situated below the message. Authors like Federn indicate with a great deal of finesse the necessary correlations between the feeling of one's own body and the strangeness of what happens to the subject in certain crises, breaks, or attacks [atteinte] of the object at the level specified by ($$\lozenge a$).

If I have perhaps forced things a little bit here in my design to get you interested, it was to show you in what respect this drama is related to certain specific experiences in our clinical work. We will no doubt return to this, but keep in mind, at any rate, that if we do not refer to this pathological schema, it is impossible to clearly situate what Freud situated for the first time at the analytic level:
380 das Unheimliche [the uncanny]. The phenomenon is not linked, as certain people thought, to irruptions of the unconscious, but to a sort of imbalance that occurs in fantasy when, going beyond the limits initially assigned to it, it breaks down and meets back up with the other's image. This is actually but one facet of it.

In Hamlet's case, it seems that after this episode Ophelia has completely ceased to exist for him as a love object. "I did love you once," says Hamlet [III, i, 115]. His cruel aggression, along with his highly sarcastic remarks, make these scenes with Ophelia among the strangest in classical literature. Certain writers have struck the same cord in rather extreme plays, but it is quite unusual to see a scene like the one that takes place between Hamlet and Ophelia be given such a central role, to see it right smack in the middle of a tragic play.

In Hamlet's attitude toward Ophelia, we find a trace of the imbalance in the fantasized relationship that I mentioned earlier – the fantasy tilts toward the object, toward perversion. This is one of the features of their relationship. Another is that the object in question is no longer treated as she had been before – that is, as a woman.

To Hamlet, Ophelia becomes a bearer of children and of sins of all ilks. She is doomed to engender sinners and to then have to succumb to all sorts of calumny. She becomes the pure and simple medium for a form of life that is, in its essence, now condemned. In short, what happens at this moment is the destruction or loss of the object, which is reintegrated into its narcissistic frame.

To the subject, the object appears outside, as it were. The formulation that I provided earlier indicates to you what this object is equivalent to, what it takes the place of, and what cannot be given to the subject except at the moment at which he literally sacrifices himself, at which he is no longer it himself, at which he rejects it with his whole being. This object is clearly no other than the phallus.

Yes, Ophelia is at that moment the phallus, the phallus qua signifying symbol of life, the phallus that the subject externalizes and rejects as such. This is the second stage of the relationship to the object.

We do not have much time left and so I hesitate to give you all the 381 coordinates here. I will return to this. But the fact that this is what is involved – namely, a transformation of the formula [($$ \lozenge a$) into] ($$ \lozenge \varphi$) in the guise of rejection [rejet] – is demonstrated, once you realize it, by something that has nothing to do with the etymology of Ophelia's name.

First of all, the only thing at issue here is fecundity. "Conception is a blessing," Hamlet says to Polonius, "but as your daughter may conceive, friend, look to 't" [II, ii, 184–6]. The entire dialogue with Ophelia shows that woman is conceptualized here only as carrying the vital turgescence that must be cursed and stopped up. As semantic usage shows, "nunnery" could also at that time designate a brothel.

Secondly, the relationship between the phallus and the object is also designated by Hamlet's attitude toward Ophelia during the play scene. When his mother, who is also there, asks him to sit by her, he replies, "No, good mother. Here's metal more attractive" [III, ii, 105], and puts his head between Ophelia's legs, asking her explicitly, "Lady, shall I lie in your lap?" [107]. The phallic quality of the object of desire [Le rapport phallique de l'objet du désir] is clearly indicated here.

I do not believe that it is superfluous to indicate, furthermore, since the iconography [devoted to Hamlet] has highlighted this so emphatically, that among the flowers surrounding Ophelia as she drowns, there are "dead men's fingers" [IV, vii, 170], and explicit mention is made of the fact that they are called by a cruder name by common folk. The plant in question is orchis mascula, and it bears some relation to mandragora [or mandrake] and thus to the phallic element. I looked up dead men's fingers in the New English Dictionary, but I was highly disappointed to find that, even though the name is cited in reference to the term "finger," no mention is made there of what Shakespeare was alluding to with this term.

I have already led you to the third stage of the relation to the object several times, and I am going to end with it again today. It is the stage of the cemetery scene. We should highlight here a connection between what presents itself as a reintegration of a and Hamlet's possibility of finishing things off [or: coming full circle, boucler la boucle] – in other words, of finally running headlong toward his destiny.

The cemetery scene, which may seem completely gratuitous, is of absolutely capital importance. It is specifically designed so that 382 something occurs, something that Shakespeare found in none of the earlier versions: a furious battle at the bottom of a grave. I have already emphasized this.

In this scene, the highest function of the object is in some sense traced out. The object is reconquered here only at the price of mourning and death. It is on this point that I believe I will be able to complete our discussion of Hamlet next time.

MOURNING AND DESIRE

Procrastination and precipitation
A mathematical metaphor of the phallus
Hamlet and his double
Why and how Hamlet acts crazy
On what is foreclosed in the real

Hamlet, as I have been telling you, cannot stand to have to keep an appointment. For him, the appointment [rendez-vous] always comes too soon and so he postpones it.

The commentaries that I have become more and more familiar with in the course of our study of Hamlet would like to dismiss the element of procrastination. But we cannot in any way agree to do so. To my way of thinking, procrastination remains one of the essential dimensions of the tragedy.

Yet, when Hamlet takes action it is always with precipitation. He takes action when it suddenly seems to him that an opportunity is presenting itself, when an event beyond his control, resolution, and decision seems to call out to him and offer him some sort of ambiguous opening, which is, strictly speaking, what introduced the perspective that we analysts call flight into the dimension of achievement [accomplicement].

This is never clearer than at the moment at which he runs headlong at something that is stirring behind the arras and kills Polonius. There are other such moments as well. For example, when he awakens at night on the boat during the storm, you see the almost mysterious way in which he, while virtually in an altered state, breaks the seals of the message Guildenstern and Rosencrantz are carrying. Consider, too, the almost automatic way in which he substitutes one message for another and, thanks to his ring, re-creates the royal seal, before availing himself of the prodigious opportunity offered when the pirate ship attacks, he taking advantage of the occasion to escape from his guardians, who then unsuspectingly proceed toward their own execution [IV, vi].

We have here a true phenomenology of the life of the neurotic, 384 since we must call a spade a spade. Its tenor is easily recognizable and almost well known to us from our practice, and from our theory as well. But beyond these tangible characteristics, there is the structural reference that runs throughout the play which I highlighted last time: Hamlet is always operating on the Other's time [à l'heure de l'Autre].

This is merely a mirage, of course. There is no Other of the Other, as I explained before by giving you what I called the final answer, in the form of the signifier of the barred Other [S(Ⱥ)]. In the signifier, there is no guarantor of the dimension of truth that is founded by the signifier. For Hamlet, the only time [heure] is his own time and there is also but one time: the moment [heure] of his downfall. The entire tragedy consists in showing us Hamlet's implacable progress toward that hour.

Nevertheless, the appointment with his downfall is not solely related to the common lot, and thus applicable to all human destiny. If Hamlet's fate did not have a specific sign, it would not have the eminent value that it has for us. What is it, then, that specifies his destiny, that gives it its highly problematic value?

This is the point we have arrived at. This is where we ended last time.

What is Hamlet missing?

To what extent does the general outline of the tragedy of Hamlet, as Shakespeare composed it, allow us to locate a lack that goes beyond the approximations with which we always make do? Such approximations make for the confusion inherent not only in the language we use, but also in the way we act with our patients, and even – it must be admitted – in the suggestions we make to them.

Let us nevertheless begin with an approximate formulation of what is at stake. What Hamlet is always missing is, as we might put it in everyday language, that he does not set his sights on any goal, his action having no object(ive), the latter always involving what we call arbitrariness. As we have seen, and we have even begun to 385 explore why, Hamlet is someone who, as womenfolk are wont to say, does not know what he wants.

This first dimension is in some sense made clear in the lines Shakespeare has him proffer at a certain turning point that is quite significant, which is his eclipse in the tragedy, I mean the brief moment at which he is not present. This is when he is at sea, having embarked only to return exceedingly quickly, having barely left port.

Ever obedient, Hamlet leaves for England in compliance with the king's orders. He encounters Fortinbras's troops at the Danish border, Fortinbras being someone who forms part of the backdrop of the tragedy; he is mentioned right from the beginning and cleans house at the end of the play, collecting the dead and putting the pieces back together. Consider how our Hamlet speaks of Fortinbras. He is struck when he sees the valiant troops that are going to conquer a few acres of Poland in the name of a more or less futile casus belli, and it gives him the opportunity to reflect on his own conduct.

> How all occasions do inform against me
> And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
> If his chief good and market of his time
> Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more.
> Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
> Looking before and after, gave us not
> That capability and godlike reason
> To fust in us unused . . . [IV, iv, 32–9]

"Reason" in this context is grand or fundamental discourse, what I will call "actual [or: concrete, concret] discourse" here.

> . . . Now whether it be > Bestial oblivion

– this is one of the key words of the dimension of his being in the tragedy –

> Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
> Of thinking too precisely on th' event –
> A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
> And ever three parts coward – I do not know
> Why yet I live to say, "This thing's to do,"
> Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
> To do 't. Examples gross as earth exhort me.
> Witness this army of such mass and charge,
> Led by a delicate and tender prince,
> Whose spirit, with divine ambition puffed
> Makes mouths at the invisible event,

Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare, Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
Is not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honour's at the stake. How stand I then,
That have a father killed, a mother stained,
Excitements of my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men
That for a fantasy and trick of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
Which is not tomb enough and continent
To hide the slain? O, from this time forth,
My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth! [IV, iv, 40–66]

Such are Hamlet's meditations on what I will call the object(ive) of human action. This object(ive) leaves the door open to all sorts of specifications on which we ordinarily dwell. For example, the shedding of blood for a noble cause, for the sake of honor, honor also being designated by the fact of having given one's word – we will call that a gift or oblativity.

It is clear that, as analysts, we cannot fail to encounter instances of such concrete resolve or be struck by their weight, whether in flesh or commitments. Nevertheless, when I write the formula ($$\Diamond a$) for you, it is not in order to try to provide the usual form – that is, the lowest common denominator – of such resolve. It is not an articulation that could be characterized as a mere formalism.

Indeed, this formula is inscribed at the end of the question that the subject raises in the Other, when seeking a final answer, by asking the Other: "What do you want?" "Che vuoi?" But the subject has no chance of receiving an answer; there is nothing there that is in fact open to investigation, except under special conditions that we call analytic – except, in other words, with the assistance the subject receives from exploring the unconscious signifying chain that was 387 discovered by Freud's practice. On the graph, this chain is represented by the upper circuit.

What we are dealing with here is the imaginary short circuit that lies halfway between the upper and the lower circuits, where desire connects up with what lies across from it: fantasy. What I express in the formula ($$\Diamond a$) is the general structure of fantasy. The subject designated by the barred S is the subject insofar as he is irreducibly affected by the signifier, with all the consequences that stem therefrom, in particular the fact of placing him in a certain, specific relationship with an imaginary conjunction in its essence, a – not the object of desire, but the object in desire.

The function of the object in desire is what we need to broach, and it is because the tragedy of Hamlet allows us to broach it and spell it out in an exemplary manner that I am examining the structure of this text with such unflagging interest.

Let us look more closely. The formula ($$ \Diamond a$) signifies the following: a specific object becomes an object of desire insofar as the subject is deprived of something of himself that has taken on the value of the very signifier of his alienation – and this something is the phallus – deprived of something that is related to his very life because it has taken on the value of what links him to the signifier.

To be an object of desire is quintessentially different from being an object of any specific need. The temporal subsistence of the object in desire is related to the following: it takes the place of what remains masked to the subject, owing to its nature – namely, that part of himself that he sacrifices, the pound of flesh involved in his relationship to the signifier. It is because something takes its place that this something becomes an object in desire.

What is involved here is profoundly enigmatic, because it is fundamentally a relationship to something that is hidden or occulted. If this is the way it is – please allow me a formulation that came to me while I was jotting down some notes and that has just come back to me, but don't take it as a doctrinal formulation, take it at most as something designed to give you an image – it is insofar as human life can be defined as a form of arithmetic in which zero would be an irrational number.

This formulation is a mere mathematical metaphor. In speaking of the irrational, I am not referring to some sort of unfathomable 388 affective realm, but to something that we encounter in mathematics in the form of what is known as an imaginary number, which is $\sqrt{-1}$. In effect, if there is something that does not correspond to anything that can be intuited and whose entire function must nevertheless be maintained, it is clearly the relationship between the object and the hidden element – which is the subject's living prop – inasmuch as, taking on the function of the signifier, it cannot be subjectified as such.

The square root of minus one cannot in itself correspond to anything real, in the mathematical sense of the term. The same is true of the object. This is why we cannot grasp its true function except by running through the whole series of its possible relations with barred S – in other words, the S that, at the precise point at which a takes on its maximal value, can only be occulted.

Does the tragedy of Hamlet allow us to run through all of the functions of the object? That would be saying a lot, but it allows us in any case to go much further in this direction than people have ever gone by any other pathway.

Let us begin from the end, from the encounter, the time of the rendezvous or final action into which Hamlet at last throws the entire weight of his life, which is what carrying out his action costs him.

The final action deserves to be called an action that Hamlet activates and that he undergoes, for everything surrounding this action is colored by a mort-like tone [un air d'hallali].

At the moment at which he takes action, Hamlet is also Diana's hunted-down stag. The plot against him is closing in on him, with incredible cynicism and malice – I am not sure you realize this – on the parts of Claudius and Laertes, whatever their different motives may be. A tarantula-like being is probably also involved in the plot: the ridiculous courtesan [Osric] who comes to propose that Hamlet participate in the contest in which the conspiracy against him is hidden.

Such is the structure. It is quite clear. I have already emphasized several of its features.

389 The contest that is proposed to him thrusts him into the position of being another's champion, since Hamlet is the one who is to uphold the bet or wager made by his uncle and stepfather, Claudius. The stakes are objects a, with all their brilliance. Like all objects and stakes in the world of human desire, they are essentially characterized by what the religious tradition, in exemplary images, teaches us to call vanitas, which refers to petit point tapestries in which we see a proliferation of pricey objects weighed in the balance against death.

The king has wagered "six Barbary horses," against which Laertes has wagered "six French rapiers and poniards" – namely, all the gear required by duelists – and their "assigns," such as the girdles and hangers they are hung from (their scabbards, I believe). Three of them have what the text calls "carriages," an especially precious word that designates a kind of hoop in which one hangs one's sword [V, ii, 143–8]. This collector's term also means the carriage of a cannon, and the double meaning gives rise to a whole exchange between Hamlet and Osric who informs Hamlet about the conditions of the contest. In a rather long dialogue, the quality, number, and panoply of these objects is designed to dazzle us, giving a lively tone to a trial whose paradoxical and even absurd nature I have already mentioned.

Hamlet seems once again to show interest, as though nothing in him could get in the way of his being fundamentally open to whatever comes along. His answer here is very significant:

> Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please his > majesty, it is the breathing time of day with me. Let the > foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the king > hold his purpose, I will win for him an I can; if not, I > will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits. [V, ii, 167–71]

It is in this regard that the final action shows us the very structure of fantasy. The hero is finally at his maximal resolve. Yet, as always, just before his resolve, we see him literally rent himself out to someone else, and for nothing whatsoever, as gratuitously as possible, this other person being his enemy and the very man he must strike down. He places what he must accomplish in the balance with the things of this world that interest him the least, for these collector's objects are not at that moment his major concern, and, what is more, he is going to strive to win them for someone else. 390

There is, of course, this i(a) at the lower level of the graph with which the others believe they can captivate him. It is not altogether foreign to him, naturally, though not in the way the others think. But he is nevertheless intrigued at the level at which the others situate him. In being pitted against a rival who is, as it turns out, admired, his honor is at stake – in other words, he is intrigued at the level that Hegel calls the fight to the death of pure prestige.

We cannot fail to dwell for a moment on the sureness of the connection established by Shakespeare, for you recognize in it an element that has long been part of our discourse and dialogue here – namely, the mirror stage. It is expressly stated in the text that Laertes is, at this level, a semblable for Hamlet. He is indirectly Hamlet's semblable – at least within a parody.

I am referring to the response he makes to Osric, the overly narrow-minded courtesan. Coming to Hamlet to propose that he participate in a duel, Osric highlights the outstanding skill of the adversary to whom Hamlet will have to prove his mettle. Hamlet cuts him off and ups the ante:

> Sir, his definement suffers no perdition in you, > though, I know, to divide him inventorially would dozy > th' arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw neither, in > respect of his quick sail. [V, ii, 112–15]

And he gives an extremely precious, complicated speech that in some sense parodies the style of his interlocutor, before concluding,

> I take him to be a soul of > great article, and his infusion of > such dearth and rareness, as, to make true diction of him, > his semblable is his mirror, and who else would trace > him, his umbrage, nothing more. [V, ii, 115–19]

In short, regarding Laertes' qualities, Hamlet refers to the other's image as something that cannot fail to be completely absorbing to he who contemplates it. All of this is puffed up in a highly Gongoresque manner, in the fullest sense of the word concetto, and it is with this same attitude and on the same ground that Hamlet meets Laertes prior to the duel. It is quite significant that the playwright situates the manifest point of aggressiveness at the height of 391 imaginary absorption, formally articulated as a specular, mirror relationship.

The person we most admire is the one we are battling. He who is my ideal ego is also he who must be killed, according to Hegel's formulation regarding the impossibility of our coexisting. Hamlet only kills him in a way that we might call disinterested, in the midst of a contest. He only enters into it [s'y engage] in a way that one might qualify as merely formal, or even fictional. Thus it is without foreknowledge that he nevertheless begins to play the most serious of games.

What does this mean? It means that he does not enter the game with, let us say, his phallus. It means that what presents itself in this aggressive relationship is a decoy or mirage; that it is in spite of himself that he is going to lose his life in it; and that it is unbeknownst to him that he is going, at that precise moment, to both carry out his action and meet with his own death. The two occur almost simultaneously.

To say that he does not enter the game with his phallus is a way of expressing what we are in the process of seeking – namely, where the lack lies, where the specificity of Hamlet's position as a subject in the drama resides. He plays the game all the same, for the foils merely appear to be buttoned. In reality, there is at least one that is not buttoned, one that, at the moment at which the swords are distributed, has already been carefully marked in advance as the one to be given to Laertes. That sword has a true "unbated" point and it is, moreover, "envenomed" [V, ii, 306].

It is striking that the scriptwriter's gall meets up here with what one might call the playwright's formidable intuition. During the fight, the poisoned weapon changes hands, God only knows how. This must be one of the difficulties of the staging, and the script-writer does not work terribly hard to explain it to us. After Laertes has dealt Hamlet the blow from which he cannot recover, from which he must perish, there is a sort of scuffle in which they are grappling with each other, and a few moments later the poisoned rapier is in Hamlet's hand. No one gives much thought to explaining how such an astonishing switch can occur.

No one need, moreover, give it any thought, for what is at stake is to show that the instrument of death, the instrument that kills – which is in this case the most veiled instrument of the drama, one which Hamlet can only receive from the other – lies elsewhere 392 than in what can be represented materially here. For the accomplishment of Hamlet's desire does not take place at the level of the skill displayed [or: parrying, parade] in the contest, at the level of the rivalry with he who is his semblable, albeit more handsome than him, the rivalry with the himself [moi-même] that he can love. The drama is played out beyond that. And the phallus is what lies beyond that.

In the end, Hamlet identifies with the fatal signifier in the course of his encounter with the other. Curiously enough, this is found in the text itself, where we come across the word "foil."

The King mentions foils when they are handed out: "Give them the foils, young Osric" [V, ii, 248]. Before that, Hamlet had said, "Give us the foils." But, in between these two occurrences of the word, Hamlet makes a pun:

> I'll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance
> Your skill shall, like a star i' th' darkest night,
> Stick fiery off indeed. [V, ii, 244–6]

[Lacan comments on how French translators have tried to render this.] "Foil" cannot mean rapier [alone] here. It had another perfectly well-known meaning at the time, which was even rather frequently used: "foil," which is the same word as feuille in old French, is used preciously to designate the foil leaf in which something precious is carried – that is, a case or setting [écrin].

In short, Hamlet says, in fighting with you, Laertes, I will be your setting, I will merely highlight "your star-like brightness in the dark sky." These are, moreover, the very conditions on which the duel was accepted. Hamlet, who is thought to have no chance of winning, will be proclaimed the winner if, in the course of twelve passes, his opponent does not hit him three times more than he hits his opponent. Given the way the wager is structured, if Laertes obtains only seven hits to Hamlet's five, Laertes will have lost. Hamlet is thus given a handicap.

One of Hamlet's functions is to constantly play on words, proffer double entendres, and equivocate. The pun involving "foil" is not included here by accident, and it is justifiable to explore what is included in its depths. When he says to Laertes "I'll be your foil," Hamlet uses a word that also means rapier. The subject thus identi-
393 fies with the mortal phallus itself here. "I'll be your foil," he says to Laertes, "to showcase your skill," but a moment later Laertes' sword strikes, the sword that fatally wounds Hamlet before he himself has it in hand and completes his trajectory by killing both his opponent and he who is the final object of his mission – namely, the king.

Let me repeat that it is no accident that this word is used in the text. It is altogether justifiable to highlight it. The play of signifiers belongs to the very texture of Hamlet. A whole discussion should be devoted to this specific dimension.

You are aware of the essential role played by the clowns known as court jesters [fous]. With their no-holds-barred way of speaking, they can allow themselves to reveal people's most hidden motives and character traits that politeness prohibits people from mentioning directly. It is not just cynicism that is involved, nor is it just a more or less insulting, playful way of speaking. These characters operate primarily by equivocating, speaking metaphorically, punning, concocting concetti, speaking preciously, and replacing one signifier with another, the essential function of all of which I emphasize here.

This way of proceeding gives Shakespeare's theatre as a whole a tenor that is absolutely characteristic of his style and creates its psychological dimension. The fact that Hamlet is such an anxiety-provoking character must not hide from us the fact that, in a certain way, this tragedy raises someone who is, strictly speaking, a fool, clown, or jokester, to the rank of a hero. As someone once pointed out, to remove the jests from Hamlet would be to cut out four-fifths of the play.

Indeed, one of the dimensions in which the play's dramatic tension unfolds is constant equivocation. The latter is in some sense dissimulated, as it were, by the masked aspect of things – what gets played out between Claudius, the tyrant and usurper, and his killer, Hamlet, is the unmasking of the latter's intentions. Namely, why is he pretending to be mad [or: playing the fool, faire le fou]? We must not, for all that, forget the way in which he pretends to be mad, which gives his discourse an almost manic quality.

Hamlet never stops latching onto ideas and chances to equivocate on the fly, and these ideas allow him to momentarily blind his 394 adversaries with a sort of flash of meaning. The latter do not see discordant speech in them. They find them strange, in that they are especially relevant, and they are struck by them so much that they themselves sometimes become inventive and even tell tall tales. It is thus not simply a hiding game [jeu] that is being played, but a mind game [or: play of wit, jeu d'esprit] that is being played out at the level of signifiers and in the dimension of meaning. Therein lies what one might call the very spirit [or: wit, esprit] of the play.

This ambiguous disposition makes all of Hamlet's remarks – as well, thus, as the reaction of those around him – into a problem in which the spectator himself gets lost in ceaseless wondering. It is at this level that the play takes on its full import. I am only recalling this to mind here in order to emphasize that there is nothing excessive or arbitrary about giving its full weight to this last pun on the word "foil."

Such is the nature of the constellation within which Hamlet's final action unfolds during his duel with Laertes.

For Hamlet, Laertes is a sort of semblable or double who is more handsome than Hamlet himself. As I have already said, this element is located at the lower level of our graph, at i(a). Hamlet, for whom men and women are no longer anything but insubstantial and putrid shadows, finds a worthy rival in this remodeled semblable, whose presence allows him, at least for a moment, to uphold the human wager [soutenir la gageure humaine] that he, too, is a man.

The remodeling here is but a consequence, not a point of departure. I mean that it is the consequence of what is manifested in the situation – namely, the subject's position in the presence of the other qua object of desire. The presence of the phallus is immanent in this object. The phallus cannot assume its formal function except with the disappearance of the subject himself.

What makes it possible for the subject to succumb even before taking in hand the foil* with which he himself becomes a killer?

This brings us back to that very odd crossroads whose essential character I have already indicated – namely, the cemetery scene and what occurs in the vault.

We will now broach a topic that should interest one of our colleagues who, as it turns out, has done especially fine work on both jealousy and mourning. The jealousy involved in mourning is, in effect, one of the most salient aspects of this tragedy.

Reread the end of the act in which we find the cemetery scene, which I have now commented on three times in the course of this Seminar. There Hamlet articulates exactly what he finds unbearable in Laertes' attitude, bearing, and ostentation at the moment at which Ophelia is being buried. His partner's ostentatious mourning has the effect of ripping him away from himself; he is overwhelmed and shaken to his very foundations, to the point of not being able to handle it.

This first manifestation of Hamlet's rivalry with Laertes is far more authentic than the second. Hamlet approaches the duel with all the ceremony of courtly manners and with a buttoned foil, whereas in the cemetery scene he goes straight for Laertes' throat, jumping into the hole in which Ophelia's body has just been lowered. And he hurls:

> 'Swounds, show me what thou't do:
> Woo't weep? woo't fight? woo't fast? [. . .]
> I'll do't. Dost thou come here to whine?
> To outface me with leaping in her grave?
> Be buried quick with her, and so will I.
> And, if thou prate of mountains, let them throw
> Millions of acres on us, till our ground,
> Singeing his pate against the burning zone,
> Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou'lt mouth,
> I'll rant as well as thou. [V, i, 261–70]

At that, everyone is appalled and hurries to separate these warring brothers who are choking each other.

Hamlet then adds the following:

> Hear you, sir.
> What is the reason that you use me thus?
> I loved you ever. But it is no matter.
> Let Hercules himself do what he may,
> The cat will mew, and dog will have his day. [V, i, 275–9]

I will leave some of you the task of bringing out the full value of this proverbial element, as I cannot dwell on it now. Hamlet later explains to Horatio what is essential here: he could not bear to see "the bravery of [Laertes'] grief" [V, ii, 79].

This brings us to the very heart of the dimension of mourning, which is going to open up an entire problematic for us. What 396 relationship is there between what I have formulated in the form of ($$ \lozenge a$), concerning the constitution of the object in desire, and mourning? Let us broach what presents itself to us via its most manifest characteristics, which can also seem to be furthest from the heart of what we are seeking here.

We have seen Hamlet behave quite scornfully and cruelly toward Ophelia. I highlighted the degrading, humiliating aggression to which he constantly subjected her, she who suddenly became for him the very symbol of the rejection of his desire. We cannot fail to be struck when this object suddenly reassumes its full value to him. Consider in what terms the challenge he addresses to Laertes begins:

> I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers
> Could not with all their quantity of love
> Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her? [V, i, 56–8]

In short, it is to the extent to which Ophelia has become an impossible object that she once again becomes the object of his desire. This feature completes in another guise what I said about the structure of Hamlet's desire. We believe we find ourselves here on a familiar path, where we can recognize one of the characteristics of the obsessive's desire, but let us not too quickly stop at such overly obvious appearances.

What characterizes the obsessive is not so much that the object of his desire is impossible, for there is always a note of impossibility in the object of desire, which has to do with the very structure and foundations of desire. The fact that the object of desire is impossible is just one of the especially manifest forms of an aspect of human desire. What specifically characterizes the obsessive is that he emphasizes the encounter with this impossibility. In other words, he orchestrates things in such a way that the object of his desire takes on the essential value of signifying this impossibility.

Something more profound is in store for us, however, which concerns mourning.

Our theory, our tradition, and Freud's formulations have already taught us to formulate mourning in terms of object relations. There have long been psychologists who think, yet Freud was the first – isn't it striking? – to highlight the object that is mourned. It is in a certain identificatory relationship that this object takes on its import, and that its manifestations come together and become organized.

With the vocabulary we have learned to use here, can't we try to rearticulate more precisely the [kind of] identification involved in 397 mourning, which Freud tried to define most precisely by designating it as an incorporation? Exploring the question with the help of my symbolic devices [appareils], we will see that only they bring out consequences that I believe are new and eminently suggestive regarding the function of mourning. I mean that they open up for us effective and fruitful insights we cannot reach by any other pathway.

The nature of identification must be clarified by the categories that I have been developing here with you for years – namely, those of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real.

What is meant by incorporation of the lost object? What does the work of mourning consist of? Not being suitably articulated, the topic remains bogged down in obscurity, which explains why we have made so little progress down the path that Freud paved for us concerning mourning and melancholia.

Let us confine our attention to the first, most obvious aspects of the experience of mourning. The subject succumbs to the vertigo of pain, and finds himself in a certain relationship to the missing object that is, in some sense, illustrated for us by what occurs in the cemetery scene. Laertes jumps into the grave and, out of his mind, embraces the object whose disappearance is causing him pain. It is clear that the object here has an existence that is all the more absolute because it no longer corresponds to anything that exists.

In other words, mourning, which involves a veritable, intolerable loss to human beings, gives rise in them to a hole in reality [réel]. The relationship in question is the converse of the one that I proposed with the term Verwerfung [foreclosure] when I told you that what is rejected in the symbolic reappears in reality. This formulation, like its converse, should be taken literally.

The truly intolerable dimension of human experience that comes with mourning is not the experience of your own death, which no one has, but that of the death of another person, when that other person is essential to you. Such a loss constitutes a Verwerfung, a hole, [not in the symbolic] but in reality. Owing to the same correspondence as the one I articulate regarding Verwerfung, this hole turns out to provide a place onto which the missing signifier is projected.

What we have here is the signifier that is essential to the structure 398 of the Other, the signifier whose absence renders the Other unable to give you your answer. You can only redeem [or: pay for, payer] this signifier with your flesh and blood. It is essentially the phallus behind the veil.

This signifier finds its place here. And at the same time it cannot find its place because this signifier cannot be articulated at the level of the Other. Owing to this, and as in psychosis, all the images that have to do with the phenomena of mourning proliferate in its place. Mourning is akin to psychosis in this regard.

Among these phenomena we should include those by which is manifested, not some specific form of madness, but one of the most essential forms of collective madness in the human world. If some rite has not been performed for the departed, for the person who has just disappeared, strange things begin to happen. This is what explains, for example, the appearance, at the most basic level in the tragedy of Hamlet, of an image that can affect the soul of each and every one of us – namely, the ghost.*

What, in the final analysis, are funeral rites designed to do? To propitiate [satisfaire à] what we call the memory of the departed. And what do these rites involve if not the total, massive intervention, from hell to heaven, of the entire symbolic system [jeu symbolique].

I would love to have the time to devote several classes to the subject of funeral rites through an ethnological investigation. I recall having spent some time, many years ago, reading a book which admirably does so and which is exemplary in that it is from a civilization that is distant enough from our own for the function of such rites to be strikingly brought out in it. It is [Confucius' Book of Rites:] Liji, a sacred Chinese book.

Funeral rites have a macrocosmic nature, since there is nothing that can fill the hole in the real with signifiers unless it is the totality of the signifier itself. The work of mourning is carried out at the level of logos – I am saying this so as not to say at the level of the group or community, even though the group and the community as culturally organized naturally support this. The work of mourning presents itself first of all as a palliative for [satisfaction donnée à] the chaos that ensues owing to the inability of all signifying elements to deal with the hole in existence that has been created by someone's death. 399
The entire signifying system is brought to bear on even the slightest case of mourning.

This is what explains the fact that all folk beliefs establish the closest relationship between two facts: if something is overlooked, elided, or refused in the propitiation [satisfaction] owed to the departed, all kinds of phenomena occur that stem from the coming into play and operating of the power of ghosts and worms [larves] in the place left unfilled by the missing signifying rite.

We see here a new dimension of the tragedy of Hamlet.

I told you at the outset that Hamlet is a tragedy of the underworld. The ghost* appears owing to an unatonable offense. In this perspective, Ophelia appears to be neutral, as nothing other than a victim offered up to [propitiate] the primordial offense. Polonius's death; the extraordinary scene of his cadaver being ridiculously dragged by the foot and hidden in defiance of the sensibility and concern of all and sundry; Hamlet who is suddenly and literally out of control [déchaîné], who makes fun of everyone who asks where the cadaver is and who enjoys coming up with a whole series of enigmas in very bad taste which culminates in the formulation, "Hide fox, and all after" [IV, ii, 29], which refers to a kind of hide-and-go-seek game – all of that derides what is at stake, which is a mourning that has not been completed [satisfait].

I have not yet been able to give you the last word today, but you can already catch a glimpse here of the paradoxical relationship between fantasy, ($$ \lozenge a$), and the object-relation, which seems to be only distantly related to it, but on which mourning allows us to shed light.

Next time we will go into detail, once again taking up the twists and turns in Hamlet, inasmuch as the play allows us to better grasp the economy, which is tightly linked here, of the real, the imaginary, and the symbolic.

In the course of our exploration, many of your preconceived ideas will perhaps break down and even, I hope, be shattered. Nevertheless, I think that you will be prepared for it by my commentary on this tragedy in which we are spared no cadavers. This purely 400 ideational damage will no doubt seem insignificant to you next to the damage Hamlet leaves in his wake.

In short, you can find consolation for the perchance difficult path I am taking you down with this Hamletesque formulation: you can't make a Hamlet without breaking eggs.

PHALLOPHANIES

Hamlet and Oedipus
Mourning the loss of the phallus
. . . and its transformation into a signifier
Forms of the subject's disappearance
A real and rotten phallus

If the tragedy of Hamlet is the tragedy of desire, it is time to notice what one always notices last – namely, what is most obvious.

Indeed, I do not believe that any author has ever dwelt on the fact that people talk about nothing but mourning from one end of Hamlet to the other, a fact that is difficult to overlook once it is formulated. This is where we left off last time.

The first remark Hamlet makes in the play concerns the scandalous nature of his mother's remarriage so soon after her husband's death. The mother herself, in her anxiety to know what is tormenting her beloved son, calls it "our o'erhasty marriage":

> I doubt it is no other but the main,
> His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage. [II, ii, 56–7]

No need to remind you of Hamlet's words about the leftovers of the funeral meal being served at the wedding feast: "Thrift [Économie], thrift, Horatio!" [I, ii, 180]. The word he uses nicely alerts us to what is overlooked when we explore the world of objects on the basis of the modern conceptual framework involving use value and exchange value, not to mention all the related notions that have been generated around them. Perhaps Marxist economic analysis, which dominates the thinking of our era, neglects something whose power and amplitude we deal with all the time: ritual values.

Even though we constantly pinpoint these latter in our practice, it might be worth our while to isolate and articulate them as essential.

I mentioned the function of rituals in mourning last time. Rituals serve a mediating function with regard to the gap opened up by [the loss of a loved one, leading to] mourning. More accurately speaking, mourning coincides with an essential gap, the major symbolic gap, the symbolic lack – in short, the point x, of which the dream's navel, which Freud mentions somewhere, is perhaps but a psychological correlate.

Thus we cannot fail to be struck by the fact that, in all the major instances of mourning that are called into question in Hamlet, what we always find is that the rituals have been abbreviated or carried out clandestinely. Polonius is buried secretly, quickly, and uncer-emoniously for political reasons. And you remember what happens with regard to Ophelia's burial.

Whereas she probably died having wanted to die, having deliber-ately drowned herself – that, at least, is the people's opinion – she was nevertheless buried on Christian ground and granted some modicum of Christian rites. The gravediggers are sure that, had she not been a gentlewoman, she would have been treated otherwise – which is the way the preacher says it should have been, for he believed she should have been denied funeral honors – she would have been thrown into "ground unsanctified," and "Shards, flints, and pebbles [would have been] thrown on her" [V, i, 216–8]. Here, too, the preacher only agreed to limited rites ["maimed rites"].

All of this is clearly emphasized at the end of the cemetery scene. We cannot but take all of these elements into account, especially when we add plenty of others to them. The father's shade [ombre] has an unatonable grievance, for he was, we are told, forever offended, having been surprised "in the blossoms of [his] sin" [I, v, 76]. This is not the least of the mysteries we encounter when we try to decipher the meaning of this tragedy. Before his death, the father did not have time to prepare himself to appear at the Last Judgment.

We have here traces, "clues"* as they say in English, eminently significant ones, which converge too obviously for us not to consider 403 them. We are obliged to wonder, as we began to do last time, about the relationship between the drama of desire and what is involved in mourning and its exigencies.

This is the point I would like to focus on today in order to try to explore the nature of the object with you.

We broach the object in psychoanalysis in various forms. We broach it here in the sense of the object of desire. There is, it seems, a simple relationship between the object and desire. But can the rendezvous between desire and its object be articulated as if it were a mere appointment*? Perhaps it is something else.

We broach the question from a different angle when we speak of the object with which the subject identifies in mourning, and which he can, so people say, reintegrate into his ego.* What do we have here? Aren't there in fact two phases, which are not articulated and synchronized in psychoanalysis? Isn't this a problem that requires us to try to make headway here?

What I have just said about mourning in Hamlet must not hide from us the fact that, in both Hamlet and Oedipus, mourning is premised on a crime. Up to a certain point, all the instances of mourning that come cascading down on us are the aftermath and consequences of the crime that sets the drama in motion. It is in this respect that Hamlet is, I am saying, an Oedipal drama, a drama that I consider to be Oedipus' equal, and that I rank at the same functional level in the genealogy of tragedy.

It is the role played by crime in Hamlet that put Freud, and his disciples after him, on the scent of the importance this play takes on for us as analysts. In the psychoanalytic tradition, Hamlet is situated at the heart of speculation about origins, since we are in the habit of recognizing in Oedipus's crime the most essential plot [trame] involving the subject and what we call the Other here – namely, the locus in which the law is inscribed. Connecting these things should give us the opportunity to return to the way in which relations between the subject and what one might call the original crime have been articulated up until now and to recall a few essential terms.

Instead of doing what people always do, leaving things vague in a way that does nothing to facilitate speculation, we are going to 404 introduce a clear distinction. We are presented with two stages.

First, there is Freud's myth, which deserves to be called one. Totem and Taboo lays out what we can, strictly speaking, call a myth. I already touched on this point when I told you that Freud's construction is perhaps the only example of a myth that has been concocted in our own time.

This myth indicates to us the early, essential, and altogether necessary link that is such that we cannot conceptualize the law, as an order, except on the basis of a still earlier fact that presents itself as a crime. This is the meaning of Freud's myth. The crime is the primal killing of the father. In Freud's view, it forms, let us note, the horizon or endpoint of the problem of origins in all psychoanalytic matters, for Freud finds it everywhere and no topic seems to him to have been exhausted if it has not yet been connected up with it. It is all too obvious that this primal killing of the father has a mythical necessity for him, whether he situates it at the origin of the primal horde or at the origin of the Judaic tradition.

The relationship between the primal law and the primal crime is one thing; the drama that shapes the Oedipus complex is another. By this, I mean what happens when the tragic hero – who is Oedipus, but who is also, virtually, each of us at some point of our being when we reproduce the Oedipal drama – kills his father and sleeps with his mother, accomplishing at the tragic level, in a sort of lustral bath, the rebirth of the law.

Oedipus corresponds perfectly to the definition I just gave of ritual reproduction of the myth. Oedipus is, in short, completely innocent and unconscious. He repeats – unbeknownst to himself, in the sort of dream his life consists of, "Life is a dream" – actions that run from the crime to the restoring of order and the punishment he administers to himself, which makes him seem castrated to us at the end.

This castration is the essential element to take into account, and it remains veiled when one confines oneself to the level at which we see the genesis of the primal murder. In the final analysis, the meaning that shines through is that this punishment, sanction, or castration 405 contains its result – namely, the humanization of man's sexuality – within itself, under lock and key. It is a key that we, owing to our practice, are in the habit of using in order to account for all the incidents that arise in the course of the unfolding of desire.

It is worth bringing out here the various dissymmetries between the tragedy of Oedipus and that of Hamlet, even if to spell them out in detail would be almost too clever [brillante].

In Oedipus, the crime occurs during the hero's generation. In Hamlet, it occurs in the prior generation. In Oedipus, the crime is committed when the hero does not know what he is doing and is in some sense guided by fatum [fate]. In Hamlet, the crime is committed in a deliberate manner, since it is committed through treachery.

In Hamlet, the crime catches its victim, Hamlet's father, while he is sleeping. There is something about this sleep that absolutely does not fit in [or: does not make sense, pas intégré]. Whereas in Oedipus the hero plays out the drama the way each of us repeats it in his dreams, in Hamlet the father has truly been taken by surprise in a way that is completely foreign to his train of thought at the time. As he puts it, he was "Cut off even in the blossoms of [his] sin" [I, v, 76]. A blow strikes him, coming from a quarter from which he did not expect it; it is a true intrusion from the real, a true breaking of the thread of destiny. He dies on a bed of flowers, as Shakespeare's text tells us, and during the play scene the actors even go so far as to reproduce this bed of flowers for us in their sort of preliminary pantomime. There is undoubtedly some sort of mystery here.

Furthermore, this exceedingly odd fact – namely, the irruption of a criminal act that is so foreign to the subject – appears in some sense to be counterbalanced by the fact that in this case the subject knows. I mean that Hamlet is informed by his father, who knows what happened. This paradoxical contrast, which I pointed out to you from the outset, is certainly not one of the least enigmatic elements of the play.

The drama of Hamlet, as opposed to that of Oedipus, does not begin from questions like "What is happening?" "What crime was committed?" and "Who is the guilty party?" It begins from the revelation of the crime, whispered into the subject's ear, and it is on the basis of this revelation that the drama unfolds. This revelation – and we see all of its ambiguity and its contrast with Oedipus – can thus be written in the way I notate messages from the unconscious: namely, 406 as the signifier of barred A, S(Ⱥ).

In the, as it were, "normal" form of the Oedipus complex, this signifier manages to get incarnated in the figure of the father. The sanction given by the locus of the Other, the truth about truth [la vérité de la vérité], is expected from the father and is called for from him, insofar as he should be the author of the law. Nevertheless, he is never anything more than someone who is subject to the law; he cannot guarantee it, no more than anyone else can, for he, too, has to submit to the bar, which makes him a castrated father inasmuch as he is a real father.

Things are quite different – even if they can be symbolized in the same way – not at the end of Hamlet, but at its outset. In the father's message, with which the drama begins, we see the Other present himself in the most signifying form as a barred A. He has been wiped away not only from the surface of the living, but from the recompense that should have been his. The crime sent him into the bowels of hell – in other words, he has a debt that he has been unable to pay, an unatonable debt, as he puts it. To his son, this is the most horrible and anxiety-provoking meaning of the father's revelation.

Returning to the case of Oedipus, we see that he himself paid. He presents himself as someone who shoulders the burden of the discharged debt in his destiny as a hero. What Hamlet's father shall complain of for all eternity is that the thread of his destiny was interrupted and broken, such that he will never be able to answer for it. As you see, our investigation, as it progresses, is leading us to what is involved in retribution, punishment, and castration, and is heading toward the relationship to the phallic signifier, since it is in this sense that we have begun to articulate castration.

We see an ambiguity here in relation to what Freud formulated, in a way that was a bit fin de siècle – namely, that we are doomed to no longer experience the Oedipus complex except in a somewhat distorted form. This assertion is assuredly echoed in Hamlet. Consider one of his first cries at the end of the first act:

> The time is out of joint. O cursed spite
> That ever I was born to set it right! [I, v, 188–9]

There is no way to translate the word "spite," which is found throughout Shakespeare's Sonnets, into French except with the word "dépit." Dépit has, however, taken on a subjective meaning for us. The first step I would have to take in order to help you understand the Elizabethans would be to make a certain number of words double-jointed again. Dépit must be situated somewhere between objective and subjective spite.

We seem to have lost this reference point. We no longer know how to articulate words that can lie between objective and subjective, that can operate both at the heart of the subject's lived experience and at the level of the world order. What Hamlet is designating when he says "O cursed spite" is what he is bitterly disappointed about: the way in which time is unjust to him, or what he can designate as injustice in the world. Perhaps you recognize here in passing the mistake made by the beautiful soul, which we have not left behind, far from it, despite all our efforts, but that Shakespeare's vocabulary transcends, and it is no accident that I so blithely mentioned his Sonnets.

In the lines, "The time is out of joint. O cursed spite / That ever I was born to set it right!" something is justified but also deepened that may appear to us to illustrate in Hamlet a decadent form, a sort of incomplete Untergang [fall or dissolution] of the Oedipus complex.

This contrasts with what Freud describes in each individual's life in his 1924 paper entitled Das Untergang des Ödipuskomplexes ["The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex"].

I would now like to draw your attention to this short text, which you can find in volume XIII of Freud's Gesammelte Werke [pp. 395–402].

What, in the final analysis, is the enigma of the Oedipus complex? Freud highlights that it is not simply the fact that the subject wants to kill his father and rape his mother, but that this [desire] comes to dwell in the unconscious.

And it so clearly dwells in the unconscious that, in the course of the so-called latency period – which is, in human beings, the source of the building blocks [points de construction] of their entire objective world – subjects are no longer thinking about this. This goes so far, as you know, that Freud suggests – at least when he first provides this theoretical formulation – that the ideal case would be that no longer being concerned with it becomes definitive, happily so.

Let us consider what Freud says. Afterward we will see in what respect this can help us in our current undertaking. The Oedipus complex begins its Untergang – its decline or dissolution, which 408 is decisive for the whole of the subject's later development – after what?

Freud tells us that the subject must have tried out and experienced both vertices of the Oedipal triangle. Inasmuch as a boy, as his father's rival, wants to take his father's place, he becomes the target of a concrete threat, which is no other than that of castration: he will be castrated. If, instead, he takes his mother's place, he will lose the phallus anyway – Freud says this literally – since at the point at which the Oedipus complex comes to fruition, the boy has also fully realized that women are castrated.

At the level of the relationship to the thing known as the phallus, the subject thus finds himself in a bind that leaves him no way out. This situation, in which the phallus is the key, constitutes the essential drama of the Oedipus complex insofar as it marks, I would say, the juncture and turning point that conveys the subject from the level of demand to that of desire.

I said "thing" [known as the phallus], not "object," inasmuch as what is involved is something real, something that is not yet symbolized but that may, in some sense, become symbolized. In short, it is what we can call a signifier, vaguely speaking.

Freud thus presents the phallus to us as the key to the Untergang of the Oedipus complex. The Oedipus complex begins to dissolve when the subject enters into a relationship, we might say, of lassitude – this is what we find in Freud's text – with regard to gratification. This is when the subject realizes that no gratification can be expected in this context; he knows that the articulated emergence of the thing will not occur; and he gives up trying to be equal to the task. Freud articulates it for the boy and still more for the girl, for he places her in a position about which I will not say that it is not dissymmetrical, but it is not so very dissymmetrical.

In short, the subject must mourn the loss of the phallus. This comes across very clearly – the Untergang of the Oedipus complex is played out around mourning. How can we not but relate this to the general problematic of mourning?

Let me underscore that the moment at which the dissolution of the Oedipus complex occurs plays a decisive role in what follows, not only because the fragments and detritus it leaves in its wake, which are more or less incompletely repressed, will come out at puberty in the form of neurotic symptoms, but above all because, 409 as the shared experience of psychoanalysts attests, the subject's normalization at the genital level depends on this moment – not in the subject's unconscious economy alone but in the subject's imaginary economy as well. Which is to say that there is no happy outcome as regards genital maturity except by going through the entirety of the Oedipus complex, insofar as its consequence, in both men and women, is the scar [or: mark, stigmate] of the castration complex. Synthesizing this with the mechanism of mourning, as it is described to us by Freud, will perhaps allow us to clarify the mechanism of mourning the loss of the phallus, which is no doubt peculiar since the phallus is an object like no other.

But, I ask you, what defines the scope and limits of the set of objects that we may be led to mourn? This, too, has never before been articulated. We suspect, of course, that the phallus is different from the other objects that we may be led to mourn. Here as everywhere else, it must have its own separate place; but this is precisely what must be specified. And, as in many cases, to specify something is to indicate its place against a backdrop. It is in pinpointing it against this backdrop that the place of the backdrop also manages to get retroactively specified.

What I am calling the place of the object in desire is completely new territory. Our analysis of Hamlet is designed, in the end, to help us make headway in this realm. I am tilling this ground here by plowing a series of concentric rows. I am conveying it to you in a way that is at times emphatic, at times resonant. And I hope to make it more and more precise as we go on.

What does Freud tell us about mourning the loss of the phallus? He presents the subject's narcissistic demand [exigence] as one of its fundamental mainsprings, insofar as this demand is what gives the phallus its value, which is precisely what we are seeking. He brings in this factor without the slightest precaution, as he always does. I mean that he shakes us up, as is his wont, and thank God he did it his whole life long; if not, he would never have gotten to the end of what he needed to sketch out in his field.

The subject thus gets to the point at which he is in the presence of the final exit from his Oedipal demands; he is at the critical moment 410 at which he realizes that he will be castrated and deprived of the phallus in either case. Well, Freud tells us, rather than abandon the phallus, he prefers to abandon, as it were, a whole part of himself, which will henceforth and forever be prohibited to him. This part is what is transmitted by the dotted signifying chain found at the top of the graph of desire [see Figure 15.4].

Stated otherwise, the subject lets go of what was most important to him – namely, the love relationship as it presented itself to him in the parental dialectic into which he had to enter one way or another – because, Freud tells us, of his narcissistic relationship with a term that was introduced right from the outset and that has enigmatically and yet clearly run throughout his experience: the phallus.

What can this mean to us, in our vocabulary? This vocabulary can shed light on what is at stake in what Freud designates as a narcissistic demand, and which he had to leave to one side, as I was just saying, because he did not have the time to dwell at length on his premises, and because he needed to go right to the quick, to the core of the subject. Which is, moreover, how every action is grounded, still more every true action, as is, or should be, the action we are concerned with here – namely, psychoanalytic action.

Let us thus translate this into our own terms and reference points: to say that the demand in question is narcissistic implies that it is situated at the imaginary level. On the other hand, the subject's demand for love has begun to express itself in the field organized by the symbolic, what we call the locus of the Other. The critical moment arrives once the subject has run the gamut of all possible relations there and has reached the end. The upshot is the loss of the phallus, experienced as a radical loss that no satisfaction can plug up.

I have already indicated that what happens then is akin to a psychotic mechanism: the subject can only respond to this mourning with his imaginary texture. What Freud presents us, in a veiled form, as the narcissistic link between the subject and the phallus, allows us to identify the phallus with something that represents lack as such in the subject at the imaginary level. This lack places something in reserve – in the form of nihilation [or: obliteration or "nothingizing," sous une forme néantisée], as it were – something that will serve as a mold in which the subject's assumption of his position in the genital function will later be recast.

But isn't this to conclude too quickly about what is involved? 411
Doesn't this lead us to believe, as we ordinarily do, that the relationship to the genital object is a relationship that changes from positive to negative? As you will see, it is nothing of the sort. Our notation is superior because it allows us to articulate how the problem really presents itself. Let me specifically remind you of what I already laid out when I distinguished among the functions of castration, frustration, and deprivation [see Seminar IV].

If you recall, I wrote the following: castration is a symbolic action, frustration is an imaginary term, and deprivation is a real term. I also indicated their relations to objects: I told you that castration is related to the imaginary phallic object; that frustration, which is imaginary in nature, is always related to a real possession [bien] or term; and that deprivation, which is real, is related to a symbolic term. I added at that time that there is no sort of gap or crack in the real. Lack always involves something that is missing from its [usual] place; the fact of being missing from its place is [what is known as] a symbolic lack [Tout manque est manque à sa place, mais le manque à sa place est manque symbolique].

Table 19.1: Table of lacking objects

AGENT	LACK	OBJECT
	Castration S	i

	Deprivation R	s

The column on the left [Table 19.1] concerns the agent of these actions. I only discussed one of the agents: the agent of frustration – namely, the mother. I showed you that, qua locus of the demand for love, she is at first symbolized in the twofold register of presence and absence, and that she thereby finds herself to be in the position 412 of setting the generative [or: developmental, génétique] dialectic in motion, inasmuch as, qua real mother, she turns what the subject is really deprived of – the breast, for example – into a symbol of her love.

I stopped there, leaving blank the boxes corresponding to the term "agent" in the other two relationships. As for its place, the term "agent" is related to the subject. I could not at that time clearly articulate the different stages of the subject. It is only now that I can indicate what is involved.

At the level of frustration, where I had placed the mother's actual locus, I am inscribing the term by which everything that happens owing to her takes on its value – in other words, the A of the Other insofar as it is there that demand is articulated.

At the level of castration, we have a subject qua real, but in the form in which we have learned to formulate and discover it since – in other words, as the speaking or actual subject. He is marked by the sign of speech. We write this, of course, as barred S.

It seems to me that this is what philosophers have been trying to articulate for some time concerning the peculiar nature of human action. It is impossible to broach this topic without realizing that there is something fishy in the illusory idea of turning some sort of absolute beginning into a final term with which to pinpoint the notion of the agent. People have tried, over time, to present this something fishy to us in the form of varied speculations about a type of freedom that is supposedly at the same time necessity. This is the terminus at which philosophers have arrived in articulating the following: that there is no other true action than to align yourself in some sense with God's will.

What I am contributing here can at least claim to stem from a completely different register owing to the specific quality of its articulation. I say that the subject, qua real, stands in a specific relation to speech, and that this relation gives rise in him to an eclipse or fundamental lack that structures him at the symbolic level in relation to castration. I am not saying that this is a pot of gold or a skeleton key that opens all doors. It is no more than the beginning of an articulation, but it is something that has never been said before, and this is perhaps worth emphasizing.

What then appears at the level of deprivation? What does the subject who has been symbolically castrated become at this level? 413
Note that he has been symbolically castrated at the level of his position as a speaking subject, and not at the level of his being. What is involved becomes far clearer and easier to indicate once we formulate the problem in terms of mourning. The being in question must mourn something that he must offer up as a sacrifice or holocaust, in order to raise it to the level of its function as a missing signifier.

At the imaginary level, the subject is identical to the biological images that guide him and that trace out the wake prepared for his behavior,* for what is going to attract him, by all the pathways of voracity and coupling. It is at the imaginary level that something is caught up, marked, and subtracted. The upshot is a really deprived subject. Our conceptual framework and knowledge do not allow us to locate or situate this deprivation anywhere in the real, because the real as such is defined as always full.

We encounter here again, but in a different and otherwise highlighted form, something that has been remarked by what is rightly or wrongly known as existentialist thought – namely, that it is the living, human subject who introduces a "nihilation" [néantisation] into reality. That is what they call it; we give it a different name.

This nihilation, which comforts philosophers, and even grants them pleasant weekends – see Raymond Queneau's novel [Le Dimanche de la vie, The Sunday of Life] – is inadequate for us and does not satisfy us, given the more than artificial uses to which it is put in modern dialectical prestidigitation.

We call it minus phi ($-\varphi$). It is what Freud pinpointed as essential in the mark left on man by his relation to logos – that is, castration, which is, in effect, assumed [assumée] here at the imaginary level. This notation will allow us to define desire's object a as it appears in our formulation of fantasy, and we will situate it in relation to the categories, chapter headings, and registers we are used to working with in psychoanalysis.

Desire's object a is the object that sustains the relationship between the subject and what he is not – up to that point, we go more or less as far, although a bit further, than what traditional and existentialist philosophy formulated as the negativity or nihilation of the existing subject – but we add: it sustains the relationship between the subject and what he is not insofar as he is not the phallus.

414 Object a sustains the subject in the privileged position he is led to occupy in certain situations, which is strictly speaking the following: that he is not the phallus.

It has now become essential for us to provide an apt definition of object a. At the very least, the time has come for us to try to see how what we have rightly or wrongly begun to articulate as being the object, up until now in our field, is organized and at the same time differentiated.

We are going to have to raise the question: with this object, insofar as it is a, are we defining the genital object? Does this mean that pre-genital objects are not objects? I am not answering this question; I am simply saying that it arises as soon as we formulate the problem in this way.

It is clear that the answer cannot be altogether simple. Nevertheless, our way of formulating the question has at least one advantage, which is to allow us to see the distinction, angle, or cleavage plane that arises between the phallic phase (or stage) – or what has been called that up until now (I am closely following the generally accepted vocabulary here) – and the genital phase (or stage), the one in which the formation and maturation of the object occurs. In [the psychoanalytic literature that has come out in] recent years, it has, indeed, been quite impossible to grasp the relationship between the two.

At the level of deprivation, in which the subject is a desiring subject, his position is always veiled. His position can only be glimpsed in "phanies" [appearances or manifestations], lightning-fast appearances of its reflection at the level of the object, in the form of having it or not having it. But, as such, the subject's radical position is that of not being the phallus – he himself being a negative object, as it were. You see how far I am taking this.

The three forms in which the subject appears at the level of the three terms, castration, frustration, and deprivation, may well be called alienated, on the condition of giving this alienation a tangibly different, varied articulation in each case. At the level of castration, the subject appears in a blacking out [syncope] of the signifier [S]. Things are quite different when he appears at the level of frustration, as subjected to the law that applies to everyone, the Other's law [A]. They are different again when, at the level of deprivation, he himself must situate himself in desire.

This latter form of the subject's disappearance thus appears to us to have an odd originality with respect to the other two, which incites us to go further into it. 415

This is in fact what occurs in our practice, and what the unfolding of the tragedy of Hamlet leads us toward.

The "something . . . rotten" [I, iv, 90] that poor Hamlet needs to set right is closely related to his position as a subject with respect to the phallus.

Throughout the play, we sense that the phallus is present everywhere in the obvious mess [désordre] that is Hamlet's whenever he approaches the hotspots, as it were, of his action. Today I can only quickly indicate to you the points that allow us to follow him step by step.

There is something very strange in the way Hamlet speaks about his dead father; he does so with an idealizing exaltation that more or less boils down to the following: his voice fails him when he tries to say what he has to say about him. In truth, he chokes, only to conclude with one of the specific forms of the signifier known as "pregnant"* in English [II, ii, 206–7] – in other words, an expression that has meaning beyond its meaning – he finds nothing other to say about his father than that he was "a man" like any other. What he means to say is obviously the exact opposite. This is the first trace of what is involved.

There are many other traces as well. The rejection, abuse, and scorn he heaps on Claudius smacks mightily of negation [dénégation]. He generates a slew of insults about him, especially in front of his mother, culminating in an expression that cannot fail to indicate to us that here, too, there is something problematic: "A king of shreds and patches" [III, iv, 103].

We cannot fail to connect this up with an obvious fact in the tragedy of Hamlet, and one that distinguishes it from the Oedipal tragedy: after the father has been killed, the phallus is still there.
416 It is quite plainly there, for it is Claudius who is given the task of embodying it. What is constantly at stake is Claudius' real phallus.

In short, Hamlet has nothing else to reproach his mother for than to have gotten herself filled up by it the minute his father disappeared. And he ends up sending her back, with discouraged arm and speech, to this fatal and fateful object which is quite real here. The whole drama seems to revolve around this.

We are obliged to think that there is something very powerful attaching his mother to her partner, given the human feelings she displays in other contexts; indeed, she does not appear to us to be a woman who, by nature, is so very different from other women. It seems that Hamlet's action revolves and hesitates around this point. Here his "daunted genius" trembles, as it were, before something completely unexpected.

For the phallus is in an entirely ectopic position here with respect to the Oedipal position as it is articulated by psychoanalysis. The phallus is clearly real here; it is in this respect that it is important to strike it, and Hamlet always balks at doing so. His uncertainty and hesitation before the object that must be struck is manifest at the moment at which he finds our Claudius praying and says to himself that he could obviously kill him: "Now might I do it pat" [III, iii, 73]. The precise mainspring of what constantly deflects Hamlet's arm is the very narcissistic link that Freud tells us about in "The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex." One cannot strike the phallus because, even if it is clearly real, it is but a shadow [ombre].

I will ask you to contemplate this in connection with all sorts of very strange, paradoxical things, and especially in connection with how very much we were all stirred up at the time when we wondered why, after all, no one had assassinated Hitler. He perfectly incarnated the object whose function Freud outlines in his Massenpsychologie where he spells out how a mass of people becomes homogenized by way of identification with an object on the horizon, an object x, which is unlike any other. Doesn't that link up with what we are talking about here?

What is involved is the altogether enigmatic manifestation of the signifier of power as such. When it presents itself in a particularly 417 striking form in reality [réel], as occurs in Hamlet – that of a criminal who becomes instated as the usurper – Oedipus deflects Hamlet's arm, not because Hamlet is afraid of this man whom he scorns, but because he knows that what he must strike is something other than what is there. This is so true that, two minutes after stumbling upon Claudius praying, when he arrives in his mother's closet and begins to shake her up bigtime, he hears a sound behind the curtain and runs headlong at it without even looking.

Some astute commentator has pointed out that Hamlet cannot possibly believe it is Claudius behind the tapestry, for he just left Claudius in the next room. Nevertheless, after he has eviscerated poor Polonius, he reflects, > Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!

> I took thee for thy better. [III, iv, 32–3]
